GLIMPSES OF DOMESTIC LIFE IN CHINA—NO. 5.

SHANGHAI, January, 1850.

Several months have elapsed since the death of the dear friend and excellent teacher mentioned in my last, but his remains are not yet removed from the house. The time of their removal to their last resting place is optional with the family, as also the question of their immediate burial, or whether the body shall remain for a season above ground. This retaining the coffin in the house has something terrible in it to one who sees or knows of it for the first time; but, like all other customs it becomes familiar by frequent recurrence. To us, who see coffins in our every walk, "thick as dead leaves by autumn brooks," the mere sight of one in a house has little novelty in it, and nothing worse. Even the imagination ceases to be haunted with the thought of putrescent substances, noxious vapors, and pestilential air. The shops of the undertaker are too numerous, and the danger of stumbling over his work-bench at every corner of the street too common, to allow one to remain long ignorant of the fact, that the planks of which the coffin is made are from four to six inches in thickness, that the bottom is strewed with quick lime, and that on being closed it is made air tight by cement, the outside being afterwards highly varnished, as the inside had previously been. These facts may account for what might otherwise seem unaccountable, that with hundreds and thousands of unburied coffins all around us, the face of the country being literally strewn with them, no physical evils are known to result from their decay, even during the extreme heat of summer or the drenching rains of spring.

Sometimes the burial of the husband is delayed until the death of his wife, or wives, if he have more than one, when one grand burial is made for all, and they are deposited together within the same tomb, which is built in the form of a cone, resting upon a square base, surmounted by a tuft of grass, a little tree or shrub, the sides being scrupulously freed from weeds, swept and garnished, and strips of red and white paper left streaming in the air—an unquestionable proof that all has been done which filial duty for the time being demands. The tomb I have described is of the kind most common here, the level face of the country forbidding them the luxury of side-hill burial grounds, and tombs in the shape of the Greek letter Ω, except in some few cases where art and perseverance may have scooped out a tomb, or reared an amphitheatre, to the memory of some favored ancestor, or to the vanity of some living aspirant after immortal honors.

The family burial ground of our deceased teacher is a small bamboo grove, in a sweetly retired spot, just in a bend made by one of the numerous canals with which the whole face of the country is intersected. One could almost blame a custom which thus retains the rightful occupant of such a spot within the sombre walls of a now gloomy mansion. But affection also has its vigils, which only custom, perhaps, can outlive. His remains still occupy his former study. The coffin rests upon a long table, in the centre of the room, but concealed from the sight, as you enter, by a curtain or screen suspended at the head. Standing against the screen is a table containing various devices of heathenism—a vase, in which incense is kept constantly burning, and on either side of which are candlesticks for the occasional reception of lighted tapers in honor of the dead. Just above these, and hanging against the screen, is a full-length portrait of the departed, excellent, except that the honorary marks of age, which the painter has seen fit to confer upon him, ill accord with the youthful aspect and cheerful bearing of him who had scarcely numbered thirty years. But it is fit his portrait should represent, in some degree at least, the character he is henceforth to sustain, as venerable father of the family, their ruling divinity, their household god.

More distant relatives, as well as personal friends, are accustomed to come, from time to time, to "ke-duh" (bow down) as a token of respect and reverence. This ceremony is performed by pressing the palms of the hands together, and bowing repeatedly very low before the dead; and I could not but notice, how half doubtingly, half pleadingly, the wife looked up in my face, when she saw me turn away, after gazing long upon the coffin, without tendering the accustomed homage, which, from the very high esteem she knew we entertained for our lost teacher, she doubtless felt she had a right to expect.

There is something affecting in the scrupulous deference which is still paid to his known preferences in regard to the arrangement of his study furniture. His well-filled book-case stands but a step removed from that coffin which has closed forever above the eyes that were wont to run to and fro and gather knowledge from its contents. The writing-table still contains his unfinished papers, his ink slab and pencil; but the hand once skilled in their use has forgotten its cunning—the workman has ceased from his toil. A warm double blanket is thrown over the coffin, except the head, on which is seen, as if growing directly out of it, the Nelumbium, or sacred lotus, a flower of peculiarly happy omen, and much used on their ceremonial occasions, whether of sorrow or joy. It is ordinarily of paper, and tinted to suit the original; but in this case it is of copper, as more fitly serving the various purposes for which it is designed. As a flower merely, it tells you that the deceased was a parent. As a representative of wealth, copper is used, which combines also the extra qualifications of beauty in the color, and malleability convenient for reducing it to the required form. (It is well known, that gold is not used by the common people in China, being prohibited by Government.) Then there is the susceptibility of producing sounds, which, upon its being struck, are those of a little bell. But the great meaning covers all the rest. The heir of the family fastens the flower in its place by striking it with a hammer, not merely in token of his birthright, but also to make more expressive the demonstration of his filial love, the clear bell-like tones chiming in most harmoniously with his loud and repeated cry of "Yah, che lay; Yah, che lay," (Father, come back; Father, come back.) If the son is too young to do this himself, he is lifted up in the arms of a servant or friend, who guides the little hand that holds the hammer, and who cries in behalf of the infant suppliant, "Yah, che lay; Yah, che lay." In the same manner may be seen children carried about when prayers and offerings are to be made for the dead, and the infant knee bent, and the tiny hand taught to toss the offering into the flames, or wave the paper banner, or hold the lighted incense, with an apparent zeal and propriety becoming the receivers of a better faith—the followers of an oracle which proclaims, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Would that the children of the Faithful, of whom it was said, "I know him, that he will command his household after him," had as deeply this commandment of their Law-giver written within their hearts. "These words which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart, and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up; and thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes, and thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house and on thy gates." When one sees how scrupulously all this is done, to the very letter, by these pagan Chinese—when he sees how the Christian world are put to shame by them—he is almost ready to cry out, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." But while he is struck with this formal display of outward worship, he is no less so with the heartlessness which attends it. There is seen, is felt, the difference! The true worshiper must worship in spirit and in truth. But the most hollow-hearted hypocrisy, the most glaring deceptions, are constantly practiced by the heathen; and the simple devotee makes no scruple of acknowledging the fact, and consoling himself with that which all seem to believe, that the poor ghosts are abundantly satisfied with their offerings, not having penetration sufficient to detect the frauds practiced upon them! Yet these ghosts are their gods—their saviors! Besides these, they know not any.

For many succeeding weeks, and even months, the family occupied almost constantly the room in which are deposited the remains of him they loved, it being contiguous to the general reception-room, and opening out of it. Latterly, however, I observe that it is oftener deserted, the doors closed and locked, and the key carefully kept by the ruling mother of the house. The wife still wears her widow's weeds, (white,) which she is not to lay aside until her three years of mourning are expired. The son continues in mourning the same length of time. Other relatives have their respective badges, as, for example, a white belt or sash, or a white hank of silk, instead of black, braided into the long cue, and swinging below it almost to the ground. The time of laying aside these badges varies, according to the fondness or fancy of the wearer, from one hundred to three hundred days, or to one year, or even to two. The wife, also, regulates the time of her seclusion according to the grief of her own heart, custom requiring only one hundred days, but affection often lengthening it out to the whole time of her wearing mourning.

No: in China, at least, it is not true, that the dead are soon forgotten. However much the living may be neglected, no sooner does one "become immortal," than he is at once the recipient of those honors which "the immortal" only may claim. Even the garments which are burnt at his death, seem in some way to come in for a claim, for I have seen, when the blazing pile was lighted a little way from the house, a long train of friends come out, all in white, kneel successively on a mat a little distance from the fire, "ke-duh" most eloquently, and return in order to the house, men, women, and children, and even the more remote relations, whose mourning badges were dwindled to the extremest hue of indifference. But there are ever the real mourners. Ask a father or mother how many children they have; they will tell you, for instance, "I have five children—two are not, and three are still living;" and the living and the dead alike retain their individual position in the fraternal ranks, being always known by their original or unbroken number, as "Ta-quay," the eldest son, "Ne-quay," the second son, and so forth; the daughters being addressed as "Ne-seau-cha," second Miss, or "Sah-seau-cha," third Miss—the very name "daughter" being considered too degrading an appellation to bestow upon a child even, being just equivalent to the term slave or servant; so, the daughter, "immortal" is known by her title of respect, equally with her who is still encumbered with the materialities of life.

January 8—Evening.—Have just returned from our accustomed walk on the city wall, during which we have witnessed one part of a funeral ceremony you may not yet have heard described. One soon learns, in China, that all sorts of cooley work is set to music; and the coffin bearers, of whom there are generally six or eight, have their own tones, not, as we should think, of the most funereal kind, but answering admirably the purpose of distinguishing them from all others. This sound we heard in the distance, and just then a cry of lamentation, which seemed to issue from a small cottage below us on the city side of the wall. We paused a little, when two females in mourning apparel came out of the house, just in time to catch the first glimpse of the coffin, as it turned the corner of the street, and appeared in the opening that surrounded the house. The mourners bowed repeatedly towards the advancing coffin, constantly lower and lower, until they sank on their knees, and bowed with their faces to the very ground, their clasped hands always keeping time with their mournful wailings. The coffin was set down before them, the bamboo poles were withdrawn, and the ropes fell heavily upon the lid. The coolies retreated a few steps, the kneeling mourners indulged their grief for a moment, then rose, and casting a longing, lingering look behind them, at the coffin which was soon to enclose their lost treasure, returned slowly and silently into the house.

"A COLLEGE—WAYS AND MEANS."

If admissible, it is desired to make a few suggestions upon the above subject. The main points in the article that calls this forth are well chosen, and are probably in accordance with the views entertained by most of those especially interested in the cause of education in our denomination. But the doings of the last Conference are again referred to in a manner that calls for an explanation; and a difference of opinion about ways and means, deemed of much importance, ought to be stated.

"The plan agreed on by the Committee of the Central Association, and laid before Conference," is supposed to have been "rejected after the deliberations of the oldest and wisest heads." Let it be distinctly understood, that the Conference rejected no plans. Their resolutions were designed in no sense to contain an embodiment of plans, but an embodiment of results to be secured. The plan from the Committee of the Central Association was regarded as very judicious, and one to which those from other Associations were not strangers; for it had been a matter of frequent discussion by many among us, most deeply interested in education, for a considerable time. Other plans were presented; yet, from whatever source they came, they all seemed to look to the same end—a College and Theological Seminary. It was believed, that if funds could be raised to support a Professor of Theology in connection with some one of our academies, or at any other place that might be ultimately selected for that purpose, a beginning would be made;—that if such a department were not really a Theological Seminary, it would yet be one in embryo, and would, at no distant day, attain to that distinction in full;—that whatever funds might be raised for aiding indigent young men to get an education, would, if permanent funds, be so much towards the final endowment of a College. The consummation of any one, or any combination of plans, presented to the Conference, would result in the same. What name should be given to the incipient step was not material. Whether it should be called an effort for founding and endowing a College and Seminary, or an effort for promoting our educational interests, was not of much consequence. The meaning would be the same. So the Conference judged, and they could come to no other conclusion. For ways, means, and plans, must have a centralizing object, else they are valueless. They are but the development of the conditions—the successive steps—for securing some particular object. The first thing, then, that the Conference were bound to ascertain, was, What do we, as a denomination, need in addition to our present educational facilities? In the decision of this question, there was no diversity of opinion. What was needed, and therefore what was wanted, was manifest. How to secure that object was not quite as evident, yet the plan of making it a gradual, progressive work, appeared the most feasible. The Conference, therefore, did precisely what they should have done, and evinced their good sense in so doing. They stated, in their resolutions, the end to be secured, and left the ways and means for farther consideration, and future action, when the views and wishes of the denomination should have been more generally ascertained. For the purpose of immediate action, however, they appointed a large committee, and empowered them to "labor to secure funds for educational purposes, hold annual sessions, and take such other means for the establishment of a College and Theological Seminary as they might deem proper, with the exception of locating the institution." Thus much again in justification of the doings of the last Conference.

Now to the difference of opinion about ways and means. "I would not ask," says our brother, "for an accumulation of standing funds, the interest only of which should be doled out to the needy." As a mere matter of experiment, it may be well, if it can be done, to secure annual contributions for a few years to sustain a single Professor of Theology; but it should be distinctly understood, that no such department can be established upon any permanent basis, until permanent funds shall be raised, the income alone of which shall be appropriated for the support of the professorships. Annual contributions for the objects of education have ever proved so fluctuating, that no reliance whatever can be placed upon them. It may be laid down as the result of uniform and universal experience, in all attempts at establishing free schools of any grado, that it can only be successfully done when such schools are sustained by the income of permanent funds. The same has been the result, whether States or Communities have made the attempt. And whatever State or Community, in establishing free schools, or a free school, shall disregard this fundamental principle, will be doomed to inevitable disappointment and failure. Now, a theological institution must be a free school. This is the uniform custom. And if we, as a denomination, intend to found such a school, however humble, and rely upon annual contributions to sustain it, we shall "fall from our high and ardent hopes into a slough of discouragements," from which it will require more than "twenty years of unremitting toil to recover us." This assertion comes not unsustained. Numerous instructive examples to the point in question, from the history of other denominations, could be adduced. Let their errors read us an important lesson. It should then be known by the denomination, at the outset, that we have not the remotest hope of founding a Theological School, even of a single professorship, without a permanent endowment. And to found one, even of a medium grade, will require at least $75,000, and to unite with it a College will require $75,000 more. And if this be not the end in view, then we ought not to commence. To begin by sustaining a single Professor of Theology for a few years by annual contributions, and make no advancement upon that, would be the hight of folly. To do this as a rallying point around which to build up a Seminary, strong, respectable, and permanent, would be eminently wise. It should be repeated, Let us know in the outset what is wanted, and what it is to cost; then let us fix our eye on the mark, and move firmly and steadily forward, and victory will as surely crown our efforts as we make the attempt. No half-hearted, spiritless, fearful mode of procedure, should characterize our efforts. We must build upon no "ideal premises," but must dig deep, and lay our foundations upon a broad and solid basis. The work may not progress as rapidly, but it will be done far more securely.

Again, our brother has given us several intimations of his "experience in trying to build up the breaches of reaction." Now it is most earnestly and respectfully asked, if quite too much is not made of that matter? Is it any thing very strange if, unexperienced as we were in our earlier educational movements, some injudicious steps may have been taken? And if such were the fact, is it wise to make it a subject of standing reference, to damp the feelings, and discourage action in all our future educational plans? To gather wisdom from the errors of the past, is undoubtedly our duty; but there is such a thing as "being wise beyond that which is written." But be it known, that our seminaries of learning have not proved a failure. As academies, they are conducted with an ability and success surpassed by the educational operations of no denomination in this or any other land. Our schools are managed with an energy and efficiency that does honor to the country and the age. No people on earth have more cause of gratitude, or more reasons for being encouraged by the prosperity of their institutions, than have the Seventh-day Baptists. We are positively doing a great work, and doing it well, too. And let no "cold, damp, death-like blast" come over our spirits, in the midst of the unexampled prosperity and success that is now marking the progress of our schools. This may sound a little like boasting; but the sober truth is no boast. We ought, therefore, to repose entire confidence in the institutions that we have, and be encouraged to attempt still greater things. It is admitted, that there has been some reaction, but it occurred because hopes were created that never could be realized. If funds for educational purposes are raised under the impression that they will yield annual dividends of large percentage, and if such dividends are not made, as they cannot be, stockholders will of course feel disappointed, and bring "railing accusations" about mismanagement, gullibility, &c. Upon this point we have experienced a reaction, and upon no other. But the contributors to educational funds should know at the beginning, that the dividends are never made in dollars and cents. Such funds should be made to yield a far more productive income—the income of immortal minds. The more money raised for the objects of education under any other impression, the worse it is.

Once more; our brother, in his former articles, argued the question against any direct effort for a College and Seminary. In his last, he has not only called for founding the Seminary, but has actually put in a plea for several colleges instead of one. If a "number of our academies should be endowed, or otherwise enabled to furnish facilities for thorough instruction equal to a full college course," they would be colleges in every thing but the name and the authority to grant diplomas. No academy can do this without a library of several thousand volumes, a large quantity of apparatus, and an ability to support a large and competent board of instruction. And when it has attained to that distinction, it might as well exchange its academic for a college charter. When all this shall have been done, true enough may it be said, that "no long circuit of means" will be required for founding a college. Surely, then the "wings of the electric dove" need not convey the message, "We are ready," but the glad intelligence, THE WORK IS DONE. Let our academies be cherished, and their numbers multiplied; but still we must toil long, and make many sacrifices, ere we get through the "intermediate passages" from the academy to the college.

THE EARLY DEAD.

It is not length of years that lends
The brightest loveliness to those Whose memory with our being blends,
Whose love within our bosom glows.

The age we honor standeth not
In locks of snow, or length of days;
But in a life which knows no spot,
A heart which heavenly wisdom sways.

For wisdom taught by heavenly truth,
Unlike mere worldly wisdom, finds
Its full maturity in youth,
Its antetype in infant minds.

Thus was this child made early wise—
Wise as those sages, who from far
Beheld at once in Bethlehem's skies
The new-born Savior's herald star.

No more could learning do for them
Than guide them in the path they trod;
And the same star of Bethlehem
Led this child's spirit to his God.

Well may his memory be dear
Whose loss is still its sole alloy—
Whose happy lot dries every tear,
With holy hope and humble joy.

"The brightest star in morning's host"
Is that which shines in twilight skies;
"Scarce ris'n, in brighter beams 'tis lost,"
And vanishes from mortal eyes.

Its loss inspires a brief regret;
Its loveliness is unforgot;
We know full well 'tis shining yet,
Although we may behold it not.

BRITISH BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY.

The fifty-first anniversary of this institution was held at Exeter Hall. The chairman drew attention to the fact that, in that country, there were no less than ten stamped newspapers of a decidedly Infidel tendency, whose circulation amounted to 11,700,000. Of unstamped publications of a similiar class, there were six, with circulation of 6,240,000. Of miscellaneous publications, no less than 10,400,000; and of the worst class of all there were 520,000 copies sold; making a total of 28,000,000 annually.

The report gives a rapid view of the operations of the society in almost all parts of the earth. The issues from the depository during the year have been 18,245,441; making the total circulation at home and abroad amount to about 423,000,000 in about 110 languages. The benevolent income has amounted to £5,094 6s. 2d; the grants to £8,150 8s. 6d. being £3,056 beyond the gratuitous receipts; the legacies have been £847, and the amount received for sales, £49,586 5s. 9d. The society's total receipts, including the sales, £61,327 8s. 8d; being an increase on the previous year of £1,832 5s. 5d.

LONDON CITY MISSION.

The fifteenth annual meeting of the London City Mission was held at Exeter Hall. Mr. Plumptre, M. P., occupied the chair.

The report begins with alluding to the prevalence of the cholera during a part of the year. Though only two of the missionaries fell victims to the disease, a very large number had severe seizures of the malady, and in no former year had the society so many missionaries disabled from its work by long and serious illness. The amount of work to be reported had been materially lessened by this. Exclusively of deaths in the union-houses of children, 5,018 adults had died upon the districts (from all causes), under constant visitation by the missionaries during their sickness; and 1,791 of these individuals (considerably more than one-third) had no Christian counsel or consolation in their last sickness and their dying hour, but through the agency of this society. The total number of visits to the sick and dying was 99,008. The committee had been enabled to add during the year twenty-eight to the number of their missionaries; the number now, therefore, was 242. The receipts for the year amounted to £20,320, being an increase of £1,251 upon the previous year; at the same time, the receipts had by no means increased with the expenditure. The committee had also received £235 for the disabled missionaries' fund. The total number of visits paid by the missionaries during the year was 1,018,436; tracts distributed, 1,197,953; number of meetings for prayer and familiar exposition of the Scriptures, 19,931, adults prevailed on regularly to attend public worship, 2,803; children sent to school, 5,168; individuals, through the missionaries' instrumentality, admitted to the Lord's Supper, 554; a large number of persons living together without marriage, had been shown their sin, and were now lawfully united; and in many instances this seemed to be the commencement of a course of honorable life, and had been received with great interest. Many new ragged schools had been formed by means of the agency of the missionaries. Of the 900 voluntary teachers in ragged schools, by far the greater proportion had been obtained by the missionaries' efforts.

THE VIOLET.

From the Salem Freeman.

The recent rains have brought up the small blue VIOLET, which may now be found modestly couching in wet and swampy places in the fields. This has always been a favorite flower, apparently on account of its lowly and unobtrusive beauty; and its praises have been sung upon the harps of countless bards. Barry Cornwall seems to express a common sentiment, when he says:

"I love all things the seasons bring,
All buds that start, all birds that sing,
All leaves from white to jet;
All the sweet words that summer sends,
When she recalls her flowery friends,
But chief—the Violet."

Bowring calls it "Spring's earliest, loveliest gem;" and Shakspeare, who has a word for everything, alludes to

"Violets dim,
Sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes
Or Cytherea's breath."

Another writer praises it thus:

"The rose may boast a richer hue,
May breathe as rich a fragrance too,
Yet let her yield to thee;
Not her's thy modesty of dress,
Not her's thy witching artlessness,
And these are more to me."

Twamley, an English writer, endeavors to show why the violet is so eagerly sought for and culled, and in doing so gives a good description of the flower:

"Not thy beauty's gift
Alone bids thee from thy bower be reft;
Not the half-closing, dewy, and deep blue eye;
But the charm that doth not with beauty die.
'Tis thy mild soft fragrance makes thee so dear,
Thou loveliest gem of the floral year!"

Ion, the Greek name of the violet, has been traced by some etymologists (says an author) to Ian, the daughter of Midas, who was betrothed to Ays, and changed by Diana into a Violet to hide her from Apollo. "The beautiful modest flower still retains the bashful timidity of the nymph, partly concealing herself amidst foilage from the glarish gaze of the sun."

There are many species of Violets. The one before us is the viola palmata, or palmated violet, so called on account of the resemblance of the leaves to an open hand. It is of a fine purple color, and possesses a slight odor, and is familiar to all ramblers. Several species of violets are cultivated in our gardens, amongst which may be mentioned the Heart's Ease, or Cupid's Delight, (viola tri-color), and the large flowering violet, (viola grandiflora), which has received much attention from florists, who with great labor have produced many large and elegant varieties, of nearly every hue, and of great ornament to our gardens in early spring or summer, and late in the fall.

FILIAL KINDNESS REWARDED.

Gustavus III., King of Sweden, passing one morning through a village in the neighborhood of his castle, observed a young peasant girl of interesting appearance, drawing water at a fountain by the way-side. He went up to her, and asked her for a draught. Without delay she lifted up her pitcher, and with artless simplicity put it to the lips of the monarch. Having satisfied his thirst, and courteously thanked his benefactress, he said, "My girl, if you would accompany me to Stockholm, I would endeavor to fix you in a more agreeable situation." "Ah, sir," replied the girl, "I cannot accept your proposal. I am not anxious to rise above the state of life in which the providence of God has placed me; but even if I were, I could not for an instant hesitate." "And why?" rejoined the King, somewhat surprised. "Because," answered the girl, coloring, "my mother is poor and sickly, and has no one but me to assist or comfort her under her many afflictions; and no earthly bribe could induce me to leave her, or to neglect the duties which affection requires from me."

"Where is your mother?" asked the monarch. "In that little cabin," replied the girl, pointing to a wretched hovel beside her.

The King, whose feelings were interested in favor of his companion, went in and beheld, stretched on a bedstead, and whose only covering was a little straw, an aged female weighed down with years, and sinking under infirmities. Moved at the sight, the monarch adressed her: "I am sorry, my poor woman, to find you in so destitute and afflicted a condition."

"Alas, sir," answered the venerable sufferer, "I should be indeed to be pitied had I not that kind and attentive girl, who labors to support me, and omits nothing she thinks can afford me relief—may a gracious God remember it to her for good," she added, wiping away a tear. Never, perhaps, was Gustavus more sensible than at that moment of the pleasure of possessing an exalted station; and, putting a purse into the hand of the young villager, he could only say, "Continue to take care of your mother; I shall soon enable you to do so more effectually. Good bye, my amiable girl, you may depend on the promise of your king." On his return to Stockholm, Gustavus settled a pension for life on the mother, with the reversion to her daughter at her death.

WHAT THE LITTLE EYES SAW.—John Condor, afterwards D. D., was born at Wimple in Cambridgeshire, June 3d, 1714. His grandfather, Richard Condor, kissed him, and, with tears in his eyes, said, "Who knows what sad days these little eyes are likely to see?" things wearing at that time a threatening aspect, relative to Dissenters. Dr. Condor remarked, upon mentioning the above circumstance, "These eyes have, for more than sixty years, seen nothing but goodness and mercy follow me and the churches of Christ, even to this day. His epitaph was:—

I have sinned.
I have repented. I have trusted.
I have loved. I rest.
I shall arise.
And, through the grace of Christ,
However unworthy,
I shall reign.

PERSECUTION OF PROTESTANTS IN HAYTI.

Several weeks ago we copied a letter written by a missionary in Hayti, showing that religious liberty has long been constitutionally guarantied and really enjoyed on that Island. We are sorry to have occasion to publish any thing of a different tenor. But a number of letters, written in April and May of the present year, by a missionary at Port-au-Prince, have just fallen into our hands, which materially change the face of things, and give a very painful account of the manner in which Protestants have of late been treated there.

It seems that when Soulouque wished to be crowned Emperor, with the imposing title of Faustin I., he thought it important to have the aid of some great dignitary of the Romish Church, and to secure this was willing to show considerable zeal for that church. The priests took advantage of the circumstance to urge on a persecution of the Protestants. They represented to the Emperor, that the Protestant religion was necessarily opposed to his reign—that the greater part of those who had recently become Protestants were persons who had lost friends in the bloody war of the last two years—that the Protestant movement was a political one, designed to draw away the people's hearts from the Haytien Government—that the missionaries were secret agents of other Governments, &c. At the same time they endeavored to prejudice the public against the Protestants by ridiculing their doctrines, and representing them in the most unfavorable light possible. Finally, a young man connected with the Wesleyan Mission attended service at the Romish Church one evening, when the priest spoke of the Bible in a very contemptuous manner. At the conclusion of the service, the young man fell into a discussion with several other young men on the character of the Bible. An officer who was present, and had been watching an opportunity, pounced upon him, beat him severely, had him taken to prison, and the next day, by order of the Emperor, he was placed on board a man-of-war. The next Sunday, a posse went to the Chapel of Mr. Bird, the Wesleyan Missionary, during class meeting, and took several persons, among whom was a Haytien Methodist preacher, the Director of the Wesleyan school, and three teachers. The preacher got clear, but the others were placed on board the man-of-war. Subsequently several other Wesleyans were placed on board. One, a mechanic, who was assisting to arrange the two thieves at Calvaire, noticing how the people knelt before them with as much reverence as before the image of Christ, took occasion to say, that they were only the images of two rogues; for which he was speedily placed in irons, and the next day sent on board the man-of-war, with instructions to keep him in irons. Another young man connected with the Baptist Mission was taken and disgracefully treated. The Governor told him that as he had unbaptized himself at the sea-side, he must be baptized over again; and accordingly he sprinkled him with holy water, and had salt placed in his mouth, a lighted candle by his head, &c., after which he was taken on board the man-of-war. An order was given that all of the prisoners should be beaten and put in irons; but it seems not to have been carried out, as, at the last accounts, they were treated with much leniency, and allowed to occupy quarters by themselves, where they held meetings for prayer, conversation, singing, &c. It is believed that they are thus bearing testimony for Christ and the Christian religion in a most useful and powerful manner.

While these things were going on, Mr. Green, the Commissioner sent out by the United States Government to settle claims against the Haytien Government, arrived. The Emperor appointed a Commissioner to meet him, and consider the questions with special reference to which he was appointed. When the last letter before us was closed, Mr. Bird of the Wesleyan Mission, and Mr. Judd of the Baptist Free Mission, had had one interview with Mr. Green, and were soon to have another. They considered him favorable to their wishes, and hoped that much good would result from his opportune visit.

MISSIONARY NEWS FROM CHINA.

The last English steamer brings letters from the Seventh-day Baptist missionaries at Shanghai, China, dated March 20, 1850, at which time they were enjoying good health, and cheerfully prosecuting their work. One of the letters says:—

"The most important national news is the death of the Emperor, Tank-Wang, which took place a month since. The Empire is in mourning, of course. This follows very suddenly upon the mourning for his mother, who died only a month before, and for whom the whole nation had to put on mourning, or, in other words, put off such garments or ornaments as had an uncongenial hue—all fancy colors being for the time denounced, and all shaving of the head forbidden for one hundred days. It is said that the fourth son of the Emperor succeeds him, but that is a question which may yet undergo discussion.

"As for religious news, we are still allowed to hope, that the dear heathen whose cases we have before recommended to you, are sincere and in earnest. Our man, Le-Chong, seems to be growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Brother Wardner's teacher seems also a growing Christian. Ne-May is firm as ever, and says, and the family say of her, that she remembers the Sabbath day, to keep it 'according to the commandment.' I have little hope that she will soon, if ever, go forward in baptism; but even that cross she may yet take up. Custom and natural timidity, together with the fact of her being betrothed, and of course very much limited in her power of voluntary action, are almost insurmountable obstacles in the way of a naturally sensitive and tenderly affectionate female. But we know not what grace, added to a strong love of right, may accomplish. We are on the best terms with the family, their only complaint being that I, who seem to have so little impediment in the way of visiting them, should not go oftener, and stay longer."

A NEW VERSION BIBLE SOCIETY.

In response to a Call, numerously signed and extensively published, the advocates of an amended version of the Bible held a meeting in New York, on the 10th inst., for the purpose of organizing a new Bible Society. Spencer H. Cone was called to the Chair, and E. S. Whitney was chosen Secretary; after which a statement was made of the circumstances under which the meeting was called, from which it appeared, that a number of influential Baptists, who have for some time past been laboring to procure a perfect version of the Scriptures, have recently held two or three meetings, and drafted a Constitution and Address, for the consideration of which they had called this meeting.

The Constitution was then presented and read. It confers upon the new Society the title of the "American Bible Union." It defines the objects of the "Union" to be, to procure and circulate the most faithful Version of the Sacred Scriptures in all languages throughout the world. It stipulates that the Union shall be composed of annual messengers, life-members, and life directors. Annual messengers may be sent by churches, or any other coöperative bodies, on the payment of TEN DOLLARS into the treasury of the Union; and they shall have all the privileges and powers of membership under the Constitution for one year. Life members shall be constituted such by the payment of THIRTY DOLLARS, and shall be entitled to speak and vote in all the meetings of the Union, subject only to the Constitution, and such rules of order as the Union shall adopt. Life directors shall be constituted such by the payment of ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS, and in addition to the rights of membership, shall be entitled to seats in the Board, with all the privileges of managers, except that of voting. Its remaining provisions relate to the appointment of officers, their duties, the times of holding meetings, &c.

The Address, which was introduced and read by Wm. H. Wyckoff, formerly Secretary of the American and Foreign Bible Society, sets forth the reasons for organizing a new Society at the present time. It states that there is no Society in this country whose acknowledged province and duty permit them "to attempt on their own part, or procure from others, a revision of the commonly received English version of the Scriptures;" and that it is with special reference to the application of the principle, The Bible fully and faithfully translated, that "we feel called upon in the providence of God, and we trust under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, to undertake the responsible but glorious enterprise of giving to all nations the word of life, translated as purely and plainly as possible into their vernacular tongues."

The Constitution and Address were adopted, and after some personal explanation by Mr. Cone, the following officers were unanimously elected:—

President—Spencer H. Cone, D. D.

Vice Presidents—Archibald Maclay, D. D.; Hon. Isaac Davis, Massachusetts; Rev. W. C. Duncan, New Orleans; Wm. Crane, Esq. Baltimore; Prof. Geo. W. Eaton, D. D., Hamilton, N. Y.; Hon. Thos. Swain, Pemberton, N. J.; Eli Kelly, New York; Rev. Alonzo Wheelock, New York.

Corresponding Secretary—W. H. Wyckoff.

Recording Secretary—E. S. Whitney.

Treasurer—Wm. Colgate.

Auditor—Sylvester Pier.

MANAGERS.

Geo. W. Abbe, Benj. M. Thompson, Thos. Armitage, Joseph W. Borden, Wm. S. Clapp, H. J. Eddy, Wm. Hillman, Wilson G. Hunt, Orrin B. Judd, John M. Ferrier, Samuel R. Kelly, Wm. D. Murphy, Eleazer Parmly, Jehiel Parmly, Peter F. Randolph, S. S. Relyea, Stephen Remington, John W. Sarles, Jas. M. Shaw, Ezra Smith, Thos. Thomas. Jas. H. Townsend, John B. Wells and, A. C. Wheat.

—In the evening a meeting of the Union was held, at which speeches were made by Messrs. Cone, Radford, Armitage, and others. When the audience had become pretty thoroughly roused, it was proposed to do something in the way of raising subscriptions, and before 10 o'clock forty-eight names were handed in for life-directorships at $100 each, and forty-one for life-memberships at $30 each, making an aggregate of $6030; besides which there was a very respectable general collection.

HEALTH OF DR. JUDSON.—Letters recently received, by overland mail, from Mr. Bennett of the Tavoy Mission, who had gone to Maulmain to recruit his shattered constitution, speak in a desponding tone of Dr. Judson's health. He was still at Maulmain, no favorable opportunity having yet presented for a sea voyage. His physical energies had not rallied in any perceptible degree, and Mr. Bennett expresses the firm conviction, that unless a change of air and scene is speedily secured, his recovery is hopeless.

PLAN TO RAISE AN EDUCATIONAL FUND.

ADDRESS of a Committee appointed by the Trustees of DeRuyter Institute, to the several Associations of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches:—

DEAR BRETHREN,—Among the many calls that the cause of Humanity and Truth make upon Christians of the present age, none appears to be founded more in reason and justice than that of general education. Indeed, no truth is more manifest, than that means for a thorough education should be placed within the reach of every young man and woman in our land. Much has already been done, by the benevolent and far seeing of our own Christian faith, who feel that the sword of truth, to be powerful, must be wielded by intelligence. But observation and experience have convinced this Committee, that much of the outlay already made is comparatively useless, for want of connecting with it means necessary to carry their benevolent designs into execution. Buildings have been erected, apparatus and libraries purchased, and able teachers employed; still a very large proportion, probably five-sixths, of the young people of this denomination are at home, and remain there, little wiser for all the provisions made for their special benefit.

One, and perhaps the greatest, obstacle to a general participation in learning, is the unequal distribution of property. While the young are the inmates of almost every home, the surplus means for educating them is a blessing of the few alone. Partial as this may at first sight appear, it is really no cause of complaint, when men are actuated by Christian principles; for Christians are to have "all things common." He who has a surplus is in duty bound to share it with the destitute, and "from him that would borrow of thee, turn thou not away."

We would call your attention to three classes of youth, whom we deem especially worthy the beneficence of the good:

First—To orphans. Bereaved as they are of parental sympathy and guidance, often at an early age, especially exposed to temptations, compelled to buffet the stormy sea of life alone, and, if destitute of a patrimony, as is usually the case, they have a claim upon us from which we may not easily divest ourselves. Aside from their personal claims, human happiness and the claims of truth call upon us to prepare them for entering the arena of active life able and zealous champions. Would the philanthropist, already far down the stream of time, leave behind him an active influence for good? How may he do it more effectually than by preparing the rising generation for usefulness, after he himself, having "fought the good fight, finished his course, and kept the faith, shall receive the crown which the Lord the righteous judge shall give him?"

Second—The children of our ministers of the Gospel, who are not in circumstances to give their families the advantages of a thorough education. Ministers and churches stand in a mutual relation. They devote their time and talents to us, and we in justice are bound to devote ourselves to their temporal wants as they do to our spiritual. Their children are destined to enter the world without money accumulated, by the industry and frugality of their parents, and if uneducated, too, their condition is far worse than any private member expects his children to be in. Brethren, is this fulfilling the great law, "Love thy neighbor as thyself?" Though our faithful, self-sacrificing minister, is too modest to ask us to provide for his children's education, his heart must bleed to reflect upon their condition, while he sees around him the sons and daughters of his parish growing up in the midst of plenty, and storing their minds with learning that must give them a great advantage over his own in coming time. Are we not behind our duty and privilege in this matter?

Third—The children of families, the victims of some calamity that keeps them in straitened circumstances. Among such families, much talent may be found, that should be brought out and made available in the promotion of God's cause.

We are very far from wishing to dictate to the Associations any particular mode of action, but respectfully ask to lay before them a few suggestions relative to a systematic plan of aiding those desirous of obtaining an education, who are worthy and need it. Two things occur to us as especially desirable—that a fund be obtained somewhat permanent, and that it may not be too great a burden upon the donors. The plan we would propose is simply as follows, (and though authorized to speak only in relation to DeRuyter Institute, it might, in our opinion, be advantageously adopted by our other academies.) Let every brother or sister who is willing to aid in this matter, obligate himself or herself to pay a certain sum annually to the Trustees of the Academy, said money to be loaned, without interest, to such young men and young women as the several Societies may recommend and the Trustees may approve, payable as soon as the borrower is able to do it, unless, in consequence of becoming missionaries, or from some other circumstance, the Trustees may think it proper to release them from all obligation to refund the money. In the course of five years a sufficient amount would be returned to give considerable aid to others who may then be anxious to avail themselves of it, and thus a perpetual fund will be established for the benefit of coming ages. Of the fund thus furnished, the Trustees shall determine the amount to be annually appropriated to each individual; and we would suggest, that not less than one year's consecutive attendance should entitle a student to its benefits.

This plan is not offered as any thing new or untried, as several Colleges and Academies in this country are in possession of funds raised in a similar way, and similarly managed. The Trustees of Harvard University, in their report on "pecuniary assistance to meritorious students," say: "There is a loan fund, raised a few years since by subscriptions among friends of the University, the interest of which, now amounting to about one thousand dollars, is annually distributed to meritorious students desirous of receiving it, in sums ranging from twenty to eighty dollars. Although it has been in operation but about ten years, one thousand dollars have been already added to the principal, by reimbursements to that extent." This one example, to which several others might be added, is sufficient proof of the practical working of the plan, which we would respectfully submit to your consideration. And, if it is approved, we desire you to pass resolutions to that effect, so that we may present the subject to our brethren under your approval.

DERUYTER, May 16th, 1850.

CALIFORNIA CORRESPONDENCE—No. 1.

ALCALDE'S OFFICE, Marysville,
April 9th, 1850.

Having disposed of our interest in the Hospital, I have taken advantage of a standing invitation from Capt. Niles, of the "Phœnix" steamer, and yesterday morning left the city in suspense from an expected overflow. Nearly six months have passed since we wended our slow and toilsome journey through this then wilderness, and I was anxious to see the progress which had been made in settlement, as well as reluctant to be a party in scenes similar to those of January. The steamer is a scow, decked over, with two small high-pressure engines, and a stern wheel. Taking a pair of blankets as my only baggage, I found myself, with about a dozen others, bound for the Upper Country. Just as we were about to start, a cart came down with a load of bricks and lumber. The freight paid was seven cents per pound, or about twenty-eight cents for each brick, for a distance of about sixty miles! Each passenger pays twenty dollars for transportation, with the privilege of sleeping room on deck furnished gratis. Until we reached the Feather River, there was not an acre of ground that was a foot above water, while thousands were entirely submerged, and the water was rising fast. About noon we witnessed the first thunder shower I have seen in California, or in fact since we crossed the line on the Atlantic.

Fremont, on the left bank of the Sacramento, opposite the mouth of the Feather River, where but a single house or two stood in September last, now has a population of about one hundred men. Vernon, on the opposite bank, has about an equal number, with several large frame buildings. The right bank of the Feather was above water, and presented a beautiful appearance, as far as the light of day would permit us to see it; but all that extent of country lying between the Sacramento and Feather rivers, as far as the Batte mountains, was one vast lake; and a large two-masted boat had got into it, mistaking it for the river, and was obliged to return ten miles to extricate itself and regain the channel. Nearly all the land on the rivers, not overflowed last winter, is laid out into town lots. Indeed, land speculation is the great rage here. Some one gets a claim, and divides it into shares at a thousand dollars each; these are taken quietly by influential capitalists, who at a given time draw for their respective shares, and the town is thrown into the market; a steamer is run to the place with goods and passengers—an excitement is produced, and is kept up until some new scheme comes forward, and the old one dies away.

Marysville—sometimes called Yubaville—is on the Yuba, just above its mouth. It is on an elevated plain, fifteen or twenty feet above high water, and came into notice about the time of the January flood. It consisted at that time of one adobe building, known as Nye's Ranch. It now has about three hundred houses, with an extensive trade, and is a very pleasant place. I have found here many who were invalids below, and have recovered rapidly in the more healthy atmosphere of this place. Lots that were sold here two months ago for $250, are now sold readily for $6,000. As soon as the snow leaves the mountains, the streams become fordable, and navigation on the Feather and all its tributaries ceases, even for small boats, until the rains of December again swell them. The famous towns must necessarily dry up also.

Owing to the high water on all the streams and ravines, there is nothing doing at the mines, and as a general thing men are no more than paying for their pork and flour—many are running in debt. Two friends of mine, merchants here, returned yesterday from the mountains, and report that from the quantity of snow and water it is probable there will be nothing done of consequence for two months to come. On Deer Creek, in some localities, they are taking out with quicksilver machines from five to seven pounds of gold a day, and yet others are doing nothing around them, while the hardships and exposure in the mountains made my friends very glad to get back into more comfortable quarters.

When I arrived here, I heard of a skirmish with Indians, in which there had been some fourteen killed. The facts, as near as I can learn, are these: A negro had seized the wife of an Indian, and kept her tied at his cabin. The outraged native went to take his wife, and was treated with violence. He afterwards returned with others of his tribe, the negro was killed, and the woman liberated. The whites in the vicinity raised a hue-and-cry, and dispatched a message to the fort; the officer refused to meddle with the affair, when the whites raised a party of twenty-six, and went out for revenge. My friends traveled with them a part of the way, but as their paths diverged they heard no more of them until their return, when they were told that the party found themselves unexpectedly surrounded by about four hundred warriors; that the chief told them that if they wanted fight they would fight, but if they would rather have peace they were ready for that; whereupon the valiant war party concluded to go home without a fight. Being a little ashamed, however, of the result, after so much "gassing," they invented the story of Indians killed to save their credit!

In many respects, these inoffensive Indians have a better claim to consideration than the whites. The Oregon men, in particular, are inhospitable to other whites, and remorselessly cruel to the natives. Revenge is not a trait in the character of the California Indians; they will fight in their own defense, but not from vindictiveness.

It is a time of general health throughout California. There can be no prettier country for a lover of the quietly beautiful than the vicinity of this place at this season. The whole region is a meadow of luxuriant grass, and thousands of cattle and horses, "fat and fair," are feeding among flowers as beautiful and varied as can be found in our eastern gardens. How often do I wish I could send a bouquet to grace your table. I shall take some pains to collect seeds, however, and introduce some new things to our gardens at home. J. D. B. S.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 3.

GLASGOW, May 31st, 1850.

Unexpectedly, the telegraphic announcement is, that Lord Ashley's motion in the House of Commons, last night, for an Address praying her Majesty to take measures for a discontinuance of Sunday mails and shutting of the Post Offices, was carried by a majority of 25. It was previously believed, that the state of the vote would be affected by the fact that the Lord Mayor's entertainment would withdraw from the discussion many of the members of the House of Commons. The motion was opposed by the Government; and it is really difficult to believe that, in the state of society in this country at present, such a measure can be carried into effect. It would require, not a stretch of charity, but a large amount of credulity, to believe that such measures have the hearty support of a majority of the community. Zealous leadership and thorough organization have produced an immense number of petitions to the legislature—petitions with an unprecedented number of signatures; but these do not truly indicate a greater respect for the Sunday—still less do they furnish evidence of increasing love to God and His law. Human creeds, and the traditions of apostate ages, are the idols of a class, numerous as compared with those who know and love the truth of God on account of its own purity; but this class is itself outnumbered by those who absolutely oppose or care for none of those things. And the infidel, ever eager, and often able to detect discrepancies, can see and proclaim, that in the efforts made in the name of religion there is often a renewing of the old wonder of straining at a gnat even while swallowing the camel. Much as has been urged against Sunday mails, little has been done for the suppression of the cabs and carriages used in ministering to the proud or pampering to the luxurious, which jostle on our streets on Sundays, passing to the churches of all denominations. Other forms, also, of Sunday desecration, which formerly were rarely heard of in Scotland at least, are now common. Connected with many of our large works, there are some of the men regularly at work on Sunday; and last night, at a meeting opposed to what is called "the sweating system," it was stated that many of the tailors of Glasgow are required to work at their trade on Sunday.

The Sunday desecration of the Continent has been often dwelt upon, and these desecrators have been unfairly dealt by. Travelers from Protestant countries look through colored spectacles or jaundiced eyes upon the scenes of Catholic lands. They forget that Rome makes no pretensions to a Reformation, which has not merely sanctioned Popish apostacy by retaining a substituted holiday for God's own Sabbath, but has also inserted that Popish holiday among the requirements of the Fourth Commandment. The poor infallible head of the Romish system was not invited to a seat in the Westminster Assembly, and neither he nor his votaries profess to hold by the Confession then made. If there, therefore, in any degree the Sunday be devoted to religious purposes, it is only so much as they have appointed, and not the "one whole day in seven" by which British Divines have thrust the Sabbath from its place. However shocked, therefore, the zealous Protestant may feel at the open theatres and stalls of Catholic countries after mass, he is not entitled to test their consciences by his traditional standard, when they acknowledge only a traditional standard of their own, of greater antiquity by far. But for us who deplore both these forms of apostacy, it is well to note what the nature of Sunday sanctification is under both. We therefore here chronicle the fact, that on Sunday, the 5th inst., in Switzerland, the Canton of Berne, (comprising, we believe, both Catholics and Calvinists,) elected their Members for the Grand Council or Legislative Assembly, when 70,000 votes were registered. There does, indeed, seem to be an awful prostitution of divine ordinances, not in Switzerland only, but also in Protestant Prussia. The London Christian Times' correspondent, in that paper of the 17th inst., states that, at the Spring sitting of the Synod of Neuchatel, petitions from one or two districts of the Jura were presented, praying for a discontinuance of the practice allowing all to become members of the church, "irrespective of religious conviction." Recording the fact, the writer to whom I refer states that the Synod appointed a Commission to examine the petitions and report; but strongly expresses his disbelief that the National Church will concede the point desired. Formerly, he says, it was compulsory, by civil law, that young men and young women should take the communion before entering upon the occupations of life, or the privileges of citizenship; and although this is no longer legally obligatory at Neuchatel, and in most of the Protestant Cantons of Switzerland, it still continues to be the custom. This writer, referring to the old Canons of the Church of England, requiring that every parishioner communicate thrice a year, "under the penalty and danger of the law," and the special injunctions to ecclesiastical visitors to seek out and punish all who maliciously abstain from the holy communion, adds, that "until within the last two years, a certificate of having taken the first communion was necessary in Neuchatel in order to be married. So completely was this holy ordinance become a registry of age, that until the present King of Prussia abolished the system of licensing prostitutes in Berlin, no unfortunate female could receive the patent for the exercise of her infamous vocation without exhibiting the clergyman's certificate that she had been duly received to the holy communion." Well, indeed, may he therefore say, (notwithstanding that this law was designed as a protection for younger women,) that "the system of hereditary Christianity has been carried out to nearly as fearful an extent by the Reformed as by the Lutheran churches of the Continent."

Again has the Bishop of Exeter been defeated, in his plea against Mr. Gorham. The Court of Common Pleas have unanimously determined, that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and not the Upper House of Convocation, was the proper authority for determining whether it was necessary for Mr. G. to believe in Baptismal Regeneration. The reading of the judgment by the Lord Chief Justice occupied an hour and a half. It must be very mortifying to a Bishop of such views, temper, and arrogance, as Philpots is known to possess, to be so thwarted in his purposes by laymen. But a far greater evil it is, to see the faith of a church regulated by Courts composed of men who are or who may be wholly destitute even of any pretension to religion. And yet, marvelous to say, the adherents of this State-ridden church complacently [illegible]lk of her apostolicity! One result of all such proceedings as that now again decided, is to convince some, at least, that those within her pale are deprived of not a little of the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. Mr. Gorham's son has publicly contradicted a report which had been put into circulation that he, being strongly inclined to Puseyism, had become a thorn in his father's side for his rejection of the high church dogmas. He speaks in terms of filial affection and regard for his father, as conscientiously maintaining what he believes to be the truth of God.

Mortifications and alarms thicken upon the Church of England, just as she had begun to assume a bearing of greater arrogance. Her champions have been roused to greater wrath by an intimation of Lord John Russell, in Parliament, that he is disposed to advise the Crown to issue a Commission of Inquiry into the affairs of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The ruling authorities of these institutions are said to be preparing strong remonstrances; but this alarm is perhaps more unequivocally evinced by the fact that the Duke of Wellington intimates that they are anxious to introduce such improvements as are practicable and useful. Hitherto they have displayed but little of this anxiety for practicable and useful improvement; and it is to be feared that, however zealously they may now labor in that department, they will get but little credit from Dissenters for a willing mind.

In God's mercy, we have at present delightful weather, and the country generally is in a satisfactory state—vegetation making rapid progress. The repeal of our corn laws has rendered necessary, on the part of agriculturists, improvements in farming. This has stimulated investigation into principle, and suggested the importance of plans for economy. Genuine guano is an expensive manure, and that which is adulterated (for there are manufactories near London, and perhaps in other places also, where a spurious article is manufactured from loam) is still less economical. Those who are wisest urge greater protection of the dung-heap, that its liquid treasures be not permitted to ooze away, nor the virtue of its solids be evaporated by the atmosphere. Prince Albert, who is said to be a good scientific farmer, has just suggested the employment of filters for town sewers, of a kind likely to serve the double purpose of sanatory improvement and agricultural advancement. Its construction I may give in my next communication. J. A. BEGG.

EDITORIAL CHANGE.—With the last issue of the New York Recorder, the Baptist paper of this city, Rev. S. S. Cutting retired from the editorial chair, to assume the office of Secretary of the American and Foreign Bible Society. He is to be succeeded by Prof. M. B. Anderson, late Professor of Rhetoric and History in Waterville College, Maine, who, though comparatively a young man, has sustained a high position as one of the Faculty of the College for the last seven years, and is said to be a fine scholar and able writer.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. FOURTH-DAY, June 12.

After disposing of a large amount of morning business, and passing a bill granting swamp lands to the States in which they lie for reclamation, the Senate took up the Compromise Bill. Mr. Dayton concluded his speech, and Mr. Benton withdrew his motion to postpone the subject till the 4th of March next, in order that the Senate might vote on some of the amendments which had been proposed to the bill. The amendment of Mr. Douglas in regard to the northern boundary of Texas, proposing to run a line drawn due east from the Rio Grande, from the south end of the junction of the Dead to the Red River, thence to the center of said river, also fixing the dividing ridge of the mountains separating the waters of the Rio Grande and the Gila, as the western boundary of Texas, was discussed at some length, and, after being modified, was rejected. No other vote was taken.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Soon after opening, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the California Bill. The Southern portion of the House labored hard, as on the previous day, to prevent any direct vote upon the Bill.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, June 13.

Mr. Chase presented a memorial of citizens of Ohio, against the passage of the Compromise Bill, and said that the letter communicating the paper stated that it expressed the sentiment of nineteen-twentieths of the people of that State.

Mr. Bright could not understand how the sentiment of Ohio differed so much from that of Indiana. He had just received a letter, stating that a grand jury in Indiana, composed of the most respectable citizens, at the close of their labors, drew up a report embodying their views in favor of the Compromise bill, which was received by the Court and ordered to be entered upon its record.

Mr. Clay presented resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of citizens of St. Louis, Missouri, in favor of the Compromise bill, which he accompanied by a few remarks.

Mr. Benton briefly replied, intimating that the resolutions did not represent the sentiments of the majority of the people of St. Louis, and that the meeting, though called a mass meeting, was composed of small numbers.

After disposing of morning business, the Compromise bill was taken up, and remarks were made by Messrs. Webster, Seward, Clemens, Clay, Foote, Benton, Hale, and others, in the course of which were sundry sharp passages at arms between grave Senators. The question was on the amendment of Mr. Turney to strike out the 39th section of the bill, being that portion relative to the boundary of Texas. No vote was taken. The session closed with a very exciting scene between Messrs. Benton and Clay, both Senators being called to order for personal remarks.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House was the scene of much confusion, of the same general character as had been witnessed the two preceding days. The California Bill came up, the amendment pending being to extend the Missouri Compromise line to the Pacific, and to fix the boundaries of California accordingly. Several amendments were offered for the purpose of making speeches upon them, and withdrawn when this object was attained. The only amendment voted on was that of Mr. Stanton, of Tennessee, declaring that it shall be no objection to the admission of any State (to be hereafter formed out of Territory south of 36° 30′) that the Constitution of such State may sanction slavery, which was rejected, 78 to 89.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, June 14.

The Senate, after voting, 17 to 28, not to adjourn over till Monday, took up the Compromise bill, and rejected the amendment of Mr. Clemens to pay Texas one million of dollars for her claim to the disputed territory, 8 to 30. The question then recurring on Mr. Turney's amendment, to strike out the entire section in regard to the boundary of Texas, the subject was discussed by Messrs. King, Butler, Rusk, Hale, Berrien and Benton, and was finally rejected by a majority of 24 to 27.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. McClernand, from the Committee on Federal Relations, reported a bill amendatory of the act to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and the Ottoman Porte. Mr. Buel, from the same committee, reported a bill granting indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800. Both bills were committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Bayly, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported appropriation bills for the Post Office and Indian Departments, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1851; also a bill to supply deficiencies in the Judicial Department of the Government for the year ending the 30th of the present month. The House went into Committee of the Whole, and the California question being in order was put aside, and the Judicial Deficiency bill taken up. After a sharp discussion the Committee rose, and the bill was passed.

IN SENATE. SEVENTH-DAY, June 15.

Several resolutions of inquiry were submitted; the joint resolution to refund several States what they advanced for Mexican volunteers was passed, and the Senate agreed to adjourn over from Fifth-day next to the following Second-day.

The Compromise bill was taken up. Mr. Soule moved as an amendment to the bill, that when Utah and New-Mexico shall be ready to come into the Union, they shall be admitted either as Free or Slave States. On this there was an animated debate, in the course of which Messrs. Clay and Foote opposed the amendment as calculated to embarrass the bill, and Messrs. Berrien, Underwood and Badger advocated it, as calculated to re-assure the South and exercise a composing effect upon the whole country. No vote was taken.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The consideration of the California bill was resumed. Mr. Inge moved, that whenever the people of any portion of the territories shall form a State Constitution, they may or may not exclude slavery, but whatever they do in that respect shall not be a bar to admission to the Union. On this any number of five-minute speeches were made, but no vote taken.

PRISON STATISTICS.

The Prison Statistics Society recently held its 25th annual meeting in Boston, when the usual reports were presented, officers for the ensuing year elected, &c. The Treasurer stated that the receipts of the Society during the year had amounted to $3,583, and its expenditures to $2.717. The Society has a permanent fund of $7,041. The following statistics, drawn from the report of the managers, were arranged for the Boston papers:—

The documents and reports received during the year by the Society, have been more numerous and valuable than during the previous year. The usual statistical information was communicated respecting the prisoners in different penitentiaries. The number in 18 penitentiaries at the commencement of the year was 3,533, and the number at the close of the year 3,689. Received 1,557; discharged on expiration of sentence 853, by pardon 265, by death 211, of whom 116 died of cholera in the Penitentiary of Columbus, Ohio, leaving only 95 as having died in that and the other penitentiaries from ordinary causes, which is about 1 in 40 of the average number. There were 9 escapes from 4 penitentiaries, and none from 14. There were thus, as will be seen, 3,689 prisoners at the close of the year, in 18 penitentiaries. In 13 penitentiaries in 1848, including all the principal penitentiaries in the country, the number was 3,723, showing a decrease of 34. The Reports also furnished the interesting results of several Houses of Refuge and Reformation. In the four houses at Westfield, Mass., New York city, Rochester, N. Y., and Philadelphia, the number of juvenile delinquents at the commencement of the year was 576, at the close 909. Received during the year 839. Discharged 506—of whom by apprenticeship 303. Rejected as improper subjects or returned to friends, 129. Death 10, or 1 in 70. Escaped 5. Receipts for current expenses and improvements, $132,962. Payments for current expenses $63,909.

The report also noticed Lunatic Asylums, the heating and ventilation of public buildings, and the structure of prisons and almshouses. Under the last head, was shown especially the progress and utility of the Society during the year. Immigration, kindred societies, and discharged convicts, were likewise noticed, on which subjects the documents were numerous and important.

DIFFICULTY WITH SPAIN.—Much paper and ink have been wasted within a week past in speculation about the chances of a war between Spain and the United States. It seems that soon after the affray of Gen. Lopez at Cardenas, the Spanish war steamer Pizarro captured two American vessels, (the Georgiana and the Susan Louds,) made prisoners of all on board, and took them to Havana for trial, on the charge of being connected with the expedition for the invasion of Cuba. Officers of the American Government learning that the vessels were not bound for Cuba, but for Chagres, and that the only evidence against them was their having rendezvoused with the Creole at the Island of Contoy, immediately demanded their release. The Captain-General of Cuba refused to release them, and declared his determination to try them by Spanish laws. Mr. Clayton, the Secretary of State then sent a dispatch to our Consul at Havana, making an unqualified demand for the prisoners, and assuring the Spanish authorities, that in case of refusal, war would at once be declared against Spain. Before this message reached Cuba, however, we have a telegraphic announcement from New Orleans, dated June 15, to the effect that intelligence has been received there from Havana as late as the 10th inst., and that the Spanish Government had yielded to the representations of our Consul, aided by other American authorities, and after passing through the forms of a trial, had liberated the American prisoners, who were free to return to the United States. So the matter is considered at an end.

CASE OF PROF. WEBSTER.—At Boston, on the 13th inst., the application for a Writ of Error in the case of Prof. Webster, came before a full bench of the Supreme Court. The points raised were, that the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction in the case and had no right to try Webster—that neither judgment nor sentence were in accordance with the requirements of the Statute—that no record of the ordering of the case to the Supreme Court by the Municipal Court appears—that legal service of indictment does not appear to have been made—that the sentence was not in accordance with the Statute, in saying that said Webster should be taken from the jail, whence he came, and thence to the place of execution, which is in the precincts of the jail—that the Municipal Court not having performed the proper primary proceedings in the case, the Supreme Court had not yet acquired jurisdiction—that the Supreme Court had not yet been furnished with records of the Municipal Court in the case, the simple endorsement of the Clerk of the Municipal Court upon the indictment not being sufficient to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction. In an affidavit affixed to the writ of error petition, Prof. Webster tells the Court, that he is not influenced by any desire to delay the execution of judgment by this movement, but, by the advice of his counsel, that the errors presented are of such grave importance that it was proper they should be brought before the Court. The case was argued at length by C. B. Goodrich and Judge Merrick for the petitioner, and the Attorney-General and Mr. B. Ennis for Government. The Attorney-General closed an eloquent argument by saying that the promotion of public justice was an important matter. The prisoner had had a jury trial, and he emphatically inquired whether he should be permitted to come in now and reverse that judgment. Mr. Merrick closed by saying that they did not come to ask any peculiar favor for the prisoner, but if there had been any error in the proceedings the prisoner had a right to avail himself of it. The decision of the Court will be given in a few days.

EARTHQUAKE AT SMYRNA, TURKEY.—Smyrna has been in a state of consternation in consequence of continuous shocks of earthquake. Thousands of persons have fled from their homes, and were lodged in the open air, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, and others had taken refuge in the vessels lying in the harbor. The Greek Church, the Armenian College, and the Austrian Consulate, and several mosques, were greatly injured, and part of the city was thrown down; a large rocky mountain, about four miles from the city, has been rent; huge masses of rock have been dislodged, and in their fall have hurled down trees that have stood for centuries, and overwhelmed a part of the city. The river has been forced from its channel and the water suddenly become brackish. All the hills surrounding the harbor are full of fissures. Prayers to Almighty God to arrest further evil are being put up in all the churches. It appears that the earthquake has traversed the whole of the Archipelago, and may be traced to the utmost boundaries of Carminia.

THE HUNGARIAN REFUGEES IN TURKEY.—The N. Y. Tribune says that a great number of the Hungarian refugees now in Turkey are in a condition of extreme want and suffering. Those who, driven by starvation and misery, have apostatized from their religion, have been provided for by the Turkish Government, while such as still adhere to the Christian faith are utterly destitute, and with no resource except the small and now exhausted contributions of private charity. They are indeed not the leaders of the Magyars who are thus afflicted; Kossuth and the more prominent men, in compliance with the contract made with the Austrian Government, are kept as prisoners in the interior of Asia Minor, and of course taken care of by the Government which subjects them to restraint. The real sufferers are subaltern officers and private soldiers who escaped into Turkey with the rest and have been set at liberty by the Porte.

A RELIC.—Mr. E. B. Thompson of this city, and now a compositor in the office of this paper, says the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer, has in his possession a very interesting historical relic; a small embroidered cambric pocket-handkerchief, which was used by Charles I. upon the scaffold, and is stained with his blood. It came originally from John Fenwicke, who was Major of cavalry in Cromwell's army, and in that capacity was required to be present at the execution of the unhappy monarch. The relic passed from his family to that of Jacob Lyell, whose wife emigrated to New-Jersey near the close of the 17th century, and was connected with the Fenwicke family. She gave it to her daughters, who kept it with the greatest care, and at their death it passed into another branch of the family, and has finally come into possession of Mr. Thompson. Its authenticity seems to be clearly traced and proven beyond doubt. The handkerchief is of small size, and the figure of the Scottish thistle is embroidered around the edges. Upon one corner is a very small figure of a crown. It is thickly stained with dark spots, some of which are as large as a dollar—the others smaller. The linen is considerably discolored by time. It seems to have been ironed, but not washed.

MARYLAND SLAVES.—A Baltimore correspondent of the Washington Union, says that a meeting of the slaveholders of Queen Ann's county, was held at Centreville a few days since, for the purpose of organizing a society to protect slave property, on account of the numerous depredations that have been made by the abolitionists recently in that vicinity. Officers were elected, and a constitution adopted, and measures taken for immediately commencing operations. The number of slaves weekly lost from the border counties of Maryland is estimated to be equal to $10,000 in value, and the most efficient organization will be necessary to prevent its increase. That they receive money, arms, and directions from the Abolitionists, there is no manner of doubt; and, after they cross the line, places of concealment are provided for them, with all the "aid and comfort" necessary to enable them to elude pursuit. The recent stampede of sixteen slaves belonging to Col. Pearce, from Baltimore county, and their arrest near Shrewsbury, Penn., proved this beyond a doubt. A reward of $2,000 discovered their hiding place, in one of the out-houses of a farmer in the vicinity. They were carried home without waiting for legal process.

NATIONAL TAXATION.—The following table of Comparative Taxation originated, we believe, in the last Edinburgh Review:—

FULTON HOTEL—JOHNSON AND ROGERS.—We see, quite often, notices of Eating and Lodging-houses, in the columns of our contemporaries, but have not yet met with one of the Fulton Hotel. This to us is an extraordinary omission, for we have no hesitation in saying, that there is not in this city any six story Lodging-house with a four story back building, that does or can surpass No. 144 Fulton street, in neatness and comfort. We have traveled not a little, and have inspected various Lodging-establishments in this city, and we say emphatically, that the traveler cannot be better accommodated than at the Fulton, any where; and if sick, he is sure of kindness and attention, which are rarely elsewhere to be had—the general rule being, so much money, and there is your room. At the Fulton, the bedsteads and beds, and the furniture are not only sweet and clean, but you have a comfortable parlor in which to read and write; and below you can have whatever to eat you may desire properly cooked. You can get a glass of ale, or porter, or claret wine, but you cannot get brandy or rum. It is no rowdy, riotous establishment, but a quiet, orderly place, such as travelers covet. Try it. [Examiner, N.Y.

INSANITY AND HOMICIDE.—The Jacksonville (Ill.) Journal of the 31st ult. says: On Wednesday last, Mr. Thomas Kirnan, Jr., in a paroxysm of insanity, took the life of his wife in the most horrible manner. He was seen pursuing her with an uplifted ax, but before he could be restrained, had stricken her down and chopped up her head in the most terrible manner, killing her instantly. He had previously pursued some girls with the uplifted ax, and on his wife attempting to direct them how to escape, he turned his rage upon her. After her death he pursued a gentleman who came near, with the same bloody ax, and was only finally secured with great difficulty. When taken, he exhibited the appearance more of some ferocious wild beast than a man—his eyes glaring wildly about, and a thick foam issuing from his mouth. After some time he became comparatively calm, acknowledge the destruction of his wife, and appeared to think he had done nothing amiss. All accounts concur in stating that Mr. Kirnan and his wife had lived very happily together; and it is said that in his attacks of the terrible malady heretofore, her voice alone had power to control him. She has now become his victim, and left an interesting family to deplore her loss.

THE SOUTHERN CONVENTION.—The Convention at Nashville adjourned on the 13th inst., after a nine-days session, to meet again six weeks after the adjournment of the present session of Congress. There was considerable excitement among its members during the last two or three days, as was natural to expect in such an assemblage of the chivalry. They succeeded, however, in framing an Address for which the majority could vote, only eight protesting against it.

SUMMARY.

The Connecticut River Bank at Charleston, N. H., was robbed of $15,000 in gold, silver and bills, on Tuesday night, June 11th, by means of false keys, powerful burglars tools and gunpowder. On Wednesday, at Marlowabout, about 20 miles distant from the scene of the robbery, a strange team was found containing the whole of the stolen money, not a dollar being gone. The thieves are supposed to have abandoned their plunder through fright.

The whale ship Coral, Capt. Seabury, from the Pacific Ocean, arrived at New Bedford on the 12th inst. with a cargo of 3,000 barrels of sperm oil, which, at the present prices, is valued at about $113,000. The Coral has been absent from port about three years and a half. This is said to be the most valuable cargo of sperm oil ever entered in one vessel at any port in the world.

A Sandwich Island paper of March 16 says: By the arrival on Sunday last, passengers and the mail came through from New-York in 51 days, and answers were received to letters written from here but four months ago. This is something like, and foreshadows coming events, we trust. Our dates are from New York to January 17, and from England to December 29, France, 27th

A new Cemetery was dedicated at Utica on the 14th inst. About ten thousand persons were present at the dedication, among whom were 400 Indians of the Oneida and Onondaga tribes. The sacred stone of the Oneidas was placed in the centre of the cemetery. An eloquent address was delivered by William Tracy, Esq. The cemetery contains about fifty acres.

The House of Representatives at Washington adjourned on Friday at 5 o'clock, P. M; the report of the day's proceedings was made up and transmitted over Bain's Electro-Chemical Telegraph to Boston, and put in type by half-past seven o'clock, both only two hours and a half. There were about eleven hundred words in the report.

A trotting match against time, of one hundred miles within ten hours in harness, for a purse of $1,000, came off recently at the Centreville Course. At twenty minutes past 8 o'clock the start was made, and the fete was accomplished in nine hours and forty-nine and three quarter mintes—or ten and a quarter minutes within the stipulated time.

A drought of extreme severity has been prevailing at Antigua for several months. Not since the year 1837 have the people and the stock throughout the island experienced such privations from the want of water as they are now suffering.

The boiler in Johnston & Morton's saw mill, at Fulton, O, exploded on the 8th inst. The building was made a wreck, and several persons severely injured. One of them, named Hayman, is not expected to survive.

The Steubenville Herald reports a trial in court, in which John Evans recovered $2,000 damages against John Powell, a merchant sixty years of age, for the seduction of the daughter of the plaintiff, not 13 years of age.

A public meeting was to be held at St. Louis on the 8th instant, to provide aid in the foundation of a Hungarian Colony in the West. Gov. Ujhazy and his companions were to be present.

A man whose Christian name is Patrick, came to his death, in Brooklyn, on Saturday afternoon last, in consequence of falling from the topmast of the schooner Abraham Osborn.

A daring attempt was made on Friday night last to rob the Mattapan Bank, Dorchester. The robbers fired a pistol at the Bank watchman, and the ball passed through his hat. The watchman fired in return, when the robbers fled, leaving a lot of skeleton keys in the road. The watchman gave chase, when the robbers faced about, and threatened to shoot him if he advanced. One of the robbers was wounded, and when they left his companions were obliged to lift him into a buggy wagon.

A wealthy farmer by the name of Gay, living near Stockport Landing, Columbia Co., N. Y., recently strangled himself by placing his neck between the branches of a tree in his orchard. It seems that the Hudson River Railroad is to run through his farm. He expected to receive $3,000 for the land he was to surrender to the company, but his neighbors advised him to settle for $1,000. To this he finally consented, went to Hudson and obtained his money, and, immediately on his return, terminated hss existence.

The completion of the Erie Railroad to Lake Erie is now secure beyond peradventure. The contracts were made on the 12th of June, the money was secured by the sale of two and a half millions of income bonds, which, with the million to be issued to contractors, will be sufficient to finish the great work.

The whole inside of a church in Greenwich, N. Y., was blown out one day last week, by an explosion of gunpowder placed underneath it. The hearse house was burnt also, with the hearse within it. These outrages are supposed to have originated in revenge upon temperance movements.

By the late freshet in the Kennebec river, five large buildings on the river, filled with ice, were upset, and the contents carried away by the flood, leaving but a small quantity for shipment on the Kennebec.

"The Southern Press," the organ of the slaveholders at Washington, makes its appearance this week.

The New York State Temperance Society holds its anniversary at Syracuse to-day, June 20th.

Remittances to the Philadelphia Mint of California gold dust are now returned in coin in about ten days.

The new crop is arriving; about 20,000 lbs. of all grades, in small lots, have come to hand, and a portion has been sold at about the closing rates of last season; the precise terms have not been told. In the country an advance of 3 a 4c. per lb. is asked on the opening prices of last year.

MARRIED.

In Alfred, N. Y., June 1st, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. GEORGE W. POST to Miss MARY E. CRANDALL, all of Alfred.

DIED.

In Alfred, N. Y., May 10th, MARILLA STILLMAN, wife of Rowse Stillman, and sister of Bro. Solomon Carpenter, missionary to China, in the fifty-first year of her age. She was a member of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred.

At his residence in Swedesboro, N. J., on the 28th day of May, Mr. JOSEPH JENNINGS, formerly of Somersetshire, England, in the 76th year of his age. Mr. Jennings came to the United States a number of years since, with a small fortune, which he had invested in merchandize, and which, on landing in Philadelphia, he disposed of so as to retain a comfortable independence for himself, and with which to assist others who like himself were disposed to exchange a residence in the old world for one in the new. For this purpose he established an Emigrant Office in the city of New York, where he imparted such information as would enable emigrants, on arriving in this country, to obtain a location, or lands to suit their circumstances, without delay or disappointment. In this work he labored hard for a long time, without compensation, and there are doubtless many living who remember these benevolent services for their accommodation. Mr. Jennings became a Seventh-day Baptist about twelve years ago, but for some reason never connected himself with any church of the denomination. In 1842, he published a pamphlet on Episcopal Pretensions, in which he reviewed a sermon of Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, and exhibited his own views to some extent He leaves a wife and an interesting family of children to mourn his departure. Eclectic Magazine for the Year 1850.

THE Eclectic Magazine of Foreign Literature, Science, and Art, aims to present to its readers a complete survey of the whole field of British Periodical Literature, comprising the selections of all the articles of the most able and celebrated Reveiws, Magazines, and Journals, which have any interest or value to American readers. It not only contains the articles which are desirable in those periodicals reprinted in this country, but in the far greater variety of able and popular Reveiws, Magazines, &c., which form so splendid an element of the literature of the day, and which are inaccessible to the mass of American readers, except by some such medium as the Eclectic Magazine. By omitting what is merely local in interest or feeble in character, the ample size of the Eclectic Magazine enables the editor to embody all that is really desirable in the whole range of journalism. As only the best articles of each periodical are selected, it is evident that the contents of the Eclectic Magazine must be superior to those of any one, however great or celebrated; and, taken together, must constitute a more desirable and able body of periodical literature than can be found elsewhere in the same compass.

Each number is embellished with a suberb steel engraving, from the well-known burin of Mr. Sartain; of subjects of elevated character and general interest, including portraits of distinguished living authors and celebrities, making twelve rich and elegant prints in a year.

TERMS.

The Eclectic Magazine is issued on the first of every month, in numbers of 144 large 8vo. pages each, on fine paper, making three volumes a year, with title-pages and indexes. Price $5 per year, if paid strictly in advance—otherwise invariably $6.

Miscellaneous.

MRS. SWISSHELM ON SLAVERY.

"It was ourself, Mrs. Swisshelm, not Mr. Riddle, who was threatened with a coat of tar and feathers in Kentucky, and this not for delivering a stump speech—at that time we had not written a line for publication, and as little supposed we ever should, as that we should deliver a public lecture on any subject. It was for expressing our opinion in a parlor, in presence of a dozen persons, most of them gentlemen, and when our opinion had been asked; but it was not a Southron who uttered the chivalrous threat: It was a renegade Philadelphian, who volunteered to act spaniel on the occasion. Some Kentuckians agreed with him, that we were actually in danger of personal violence; and a Mississippian apologized for the hazard which he admitted to exist, on the ground that there was actual danger to the permanency of their institutions, if persons were permitted to express such opinions as we did. We told him, in answer, that if their institutions stood on such a rotten foundation that a woman's breath could blow them over, they had better stand from under, lest the fabric should fall and crush them. We made it a point never to force our opinions upon any one, but when it was inquired how we liked the place, as every Kentuckian was sure to do, we told him plainly, and never, but in one instance, met with rudeness. From that short residence in Louisville, we formed our opinion of Slavery, and could never tell half how much we hate it. Almost every one admits it to be an evil, and Southern Legislators must be very poor managers, when they cannot devise some way of removing it.

"We were young when there, in appearance not more than eighteen, and had been brought up in a country village, where we had fancied ourself somewhat of a belle and beauty. We had run wild in the woods, with company or without, as suited our fancy, talked philosophy with our beau, if we had one, or gave him a bit of sugar and bade him go home, as suited our fancy; and nobody questioned our right to do so. But when we went South we were enslaved, imprisoned, fenced up by a set of conventional rules that they told us were the result of their peculiar institutions. We dare not go to the pump to drink if we had to suffer ever so much for thirst, in waiting until the servants came in. Our hostess, a Kentucky lady of the old school, would have tied us to the bed-post first. We might walk alone in daylight in any place in the square bounded by Market and Walnut streets, First and Eighth; but the suburbs, with its beautiful walks, groves and private residences, was forbidden ground. When the sun was fairly down, we were forbidden by our hostess to go to the door without a protector, or outside of this charmed square with one. We could not go out of doors without being stared out of countenance by Kentucky gallantry. Our hostess said it was because the gentlemen had nothing to do, knew we were a stranger, and looked like a grown up baby. We dare not go to housekeeping, and do our work, for, oh lack-a-day, a white woman to work! Nobody but the Dutch did that. We almost wished to be Dutch, or to be black, or to be anything that would make us less a slave. What a time we put in, like a squirrel in a flour barrel, and how intensely we learned to berate your institutions.

"A few days after our arrival, a gentleman came to our boarding house and took rooms for himself and wife. When they came, whispers were circulated in all parts of the house, as to the probability of their being married. We were overwhelmed with astonishment, but soon got used to such surmises about every stranger; and learned after a while that we had been taken for a runaway school girl, and our bigger half for a runaway school girl, and our bigger half for a stray German Baron, Spanish Smuggler, or Texan Ranger, who was hiding from some of his t'other wives. One could not go out or come in, look out of a window or stand in a door, for fear some gesture would be construed into some masonic sign to somebody. The neighbor over the way, who lived in the handsome brick house with double parlors, had a great big ugly black woman for his wife, and was raising a family of his own children for sale.

"That nabob a little up the street, had a family of dark brunette daughters, and just as many blonds. To each one of the blonds he had presented one of the brunettes, just as he would have presented ponies. The mother of the dark girls, who were by far the handsomer, he had sold at auction for eight hundred dollars.

"Nothing appeared so thoroughly disgraceful as work. This was the business of slaves; and it appeared generally conceded, that a white woman would secretly sell her honor rather than submit to the disgrace of working for a living. Certainly hundreds did so; for it was reckoned there were seven hundred women in the city who were utterly abandoned. Girls who had no means of support except sponging, sat nursing their white hands, waiting to catch husbands to support them. When they did get one, in very many cases he was not able to keep them in idleness, and so he ran away; and we never saw so many 'grass widows.'

"But it would take us a year to trace the curse of slavery through all the ramifications of society. We never saw so much trouble in housekeeping. One hired girl here, for one dollar and fifty cents per week, would do as much work, and do it better, than two slaves there, for whom one would pay two hundred per annum. We did go to house-keeping, but would not hire a slave. Once we wanted help; a great big fellow, who dressed in satin and broadcloth, sported a gold chain and Havana, and did nothing, proposed to Mr. Swisshelm to hire him an old woman, for whose services he should pay him two hundred a year, and added: 'You would have to horsewhip her yourself once or twice a week, for she's a real devil, but a good worker, and that wife of yours could do nothing with her.' Now, Mr. Ploughboy, just imagine the man we call husband, a great brawny-fisted six-footer, who had been brought up on the hills of Pennsylvania, and there held the plough, whipping a woman to make her do work for which he was to pay, not her, but another big-fisted lord of creation like himself. Oh dear! We were always glad he did not incline to fight, but at that time we were provoked he had not knocked the fellow's teeth down his throat."

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

An important discovery, confirmatory of the truth of the book of Jonah, has been made by Mr. Layard. In excavating the city of Nineveh, he discovered the name of Jonah inscribed upon the ruins. That prophet, as our readers know, was sent to announce to the people of Nineveh the destruction of the city. His eloquence converted many of them, and "God repented him" of the doom He had pronounced, and spared the city for that time. Jonah then became the prophet of Nineveh, and was reverenced by the inhabitants. As was the Oriental custom, they doubtless inscribed his name in conspicuous places on the walls of the public edifices, and the inscriptions engraved by Assyrian hands a thousand years before the Christian era, have been found by Mr. Layard. This is one of the most extraordinary demonstrations of the accuracy of biblical history we have ever heard of.

As yet we have only seen the beginning of the end. The city of Nineveh has scarcely yet been entered, and when the excavations shall have been completed, if Mahomedan jealousy should ever permit that consummation, we may expect illustrations of the prophecies that will strike the world with awe and wonder.

Great credit is due to the British Government for the munificent spirit they have exhibited in aiding the labors of Mr. Layard—placing at his command vessels for the navigation of the Euphrates, conveying to England the magnificent sculptures which he has disentombed, and affording him every facility which money or British authority could secure. We should be glad to see a similar spirit exhibited by the Government of this country in reference to American antiquities. [Noah's Sunday Times.

RESUSCITATION.

Dr. G. M. Sanders, of New Orleans, writing in the Delta, says: "I was called to Miss M——, who was represented to be dying from the loss of blood, which was caused by the cut of a vein in the arm. Miss M——, during a fit of disappointment, cut the vein in her arm with a penknife, which was not discovered by the inmates of the house until she had become cold and pulseless. On my arrival I found her bed and bedding bathed in blood, and this fair young lady truly a most pitiable object. I could not administer remedies internally, as the patient was beyond swallowing anything. I had sinapisms applied to her strong, and bethought myself of the fact that the blood might be caused to gravitate on the brain, and thereby produce a reaction; to effect this, I had a cord passed round her feet, and raised to the cornice of the bedstead. She remained in this situation twenty-eight minutes before respiring; she had, however, spasmodic twitches as soon as her feet were raised; her lips became red, and a coloration of the face rapidly followed. After the first respiratory effort, I discovered her pulse, though so faint that I could hardly perceive it with the most delicate touch; it gradually rose, however, and as soon as I could administer anything by the mouth, I gave xxx grains sulphate quinine, and repeated the quinine in broken doses; also spirits vin gacæie warm. I had the satisfaction of restoring this young lady, and she is now in good health, though it was several weeks before she fully recovered from the extreme weakness to which she had been reduced. I am satisfied that she did not lose less than sixty ounces of blood. She was, however, a robust and rather fleshy girl."

THE POET BOWLES.

The canon's absence of mind was very great, and when his coachman drove him into Bath, he had to practice all kinds of caution to keep him to time and place. The poet once left our office in company with a well-known antiquary of our neighborhood, since deceased, and who was as absent as Mr. Bowles himself. The servant of the latter came to our establishment to look for him, and, on learning that he had gone away with the gentleman to whom we have referred, the man exclaimed, in a tone of ludicrous distress, "What! those two wandered away together? then they'll never be found any more!" The act of composition was a slow and laborious operation with Mr. Bowles. He altered and re-wrote his MS. until, sometimes, hardly anything remained of the orignal, excepting the general conception. When we add, that his handwriting was one of the worst that ever man wrote—insomuch that frequently he could not read that which he had written the day before—we need not say that his printers had very tough work in getting his works into type. At the time when we printed for Mr. Bowles we had one compositor in our office (his death is recorded in our paper of to-day,) who had a sort of knack in making out the poet's hieroglyphics, and he was once actually sent for by Mr. Bowles into Wiltshire to copy some MS. written a year or two before, which the poet had himself vainly endeavored to decipher. FIRST POETRY WRITTEN IN AMERICA.

The first poetic effusion ever produced on American soil, says a correspondent of the Bangor Whig, originated in a circumstance which was handsomely explained by one of the full bloods of the Sibawa, or, as we call them, Chippewas. All those who have witnessed the performances of the Indians of the Far West recently in our city, must recollect the cradle and the mode in which the Indians bring up their children. Soon after our forefathers landed at Plymouth, some of the young people went out into a field where Indian women were picking strawberries, and observed several cradles hung upon the boughs of trees with the infants fastened upon them—a novel and curious sight to any European. A gentle breeze sprang up, which waved the cradles to and fro. A young man, one of the party, peeled off a piece of birch bark, and upon the spot wrote the following, which has been repeated thousands of times by thousands of American matrons, very few of whom ever knew or cared for its origin:

"Lul-a-by baby upon the tree top,
When the wind blows the cradle will rock,
When the bough breaks the cradle will fall,
And down comes lul-a-by, baby and all."

The above facts were taken some years since from the archives of the ancient historical society in Boston.

The Hen Fever.—Few are aware of the extent to which the hen fever is now raging among our amateur farmers. The California fever sinks into oblivion when compared with this. Choice hens are now imported for breed. A few days since, an invoice of 35 pounds sterling came in the Robert C. Winthrop, from Liverpool. The merits of the Guilderland, the Dorking, or the Cochin China, are daily discussed in the railroad cars, and at our fashionable hotels. One young farmer gentleman in our vicinity has gone into the fowl business in good earnest, and reduced it to a perfect system. Eggs are taken in to hatch, for so much a head; the name of the owner of the eggs, and the date of their being laid, written upon the outside. Hens are let to those who have eggs of a choice kind, but who have no hens to hatch them. Three dollars and even four dollars per dozen is by no means an uncommon price for eggs of a choice kind.

THE WIFE.

Hannah Moore, describing the character of the wife of the learned Dr. Kennicott, who "was the object, not only of his affection, but of his pride," makes the following valuable remarks:—

"There are certain ladies who, merely from being faithful or frugal, are reckoned excellent wives, and who indeed make a man everything but happy. They acquit themselves, perhaps, of the great points of duty, but in so ungracious a way as clearly proves that they do not find their pleasure in it. Lest their account of merit should run too high, they allow themselves to be unpleasant in proportion as they are useful, not considering that it is almost the worst sort of domestic immorality to be disagreeable. This was not the case with this lady; she probably lengthened her husband's life by her attentions, and certainly gladdened it by her prudence, her understanding, and her gentleness. And it is her peculiar praise that she took the pains to acquire a certain knowledge (the Hebrew language,) from which she could derive neither pleasure nor fame, merely to be useful to him."

Suicide.—We learn that a likely negro girl, a slave of a passenger on the steamer La Fayette, drowned herself by jumping overboard, last Wednesday morning. She was a valuable servant, and her master had been offered $1000 for her. She had been corrected by him for some offense or other, and she was heard to declare, that he should never slap her again. When the boat was some distance above Evansville, and while the passengers were at the dinner-table, she jumped into the river from the after-guard, and was drowned. [Louisville Courier.

The above article, says the Worcester Spy, affords a very apt illustration of the moral influence of the slave system on the people among whom it exists. Here was a young female, "likely," capable, and, as the article clearly enough indicates, of keen sensibility and self-respect—driven by the barbarity of the creature calling himself her master, to the commission of suicide, and yet the public press, in the opulent and refined city of Louisville, in chronicling the event, has no word of condemnation for the oppression and cruelty which drove her to the fatal act. It does not seem even to realize or apprehend that the subject of its paragraph was a fellow being, endowed with immortality, driven thus early to her final account, there to appear not only to answer for herself, but as the accuser of her oppressor; but treats the matter in quite a business sort of style, as deriving its chief, if not only consequence, from the value of the property lost to the master. She was a "very valuable servant," and was worth "a thousand dollars!" Had it been a horse of the same "value," which had accidentally tumbled overboard, the subject could not be more coolly spoken of.

Awakening of Conscience.—On the night of the 17th of March, 1848, the store of Mr. William Butler, in Charleston, S. C., was set on fire, and himself and family had scarcely sufficient time to escape from the rapidly spreading flames. Nothing transpired to indicate the incendiary, or fasten suspicion upon any one. Some days ago the present Mayor of Charleston received a letter, in an envelop without a post-mark, dated New-Orleans, April 25, in which the writer confessed, without making known his name, that he set fire to the premises, and received therefor the sum of $200. While coming from New York to Charleston, in 1848, in pursuit of work, he made the acquaintance of two men on board of the steam packet, who urged him to it, saying that Mr. Butler's goods were insured, that none but rich men would suffer, &c. After he had fired the building and escaped from it, he returned, and heard one of Mr. Butler's family say that the goods were not insured. This awoke regret at once, and the matter has so sorely troubled his conscience since, that he has made the confession of his crime, and enclosed in the letter the sum of $85, which he avers is all he has, with the request that it be handed to Mr. Butler. It has accordingly been paid to that gentleman.

An Ingenious Suicide.—Sir Wm. Hankford had been a well-conducted man, but he was of a melancholy temperament, and became tired of life, notwithstanding the high position which he occupied, and the respect in which he was held. He wished to "shuffle off this mortal coil," but he was afraid to commit suicide in any vulgar way, at the time when a verdict of felo de se always followed such an act, and the body of the supposed delinquent was buried in a cross road, with a stake thrust through it. He at last resorted to this novel expedient, by which he hoped not only that the forfeiture of his goods would be saved, but that his family would escape the anguish and the shame arising from the belief that he had fallen by his own hand. Several of his deer having been stolen, he gave strict orders to his keeper to shoot any person he met within or near the park at night, who would not stand when challenged. He then, in a dark night, threw himself in the keeper's way; and, refusing to stand when challenged, was shot dead on the spot!

"Be sure your Sin will find you out."—An old gentleman named Hugh Montgomery was lately robbed, near Savannah, of $10,000. The perpetrator of the robbery was a man named Berry. As Berry was throwing a bag of the ill-gotten pelf over his horse, the animal became frightened, and bounded off with great violence, striking his knee against a stump, and knocking off a piece of skin, which was found the next morning, and exactly fitted the part of the wounded knee of Berry's horse.

A Gentleman.—Show me the man who can quit the brilliant society of the young to listen to the kindly voice of age—who can hold cheerful converse with one whom years have deprived of charms—show me the man who is as willing to help the deformed who stand in need of help, as if the blush of Helen mantled on her cheek—show me the man who would no more look rudely at the poor girl in the village, than at the elegant and well-dressed lady in the soloon—show me the man who treats unprotected maidenhood as he would the heiress, surrounded by the powerful protection of rank, riches and family—show me the man who abhors the libertine's gibe, who shuns as a blasphemer the traducer of his mother's sex—who scorns as he would a coward the ridiculer of woman's foibles, or the exposer of womanly reputation—show me that man who never forgets for an instant the delicacy, the respect, that is due to woman as woman in any condition or class—and you show me a gentleman.

Bees Prognosticators of the Weather.—Mr. J. A. Payne, author of the Bee-Keeper's Guide, says:—"I am not aware that bees have ever been placed in the list of those creatures which are said to foretell the changes of weather, as many animals of the feathered and insect tribes are; but in my opinion they stand foremost of the weather-wise. A nice observer, by looking at them in the early morning, during the working season, will very soon be able to form an opinion as to what the day will be, and that almost to a certainty; for they will sometimes appear sluggish and inactive, although the morning is very bright and showing every appearance for a fine day; but the sun soon becomes clouded, and rain follows. And again, the morning may be dull and cloudy, and sometimes rain may be falling, when they may be observed going out in considerable numbers; and as sure as this is seen, the day becomes bright and fair."

Fatal Result of a Bite from a Human Being.—Dr. Duhr, of Coblentz, mentions the case of a police-officer whose right thumb was severely bitten while taking a man into custody. The wound healed up very well, but a week afterward numbness and formication were felt in the thumb and the index, with spasmodic twitches of the muscles. The next day the man was seized with frightful convulsions and loss of consciousness for a few moments. These symptoms diminished greatly for the two following months, yet they re-appeared subsequently with renewed intensity, accompanied by defective speech, want of sleep, and wandering. The patient soon died. On a post mortem examination, the posterior portion of the left hemisphere of the brain was found in a state of inflammatory softening.

◆

The Cuckoo.—The cuckoo, herald of the Spring, says an English paper, is a bird whose note is hailed by every person with delight. Many attempts have been made to keep the cuckoo alive in captivity, and several have lived with care to the middle of Winter, when they have died. Mr. Richard Dewey, of Sleaford, has with great care and trouble kept one alive through the Winter; and on the 30th of March, and every day since, it has sent forth its well-known note, and is very cheerful and active, although it has been moulting for some time. There are only two instances of the kind on record; one bird lived for more than a year at Cranmore, near Belfast, the residence of John Templeton, Esq., and died in consequence of an accident on the 10th of January, 1822.

◆

Combustion.—An ordinary candle consumes as much air while burning, as a man in health while breathing; the same may be said with regard to gas, oil lamps, &c., bearing a proportion to the amount of light evolved. One hour after the gas of London has been lighted, the air is deoxydized as much as if five hundred thousand had been added to its population. During the combustion of oil, tallow, gas, &c., water is produced. In cold weather we see it condensed on the windows of ill-ventilated shops. By the burning of gas in London during twenty-four hours, more water is produced than would supply a ship laden with emigrants on a voyage from London to Adelaide.

◆

Egg Match.—This entertainment, says the N. Y. Tribune, came off on Tuesday afternoon. The manner of doing it was as follows:—Fifty eggs were placed on the ground at one yard apart, making a distance of fifty yards from the first to the last egg. A pail of water was then placed at one end of the row, and the fun commenced, the operator picking the eggs up one by one, and running to deposit them in the pail without breaking them. The time agreed upon was twenty minutes, but the feat was accomplished in eleven minutes and fifty-three seconds, leaving eight minutes to spare. The running distance was one mile and two-fifths. The wager was $25.

Petrifactions.—The New Orleans Delta says that about 60 miles above Georgetown, Williamson county, there is a valley of petrifactions probably unequaled on the globe. Not only prostrate trees petrify into the finest flint, but leaves of trees, flowers of plants, and often the whole plant bearing fruit is petrified. A large tarahtula was found, as natural as life, sitting on a rock, completely, and in every part, turned to stone. An enormous Indian arrow head has also been found. The petrifactions and the floral beauties there hardened into rock, would astonish and delight the naturalist.

The Rose that all are Praising.—The Utica Gazette, under the above significant head, describes the beauties of an enormous and productive Rose Tree. It says:—"We saw last evening, in the greenhouse of Ambrose G. Howard, Esq., of Whitestown, a white rose-bush, which measures forty-two feet in length, and upon which there are now more than one thousand roses and buds just opening into bloom. There are more than seven hundred blossoms fully developed. It is a magnificent specimen, and we challenge the world to beat it."

Variety.

A Hippotamus, intended as a present for the London Zoological Society, is about to be shipped in one of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's vessels, for Southampton, in April or May. The beast has been for some time in Alexandria; is docile and harmless, and has considerably improved in dimensions and appearance under the kind care bestowed upon it by its European keepers. Its food consists chiefly of milk, of which it consumes daily the somewhat immoderate quantity of ten gallons. Its habits very closely resemble those of the common African buffalo.

There are many men and women who would handle a watch, worth twenty-five dollars, with the utmost care, for fear of deranging its mechanism, while they would not hesitate to lay rough hands upon the feelings of others, worth twenty-five years of happiness. Many a man there is who would "turn aside to let the reptile live," who would not scruple to set his foot upon a human heart, and crush it—many a lady who would deem it a sin to ruffle a lace cap, is not slow to rend the more exquisite network of the human heart.

A correspondent of the Newark Daily Advertiser claims for the State of New Jersey the honor of producing a man almost as large as the renowned Daniel Lambert. He says that a man named Lewis Cornelius, who was born at New Brunswick, N. J., and died in 1841, at Milford, Pa., aged 48, weighed 675 lbs. He was said to have been very sensitive on the subject of his size and weight, manifesting considerable irritation at any allusion to the subject. Daniel Lambert weighed 739 pounds.

Mr. Ethan Campbell, of N. Y., styled a philosophical, practical, and experimental engineer, has taken out a patent in England for obtaining an improvement in motive power, by employing the vapor of alcohol as a substitute for steam, and using the same liquid over and over again, alternately generating and condensing the vapor, the apparatus being so constructed and arranged, that no escape of it to the atmosphere is permitted.

The number on the sick list at the West Point Military Academy, last year, caused some investigation to be made, and the surgeon represents the causes to be the inordinate quantity of tobacco used by them, and the practice of wearing the pantaloons so tight around the waist as to interfere with digestion, and cause many unpleasant symptoms. He recommends that the Cadets be required to take a full inspiration before being measured around the waist by their tailors!

A young Irish woman, about twenty years of age, named Sarah Ann Barclay, committed suicide at Pittsburgh, recently, by hanging herself with a rope tied to the transom of a door, in her uncle's house. She had been very melancholy for several days, having lately received intelligence from Ireland of the death of a young man to whom she was devotedly attached, and whose arrival in this country she was anxiously waiting for.

The Secretary of State, of Ohio, in answer to a call of the Convention, states that the number of white males over 21 years of age in the State in 1839 was 191,127, in 1843 it was 225,546, and in 1847 it was 352,000. By the census of 1840 there were 1,502,114 white, and 17,353 colored people—total 1,519,667. The Secretary estimates the population of the State in 1850 at two millions and sixty thousand.

The Lancaster Gazette gives an account of an under-ground body of water, which it says lies beneath the highest point of the city, 27 feet under the surface, and 20 feet above Center Square. It was first discovered by a workman digging a well, and is thought to be 50 feet wide and 10 deep. It flows in a south-western direction. The Gazette proposes that the water be used to supply the city.

In Brooklyn, a young man by the name of William Pool has been backed in the sum of $25, to pick up, with his mouth, 20 eggs, placed one yard apart, and drop them into a basket without cracking a shell. Each egg is to be separately raised from the ground and deposited in the basket; and the feat is to be performed within twenty minutes.

At one time Daniel Webster had a difficult case to plead, and a verdict was rendered against his client. One of the witnesses came to him and said, "Mr. Webster, if I had thought you would have lost the case, I might have testified to a great deal more than I did." "It is of no consequence," replied the lawyer, "the jury did not believe a word you said."

A gentleman asked a clergyman for the use of his pulpit for a young divine, a relative of his. "I really do not know," said the clergyman, "how to refuse you; if the young man should preach better than me, my congregation will be dissatisfied with me afterwards; and if he should preach worse, I do n't think he's fit to preach at all."

It is related that when the British soldiers were about to march out and lay down their arms at Yorktown, Washington said to the American army, "My boys, let there be no insults over a conquered foe! When they lay down their arms don't huzza! Posterity will huzza for you!"

There are, according to statistics in Ewbank's forthcoming report, 1,000,000 milch cows in New York, which on the average yield in dairy products $20 per year for each head, and competent judges estimate the gross value of the dairy product of the State at $50,000,000 per year.

During the prevalence of the Cholera in Ireland, the town of Ennis was subject some weeks to the ravages of this frightful epidemic. The number of cases was several thousand—the number of deaths, 1,260. Among the latter there was not one tee-totaler.

Judge Daly of New York has recently promulgated the decision, that a woman may not legally be held to answer for a breach of promise to marry, and that it is only the masculine gender who can be so held for refusing to consummate such a contract.

The convict, Estelle, who recently escaped from the Kentucky State prison, is one of the most ingenious fellows in the country. While in the prison he made a clock entirely of sheet iron, which is as good a timepiece as the best of regulators.

Littell's Living Age.

PROSPECTUS.—This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope, and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the E[illegible]rgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contribution to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia, and Africa into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as merchants, travelers, and politicians, with all parts of the world; so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening, through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selections; and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive to their wives and children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that, by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste.

Terms.—The Living Age is published every Saturday; price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

☞ To insure regularity in mailing the work, orders should be addressed to the office of publication.

Clubs, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:

Four copies for	$20 00
Nine " "	40 00
Twelve " "	50 00

Complete sets, in 24 volumes, to the end of March, 1850, handsomely bound, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principal cities free of expense of freight, are for sale at forty-eight dollars.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Judge Story—Chancellor Kent—President Adams.

I have read the prospectus of "The Living Age" with great pleasure, and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more; it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character. Joseph Story.

Cambridge, April 24, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of your work, and, if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit, and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day. James Kent.

New York, May 7, 1844.

Of all the periodical journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

MORE SIGNS OF PROGRESS.

The readers of the Recorder being deeply and peculiarly interested in the advancement of liberal principles of Government, as well as in the promulgation of correct Bible institutions, I make some extended extracts from two pamphlets on my table, bearing strongly on these very important topics, for their edification.

The first, by my good and distinguished friend Professor Jackson, of the University of Pennsylvania, contains a graphic description of the domination over man, in all periods of the world's history, and under all forms of power, down to the present time—a truly philosophical summary, sketched with a vigorous pen. Dr. Jackson is distinguished for his terse and suggestive style, his general enthusiasm and truthfulness, his clear conception of principles, and his tact of clothing them in the most effective language. In the Essay before me, which is an "Address delivered (April, 1850,) before the Medical Society of the State of Pennsylvania," of which he is the President, he displays an independence of thought rarely to be found in treating a political subject; which he introduces to show, that there has always been too much legislative meddling with man's affairs; that State legislation ought to be confined to general regulations and to guaranty justice; that most matters would be better done if left to classes—to be managed by the classes themselves; and, thus, urges the Medical Profession, to act for themselves in elevating their calling, rather than depend on civil enactments—they, only, being the competent judges of their wants and their true interests; in doing which, he has performed an important political service to his country, which but few, if any, politicians would have the moral courage to undertake. He has spoken great and grave truths, on a great and a grave subject, which deserve to be printed in letters of gold, and, along with the Declaration of Independence, and the Sunday Mail Report, be hung up in every Legislative Hall in the Union, for the instruction and admonition of our law-makers.

The second extract is from a Sermon of a popular D. D. in the city of Philadelphia, preached in April last, in reference to the contest, then at issue, upon running "daily lines" on the "Central" Railroad, now being constructed from Harrisburg to Pittsburg. In maintaining the position he assumed, that the Sabbath was given for man's use, he had to tell some truths rather strange to the ears of the great majority of the community in which he resides, yet none the less true for all that. He yields, honestly and explicitly, all claim to any sacredness for the first day of the week, derived from any scriptural injunction, and appears to have a significant blinking at the persecution of our brethren in that Commonwealth.

Such articles as these, from such sources, cannot fail to advance our cause, by exciting public attention to the fallacy, as well as the cruelty, of human governments attempting to force religious observances on people who dissent from the dogma and the assumption, and by exposing the folly of bolstering up a human institution as of divine appointment, and then foisting it upon the community at large, against their conscientious convictions, and the express language of the Word of God! They are encouraging evidences of the march of correct principles—of the return of the sober second thought—and foreshadow the eventual overthrow of false and idolatrous observances. So mote it be. W. M. F.

1. Abuse of Power.

From the remotest historical era, the people have been, to a greater or less extent, held in subjection, bondage, or vassalage, to governments and rulers. They never have governed, and do not to this day govern themselves. They have never been able to divest themselves of the belief, that the social and civil relations of society could be maintained without rulers invested, permanently, or for periods of varying duration, with all the force and power, executive and legislative, of the State.

All experience has shown, that power thus intrusted has been usurped, abused, turned to the benefit of the few at the expense of the many, and been the source of corruption. It is to-day what it has been in time past, and will be in all time to come, should the long-since aborted experiment be persisted in.

The radical ideas on which governments were originally founded, were those of offense and defense; the power to spoil others, and protect against the spoiler. Wars, battles, slaughter, and all the conceivable atrocities that hell could vomit forth on the earth, constituted the foreign relations of one people to another; while stripes, dungeons, slavery, hanging, burning, every variety of torture, were, and, in part, continue to be, the internal measures to enforce obedience, honesty, and truthfulness in the subject and citizen.

External government rivaled in ferocity the forest beasts; domestic rule, the control of the menagerie.

Christianity promulgated new ideas, and disseminated new principles. It proclaimed to man his self-independence; it taught him self-government; it inculcated, as the first and highest of his duties, a direct responsibility to God, and love to his fellow-man, whether friend or foe, the native of his own country or of a foreign land.

These principles have been professed, been mouthed and preached, for 1800 years, but have never been incorporated into the actual polity, or made the rule of action of civil or social, and it may truly be added, of religious life. A Christian government, and a Christian community, one that is so in truth, and not merely nominal, but guided by Christian principles, has yet to be established.

Nothing more impressively shows the irresistible power of customs and habits of thought early inculcated, than that the religious ideas and principles of Christianity should have been kept practically in abeyance for so long a period, nationally, in all Christendom, while the traditional principles, ideas, and doctrines of governments and society, perpetuated from pagan and barbarian times, are the existing rule. Christian civilization has been and is a theory; pagan and barbarian customs are the fact. Christianity is a rule for the individual, not for the citizen, the ruler, or the government. The people belong to the State, are its servants. They are bound to it—life, and body, and soul; they are to do its biddings, regardless of their own conscience, sense of justice, and of truth. What is the State, that thus imperiously annihilates individual man? The few! who hold and wield power, however obtained, and whatever its tenure.

But this absurd government formula of the olden times, is becoming somewhat antiquated. The faith that was in it, has been sadly shaken in modern days. The idea and word preached and spoken in the ear for so long a time, has, at last, become a belief. Man finds himself a reality, and not a nonentity. He is something more than a mollusk, or animal stomach, for digesting a quantum of eatables; or a machine to do its sum of daily work, and, when useless, to be cast into uttermost darkness and oblivion. He has awakened to the conviction that he is co-heir with the greatest and mightiest in God's heritage, this beauteous earth, and entitled to an equal share in its capabilities for human improvement and happiness, according to his capacities and his deservings. He has acquired the consciousness that he has a mind to think, capable of and entitled to knowledge and cultivation; a soul to be saved, a conscience to direct, and a will to execute; that for the use of these faculties he is responsible to God; that a lie is not less a lie, or a crime ceases to be a crime, because it is perpetrated by the State, or by its command.

When a man has strong convictions he cannot be dumb. It is a law of our nature that they must have utterance.

In Europe, incited by our example, and impelled by the earnest belief in the religious truths of man's responsibility and the inherent rights of his humanity, the people have asked of their rulers why, and how am I, what I am? I am not a nullity; I am of God's beings, like yourselves. Why am I degraded, a groundling crushed to the earth, steeped in poverty, misery, and enslaved? Restore unto me the rights God bestowed, and of which I am stripped. And how have the people been answered? By slaughter, proscription, renewed and augmented oppression. The combined power of the imperial Czar, of perjured emperors and kings, of relentless nobles and heartless capitalists, has quelled in blood the awakening spirit of European freedom. But the end is not; and never in God's destiny is it to happen that justice, truth, and humanity, are to be extinguished by brutal violence or savage wrong.

Our forefathers made a great advance in the progressive civilization of our race, in the creation of our popular institutions. But let us not deceive ourselves with the belief that their work was perfect. It is not in the order of things that a first essay ever proves complete. It is the proper business and interest of their and our successors to correct the defects and irregularities, and to arrest the evils that become apparent, in the advance of time, in the working of the political machinery of our country.

Too much of the old government leaven was retained by them. Too large a portion of executive and legislative power was concentrated in the government. Too small a portion was left with the people.

Power with us has generated its inevitable evils of abuse and corruption. Our State and general governments, though they are popular institutions, cannot, in their working, be said properly to be of the people, or for the people. Our governments have become party governments, for party purposes, and for the benefit of partizans directly; of the people, the country and society, incidentally. We are becoming rapidly subjected to party despotisms, and the tyranny of party majorities.

The conflicts of the political classes for the possession of power and the spoils of office, absorb every other consideration. The true objects and duties for which governments are instituted, are lost sight of, are nearly forgotten, nay, are almost unknown. We are, in our day, in the midst of the same factitious strifes and contentions that proved fatal to the republics of Rome, of Greece, and of Italy, and uprooted liberty. What is liberty? Truth, justice, conscience, acted, not talked; self-love and independence, respecting self-love and independence in others. It is a plant of high culture. It cannot flourish in degraded soils, or amidst storms and violence.

It is true, we have not the ostracisms, the judicial murders, the assassinations, the bloody battling of civil war, that attended the political strifes of the older republics. The ballot-box and frequent elections, so long as they are not corrupted and rendered fraudulent; our modern civilization and our religion, preserve us from those barbarities. The times render them impossible. But the proscription of the defeated party is as hot and fierce, as far as it can be carried, as of old.

The present is full of significance. Amidst the profoundest peace, calm, and prosperity, ominous signs and sounds rush from the political world, convulsed with stormy passions, and perilous contentions for selfish ends.

The industrious and peaceful citizen, disturbed and aroused from his useful pursuits, is alarmed by fictitious dangers, threatening to overthrow the fairest, and, what was believed to be, the most enduring fabric of human freedom, the world has seen.

What is the source of this danger? A desperate struggle amongst politicians to possess themselves of the delegated power the people have placed in the hands of rulers. It is a temptation that seduces into political iniquities. Ambitious, selfish, and unscrupulous men, plot the means that may elevate them to power and enable them to seize the spoils, regardless of the evils their unhallowed strife may shed upon their country. This is the lesson of the past. Let us not be heedless of it, and carelessly risk our ruin.

The remedy is not difficult. Diminish the executive and legislative powers of government. Develop the present imperfect popular institutions, into a completed organic democracy. Let the people retain and directly exercise the largest portion of the legislative functions of society, leaving to government little more than police administration, and a limited legislative action, to legalize general regulations, and to guaranty justice.

This may be accomplished by class government; governments within a government; wheels within wheels; such is all perfect machinery. It is with the view to urge the medical class to take into their own hands the administration of their affairs, to organize a medical government, that I have been led into the preceding observations. They may appear out of place on this occasion. I have spoken the thoughts that arose. They are abstract principles without intended allusions to any party or persons.

2. The Sunday Sabbath.

I know it is said that the Sabbath was changed from the seventh day of the week to the first.* It was changed, I admit. But it was changed by no sort of authority whatever. There is not a shred of any record of any such authority. At first, the apostles, after the death of their Master, used to meet together on the first day of the week, because it was a day marked out by his resurrection; but there is no evidence that they, or their converts, ceased from their daily labor even on that day, except during the time occupied with their meetings.* Gradually, that tendency of the mind, which has always been at work, in all ages and places, to magnify outward forms, to attach a religious sacredness to times and places, operated to impart a peculiar solemnity to the first day of the week, and to invest it with the sacred character which had attached to the seventh day of the week among the Jews. Thus, superstition sought to revive and interpolate the Jewish Sabbath (?) into the simple, spiritual religion of Christ, just as it wrought to bring back Pagan rites and ceremonies under Christian names, thrusting religion out of the heart, and converting it into an artificial and pompous ritual. So the change was wrought, not by the authority of Christ, not by the authority of any of his apostles, but by those tendencies of human nature, which have always operated to substitute for the inward law of liberty an outward yoke of bondage.

No, my friends, the observance of this day does not rest upon the authority of any positive command. Christianity has instituted no set day of worship.† It concerns itself only with the assertion of great principles, and leaves us to decide, every man for himself, when, where, and how, he will study and promote his own spiritual well-being. But there is one thing which it does condemn; it condemns most emphatically, both by its letter and its spirit, the magnifying of external forms, the elevation of things indifferent to a level with things important, the sacrifice of the substantial and enduring interests of mankind to artificial observances. It tells us that the Sabbath of the Jews, positively established as that was, was made to be subservient to human uses, and that man was not made for the sake of the Sabbath.‡ And he who undertakes to force or intimidate into the religious observance of any particular day, or to condemn for not observing it, goes directly counter to the whole tenor of the New Testament, to the essential spirit of Christianity. He may claim the name, and profess to be a Christian of the Christians, of the stanchest orthodoxy, and have the authority of numbers to back him, but he has no warrant for his proceeding in any word that ever fell from the lips of Christ or the pens of his apostles. * * * *

Finally, brethren, there seems to be a general apprehension that religion will clean disappear and die out of the world altogether, if all sorts of human prohibitions and enactments are not made to keep it alive and prevent it from utter ruin. We identify religion with our poor devices, with mere human contrivances and institutions. It becomes us to recollect, that there is a God watching over the world; that a Wisdom, infinitely above man's, is at work every instant, to advance and multiply good; that even if there were no churches and no Sabbaths, religion would not and could not die; that it is a fact and a necessity of human nature. It always flourishes best when "left to itself; that is, when it asks no help, no protection from force, but relies wholly for support on the intelligent convictions of men. Leave men to themselves, to their own will, as to the observance of this day, only be you all faithful in setting forth what you think, is just and right, and you need never doubt that the day will be used as it ought to be used. Reason and the native sense of right and religion will enforce with sufficient power the observance and support of every good institution. They will vindicate the propriety of setting one day in seven apart for repose, for innocent relaxation, for personal culture and progress. And let every man who recognizes the wisdom and utility of this institution, make its utility still more apparent by the use he makes of this season of rest, doing his utmost to secure to others the privilege of rest which he enjoys himself, supporting all institutions which help to cultivate and exalt men's better nature, and teaching others to use every day as sacred.

"LIGHT, MORE LIGHT."

[Such were the last words of Goethe.]

The God-enamel'd flower
At early dawn looks up,
And gently would unfold,
Its penciled cup;
While to the sun it saith,
"Arise and chase the night,
Wipe off this tear of dew—
More light, more light!"

When twilight steals away,
The wood bird singing, grieves,
And calls the evening back
To tint the leaves;
It saith—"O linger yet,
I still in airy flight
Would bathe my golden breast—
Stay, stay, O light!"

And thus my soul crieth out,
When dawn begins to break,
And in the sky it sees
The first gray streak.
Away, away, dark sins,
Ye've held me in long night,
I long to walk in day—
"More light, more light!"

There comes the life's broad noon,
With sun and sultry gleam;
And oft the soul doth err,
In act and dream;
Sun-spots arise to dim
The perfectness of sight;
Unsatisfied it cries—
"Temper the light!"

Then evening stealeth on—
The last hours of the strife,
When angels beckon us
To leave this life;
Then, as the soul soars up
To heaven's most holy height,
It crieth plaintively—
"O Lord! more light!"

More light! more light! to see
What mystic path I tread,
What dangers hover o'er
My heart and head!
O stretch thy guiding hand,
And lead me through this night,
Then bathe me in a flood
Of perfect light!

KOSSUTH AND THE HUNGARIAN REFUGEES.

A missionary correspondent of the N. Y. Evangelist, writing under date of Broosa, Asia Minor, May 1, 1850, gives the following account of Kossuth and the Hungarian Refugees:—

For some six weeks the Magyars were residing in Broosa, while on their way to Kutahia. During the time of their stay here, they were closely guarded, the Pasha being under strict charge from the attempts which have hitherto been made at assassinating Kossuth. This, as Kossuth one day remarked to me, is a strange mode of protection, to allow the suspected individuals to go at large, while the friends are the more strictly guarded. It is true that several Croats, recognized by some of the officers of K., were in Broosa, parading the streets freely, with what intent we are hardly left to surmise. But one thing, as respects the refugees, is certain, they felt like prisoners, if they did bear the name of "meusafeir," (visitors, friends.) No one was allowed to appear in the streets, without his military attendant. When the Governor rode out (which, on account of Madame K.'s health, injured by her exposure during her escape, was quite frequently,) he was always attended by a well-mounted guard. It was with difficulty that any one, except the English and French Consuls and a few others, obtained interviews with Kossuth. As Protestant Missionaries, however, we were occasionally allowed the privilege of meeting and conversing with him. And a nobler, truer-hearted patriot, I think cannot be found. One cannot long be in his presence—at least an American—without being reminded of our own loved Washington. His countenance is so expressive of honest worth, and his manner so full of dignity. As you first meet him, he appears somewhat reserved, and perhaps sad, for he has recently shown but little desire to meet and converse with many—he is weighed down under his country's wrongs; but as he enters into conversation, this apparent sadness soon passes away, and you see the man full of intellectual dignity. In speaking of the manner of his overthrow, one day, he remarked, "If I had not had one or two Arnold's in my camp, my poor country had not now been bleeding, but standing among the nations, acknowledged among the powers an honorable nation." In making mention of the sympathy expressed toward him in America, he said, "If one could choose his place of birth before he was born, America, of all other lands, would be the place—for it is the home of Freedom—but being once born, the land of birth is the dearest. Could I not aid my fatherland—in which I had rather be a common peasant than dwell a king any where else—I should choose America as the loved land of my adoption." * * * *

They reached Kutahia on the 12th, and took up their residence in the barracks, they not being able to find rooms in the town for them. Kossuth is allowed two or three of the best rooms in the barracks. Count Bathyany, however, has succeeded in obtaining a house in the town, such as it is. It overlooks the plain on the border of which Kutahia is situated. Kutahia is built at the foot of a range of hills, at an elevation of several thousand feet above the sea. It is a cold place; the snow is still lying on the hills just back of the town; vegetation is just beginning to spring forth, while at Broosa, and Constantinople, it is all out. There is a citadel now in ruins on one of the loftiest hills in the rear of the town, presenting rather an imposing sight on approaching it from the distance. On entering the town, one is at once struck with the want of European influence and commerce. It is, as all inland towns of Turkey are, anything but a paradise to those accustomed to the courts and elegance of continental Europe. You can therefore imagine the feelings of disappointment experienced by these unfortunate refugees. Expecting to find in it the most beautiful of Oriental scenery, they find only a filthy, crowded Turkish town, of mud walls and mud houses.

Sulieman Dey, the directing officer, presented the Governor with a fine garden of several acres, in the vicinity of the barracks, in which both Kossuth and his officers spend their leisure hours. After dining with him one afternoon, Kossuth conducted us to his garden, and, showing us the plans and improvements which he intended making, remarked, "Like the bird who carried a seed in his mouth over the desert, and dropped it on an oasis, there to spring up and beautify a barren spot, so, if we can do no more, we may show to this people something of our taste in arranging flowers." I remarked, that there were a number of fruit trees, and apparently good ones. "Yes," added he, "but I would fain not remain here to taste their fruit." It was a sight to affect the heart of an American, to see those officers of many battles gathering around their leader so affectionately and so respectfully. They all look up to him, and as he passed along they seemed willing to give him the highest place among them. Kossuth remarked, when alone, "These officers came like children, weeping and begging to accompany me. When it was told me I must select, and that few could accompany me, I went and laid the decision before them, and they all, to a man, on their knees, exclaimed, 'Let us live on the meanest, and let us bear the worst, for we have borne hardships and can endure them, but do not let us be separated from you.' What could I do?" said he. "They came, but some of them have only $1.25 per month on which to subsist! Others of them have more, and by sharing they all live." They will not leave their honored Kossuth. They look up to him as our fathers in their darkest hours looked up to and revered our Washington. Noble hearts! may they yet rescue their country and their forsaken homes.

BEAUTY OF AN INFANT.

The following paragraph, from the pen of the poet Campbell, is replete with all the tender fervor of a parent's heart:—

"Our first interview was when he lay in his little crib, in the midst of white muslin and dainty lace, prepared by Matilda's hands, long before the stranger's arrival. I verily believe that a lovelier babe was never smiled upon by the light of heaven. He was breathing sweetly in his first sleep; I durst not awaken him, but ventured one kiss. He gave a faint murmur, and opened his azure lights. Since that time he has continued to grow in grace and stature. I can take him in my arms, but still his good nature and his beauty are but provocatives to the affection which one must not indulge; he cannot bear to be hugged, he cannot yet stand a worrying. O! that I were sure that he would live to the day when I could take him on my knee, and feel the strong plumpness of childhood waxing into vigorous youth. My poor boy! shall I have the ecstacy of teaching him thoughts, and knowledge, and reciprocity of love to me? It is bold to venture into futurity so far! At present his lovely little face is a comfort to me; his lips breathe that fragrance which is one of the loveliest kindnesses of nature that she has given to infants; a sweetness of smell more delightful than all the treasures of Arabia. What adorable beauties of God and nature's bounty we live in without knowing! How few have ever seemed to think an infant beautiful! But to me, there seems to be a beauty in the earliest dawn of infancy, which is not inferior to the attractions of childhood, especially when they sleep. Their looks excite a more tender train of emotions. It is like the tremulous anxiety we feel for a candle newly lighted, which we dread going out."

THE DESERT OF SAHARA.

North of the mountains of the Moon, in Abyssinia, lies the great Desert of Sahara, stretching 800 miles in width from its southern margin, and 1000 in length between the Atlantic and the Red Sea. It is a hideous, barren waste, prolonged eastward into the Atlantic for miles, in the form of sand banks, and interrupted to the west only by a few oases and the valley of the Nile.

This desert is alternately scorched by heat and pinched by cold. The wind blows from the east nine months of the year, and at the equinoxes it rushes a perfect hurricane, driving the sand in clouds before it, producing the darkness of night at mid-day, and overwhelming caravans of men and animals in common destruction. Then the sand is heaped up in waves ever varying with the blast; even the atmosphere is of sand. The desolation of this dreary waste, boundless to the eye as the ocean, is terrific and sublime—the dry, heated air, is like a red vapor; the setting sun seems to be a volcanic fire, and at times the burning wind of the desert is the blast of death. There are many salt lakes to the north, and even the springs are of brine; thick incrustations of dazzling salt cover the ground, and the particles carried aloft by whirlwinds, flash in the sun like diamonds. Sand is not the only character of the desert; tracks of gravel and low bare rocks occur at times, not less barren and dreary. On these interminable sands and rocks, no animal, no insect breaks the dread silence, not a tree, not a shrub is to be seen in this land without a shadow. In the glare of the noon, the air quivers with the heat reflected from the red sand, and in the night it is chilled in a clear sky sparkling under a host of stars. Strangely but beautifully contrasted with these solitudes, is the narrow valley of the Nile, threading the desert for 1000 miles in emerald green, with its blue waters foaming in rapids among wild rocks, or quietly spreading in a calm stream amidst fields of corn and the august monuments of past ages.

TRUST IN PROVIDENCE.

There were two neighbors, who had each a wife and several little children, and their wages as common laborers were their only support. One of these men was fretful and disquieted, saying, "If I die, or even if I fall sick, what will become of my family?" This thought never left him, but gnawed his heart, as a worm the fruit in which it is hidden. Now, although the same thought was presented to the mind of the other father, yet he was not fretted by it, for he said, "God, who knows all his creatures, and watches over them, shall also watch over me and mine." Thus he lived tranquil, while the other neither tasted repose nor joy. One day, as the latter was laboring in the field, sad and cast down because of his fear, he saw some birds go in and out of a plantation. Having approached, he found two nests side by side, and in each several young ones, newly hatched and still unfledged. When he returned to his work, he frequently looked at these birds, as they went out and returned, carrying nourishment to their young ones. But behold! at the moment when one of the mothers is returning with her bill full, a vulture seizes her, carries her off, and the poor mother, vainly struggling beneath his grasp, utters a piercing cry. At this sight the man who was working felt his soul more troubled than before; for, thought he, the death of the mother is the death of her young ones. Mine have only me—no other! What will become of them if I fail them? All the day he was gloomy and sad, and at night he slept not. On the morrow, as he returned to the field, he said, "I should like to see the little ones of that poor mother—several, without doubt, have already perished." He set off toward the plantation, and looking into the nests, he saw the young ones alive and well; not one seemed to have suffered. Astonished at this, he hid himself in order to see the cause. After a little while he heard a light cry, and perceived the other mother bringing back in haste the food she had gathered, which she distributed to all the young ones without distinction. There was some for each, and the orphans were not abandoned in their misery. In the evening, the father who had distrusted Providence related to the other father what he had seen, who observed, "Why fret yourself? God never abandons his children; his love has some secrets which we do not know. Let us believe, hope, love, labor, and pursue our course in peace; if I die before you, you shall be a father to my children; and if you die before me, I will be a father to yours; and if we both die before they are of age to provide for their own necessities, they will then have for their father, 'our Father who is in Heaven.'"

THE MORNING DEW.

In hot countries, in warm seasons, the vegetables and flowers in the gardens are almost burned up by the great heat of the sun. At night the flower-bed and vegetable garden present a weak and dying appearance: the morning comes, and shrubs and flowers again show signs of life and freshness, looking as healthful as at any former period, while the leaves and buds pour forth their sweet scents. How great the change during the silent hours of night! and this has been effected by the dew, as it silently rested on the plants.

Dew is one of the many beauties of the morning. On the grass, leaves of trees, and bushes, we behold the bright round drops of dew shining like so many diamonds in the sun; and it makes the ground at early dawn moist all around. How many children see this, and get their feet wet, but never give it a thought, where it comes from, what the use of it is, or who sends it. Some persons have said that it came down from the clouds in the night, and others have supposed that it came out of the earth and plants; but it is now known that the sun, during the heat of the day, draws up a great quantity of vapor into the air from the earth's surface and its waters, which in the night comes down on the earth again in the form of dew.

In Jamaica, the dew is very heavy, unless the wind is high through the night. In the mountains, the people are prevented from walking out in the mornings for some time after sunrise on account of it. In seasons when no rain falls for four or five months, the vegetables would perish were the dews to be withheld; but, instead of being burned up, they are kept alive by this means.

The dew is indeed a great blessing to mankind: it is the gift of God, and is a proof of his goodness, wisdom and power. It was considered so in the days of old. You will see it if you read Deut. xxxiii. 13; 2 Sam. i. 21; xvii. 21. Many other passages describe it as a blessing, and the withholding of it as a curse. "My speech shall distil as the dew." Deut. xxxii. 2. It is needful that the doctrine of God should have the same effect upon our hearts as dew has upon the grass—that it should make them soft and fruitful, keep them fresh and lively, like the branch of a living vine. It is pleasant to see the plants and flowers refreshed by the dews from heaven; so is it to see our fellow-creatures influenced by the gospel of Christ. The word of God is precious, for which we should show much gratitude, and praise him continually.

THE CHRISTIAN AS A STEWARD OF GOD'S BOUNTY.

It was the opinion of Andrew Fuller, if our memory serves, that the sin of covetousness would prove the final overthrow, of more professors of religion than any other sin whatever. In this opinion we concur. It is, perhaps, the only sin of which a man may be guilty without injuring his reputation as a Christian. Let him be guilty of drunkenness, profanity, fraud, adultery, or any of the gross sins, and he is at once denounced as a wicked person. But he may move heaven and earth to amass wealth, and withal have no higher end in view than his own gratification, and he will, nevertheless, be applauded as a well-doing man. We are not about to condemn that spirit of industry which enables a man to accumulate a fortune. On the contrary, it is much to be commended. But what we do condemn is the disposition to accumulate money merely for selfish ends. The true Christian is supposed to be one who lives not to himself, but to Him who died for him. 2 Cor. 5: 15. Compare Rom. 14: 7—9. He has been bought with a price, and is, therefore, under obligation to be wholly devoted to the Master who owns him. In the performance of worldly business he has no more right to make self the object for which he labors, than the slave upon one of our Southern plantations has. The master expects the slave to labor and toil for him. If the slave produces by his labor a hogshead of tobacco, or a tierce of rice, or a bale of cotton, the master claims it as belonging to him. If the slave goes out to work upon some other plantation, or in some other town, and earns in the course of the summer a hundred or five hundred dollars, not one cent of it can he claim for himself; all belongs to his master. The very fact of his being the property of another, deprives him of all right to labor for himself. He takes no anxious thought about himself. He is not concerned as to what he shall eat, or what he shall wear. It is his master's business to provide for him food and raiment, and his business to labor for the interests of his master. This is just the relation in which every Christian stands to the Lord Jesus Christ. Christ is the Master, and expects every one of his people to labor and toil and suffer for Him. Whatever business a Christian performs, he does it, not for himself, but for his Lord. Is his business that of a farmer? He cultivates, probably, a hundred acres of land. But for whom does he cultivate it? If he understands his duty, if he has learned the first lesson of Christianity, he does it all for his Master. He has undertaken the management of that farm expressly that with the avails of it he might promote his Master's cause in the earth. This was his sole object. At the end of the year, when the returns of his industry are realized, and he knows just what he has made, he goes and lays all at his Master's feet, and does not, like the lying Ananias, keep back part of the price. Not one cent does he claim as his own. 'It is all,' says he, 'the property of Him, whose I am, and whom I serve.' If he is a manufacturer, or a merchant, or a professional man, he acts on the same principle. When the avails of his labor come in, he makes a surrender of the whole, and holds himself ready to make such disbursement of it as his Lord may direct. 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do with it?' is the language of his heart.

And what answer does he get? Not any specific and direct response, as a voice from heaven, or a new revelation. No such thing is necessary. But his mind is drawn to a consideration of those general principles which the Master has given already in the Scriptures, to guide his people as to the right use of the property in their hands. His conscience will not suffer him to violate those principles, but will constrain him to act them out, and the world will reap the benefit. In acting out those principles, he does just what his Lord would have him to do. No doubt every one will assume to judge for himself whether his manner of using the property in his hands is in accordance with the divine requirement or not. But let him be careful, exceedingly careful, lest his judgment be warped by those lusts of the flesh, which, as a Christian, he is supposed to have crucified. If every professor of religion felt that all the money he made belonged to the Lord, we should witness very different condcut from what we generally do. One having the opportunity to buy a gaudy and expensive dress, would consider, not merely whether it was desirable, but whether his Master would justify such a use of the money. Or, if he has opportunity to procure some splendid article of furniture, or some other costly luxury, the question would be—not, 'Do I desire it? would it give me pleasurable feelings to possess it?' but, 'Would my Lord permit me thus to expend his money?' Yet how often do we see professed Christians act in such things without any regard to what their Lord would approve. In most cases they act over the part of the first transgressor. They see that the object of their desire will gratify some lust; it is 'good for food,' or it is 'pleasant to the eyes,' or it pleases the pride of their corrupt hearts in some way, and so, because money is in their hands, they resolve to have it. Yet perhaps the very next day the Lord makes a demand upon them for something to sustain the cause of truth in the earth, but they cannot afford it!

And this kind of behavior is repeated again and again. It is not once or twice in a life-time, that such an offense is committed, but year after year. Ask a man to-day for five dollars to send the gospel to the heathen, and he will tell you that he cannot afford it, because he has just been furnishing his house at a cost of about five hundred dollars. He has parted with all that he can possibly spare. Go to him next year, then, with the same request, and he will tell you that he must be excused, for he has just bought a carriage for which he had to pay about two hundred dollars. Go again the following year, and he has a similar plea. His daughter must have a piano, and he has just contracted for one at two hundred and fifty dollars. The fourth year it is no better. "I would be very glad to help in this cause," he says; "my will is good, but I have other expenses which I must meet. My carpets, which I bought when I commenced housekeeping, are much worn and faded, and my wife says that we must have new ones. We have not furniture enough either. There are many little articles which we have had to do without, as we thought we could not afford them—articles that were very necessary to our comfort; and now we must have them." The fifth application meets with no better success. Finally, he becomes vexed and excited, and says, "I don't believe in these things at any rate. As for the heathen, the Lord will convert them in his own time; and as for the poor whom you wish me to aid, let them go to work, and toil and sweat for their living, as honest people do. I will not be annoyed from year to year with such beggary." Thus the Lord's money remains in his hands, and serves no other purpose but to nourish his pride, his love of ease and worldly comfort. Such persons may be very righteous in their own estimation. They may neither swear, nor lie, nor steal, nor break the Sabbath. They may be able to "thank God that they are not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers." Nevertheless, their sin is written as with a pen of iron. They are living to themselves.

SACRAMENTO, April 19th.

When I closed my last letter, I was waiting for the steamer to return to this place. But just before her arrival, I was seized with a strong inclination to visit the mines, which I had not yet done—to see the glittering dust in its native bed. In about ten minutes I was on my way, with blankets on my shoulder, and portfolio for plants under my arm, for the "bars" of the Yuba. The sun was very warm, and the thermometer stood at 86° in the shade. It was more like July than April.

Nearly every one, who writes from here at this season, will remark upon the flowers that now cover the earth in such profusion. My path that day, for eighteen miles, was an uninterrupted blaze of beautiful flowers, one and another variety predominating alternately, and then all colors and forms mingled indiscriminately. Tell our lovers of Flora, that most beautiful coreopsis, and various species of pinks, fill the air with their perfume, while as many more beautiful and rarer flowers are unavoidably crushed at every step of the traveler, and the California poppy fairly dazzles the eye with its gorgeous, golden color. Alas! how many noble hearts are mouldering beneath so much beauty and life! How many eyes are watching, sleepless and tearful, for those who shall return no more to the hearth of home!

It was almost impossible to realize the change which has been produced in the region where, six months ago, we wound our slow and weary steps from the head waters of the Sacramento, sick and starving, through a desert. Canvas villages and inns have sprung up like magic, offering every thing to tempt the appetite and promote the comfort of the traveler.

Long Bar is the first place on the Yuba where mining is carried on. This is three miles long, and six miles from the prairie. As I came within sound of the ringing of the shovels, and the strokes of the rocker, it excited me not a little. Though so long a resident in California, and so near so many famous mining regions, I had never yet seen the mines; and, as I trudged along, I kept a bright look out for the lumps. I arrived about sundown at the camp of a friend, and found a good bed and plenty of good cheer. On account of the high water, this party were lying by, rather than waste their part of the "bar" by taking off only the top. They were very contented, and thought they liked the hills so well that they would prefer to spend their days there. I spent three days with them, very satisfactorily to myself, most of the time in collecting plants, of which I found some of exceeding beauty—one, a shrub about four feet high, with a clean glossy leaf, and flowers in form and color resembling an orange flower, with a fine perfume. An Indian called it "Tomoo," and signified its meaning by hanging one in his ear as an ear-drop. There are large numbers of persons along the rivers. This part was not much worked last year, as it yielded but little with the common rocker. Quicksilver, now, is the only means of working it. These machines require eight men to each, and yield on this bar from 7 to 50 ounces per day to each machine. The price for labor is $10 per day. The earth worked consists of stones from fifty pounds weight to fine sand; but the large stones preponderate. I took up some of the earth in several places, but could never find any gold. I finally took a pan, and, by patient and careful manipulation, I collected, in the course of four hours, and after nearly breaking my back, about forty cents' worth, which I will send you enclosed, as the extent of my gold operations in California.

I intended to have gone farther up the river, but the water was so high, and the accounts of snow were so discouraging, that I spent my time here. There is no sickness at the mines, except a few cases of scurvy. Two I saw—poor Sandwich Islanders, who had been in the employ of some party, who, finding them no longer useful, had deserted them, leaving them a tent and a few provisions.

The tendency of this solitary life in the wilderness, away from the influence of woman, is manifest. Coarseness of manner, and profanity that is shocking, are so common as to excite no attention. A man who was under our care last fall, told me this spring, that he should never return home to reside, for he had contracted such habits in the use of language as he could not conquer, and he was not aware of his profanity half of the time. It would break his mother's heart to hear him use such language.

It was grateful to me to feel the renovating influence of the mountains—to enjoy the scenery on the river, roaring through the rocky gorges—to roam, as of yore, along the babbling streams—to find new faces among the beautiful emblems of purity and truth that charmed me when a boy, and cheer me now, in riper years, with their silent admonitions. In returning, I left the road, and struck off on a round-about way over the mountains. There is little grass on the hills; flowering plants seem to have crowded out their less gay competitors.

On reaching Marysville, I found the Phœnix about to start for Fredonia, a town about thirty-five miles higher up the Feather river. We left in the morning, with nearly twenty passengers, among whom was the wife of Mr. C., who was one of the unfortunate party whose sufferings in the snow of the mountains, in the winter of 1846, are so widely known. She appeared youthful and refined; her husband is one of the wealthiest men in California. Our progress up the river was slow, owing to the rapidity of the current; and as it became evident that we should be out over night, Mrs. C. returned, with a party of gentlemen, on horseback. It was somewhat interesting to think, that we were ascending the river in the first steamer that had ever disturbed its waters—in a few years to be swarming with them. The Indians crowded the tops of their dirt cabins to gaze upon this new innovation of their solitudes. So we go; the poor "digger" stands as small a chance as others who are too weak to defend their rights. We reached, about sundown, a high bank of the river, where a group of white men and Indians were standing, who greeted us with firing guns and cheers; and we were told it was Fredonia. A luxuriant growth of grass covered the plain; majestic oaks spread themselves each over a large space of ground, and yet had plenty of room to spread farther. It was a delightful place for a town, and stakes driven about demonstrated that it was a town, and no mistake, though the grass was yet untrodden. Houses and goods were landed, and trade was commenced immediately with the miners, who could thus run their provisions directly into the mines without embarrassment from marsh or slough. From this place to "Long's Bar," on the Feather river, is fifteen miles, and the roads are good the year round. There is now about twenty feet of water in any part of the river up to Fredonia, but when the snow leaves the mountains, which is in May, the water begins to fall, and by the end of summer there is not water enough to float a whale-boat over the bars and rapids until the next December; but during this time the roads are good, and the necessity for river navigation is not so great. The time occupied in returning to Marysville was two hours and twenty minutes. Leaving Fredonia at ten minutes past 6 A. M., we returned to Sacramento at about 5 P. M., making several landings for wood. Ascending the same distance required twenty-seven hours, with the same number of landings; from which you will get an idea of the average rate of current. The distance is about 90 miles.

Sacramento is still in a state of siege. The water in the river is higher than any ground in the city, but the rise has been unattended with rain, and has been so gradual that through the unremitting exertions of the Mayor and people, the water has been kept out by means of a dyke. * * *

An old patient came to me to-day, who was badly wounded by two arrows while driving a team among the mountains. One of the arrows entered the arm just above the wrist, and passing between the bones came out on the opposite side, about six inches from the point where it entered; the other, from the great quantity of clothing that intervened, lodged its flinty head in his breast, from which he extracted it with his fingers. I have no doubt that there will be an exterminating war carried on soon between the miners and the Indians, unless some action is taken by Government to anticipate it. No one can doubt the result; the natives will be hunted as they hunt the deer.

Letters have been addressed to me from home, asking my opinion on certain things in California. There have been so many counter and conflicting statements about things here, that they do not know what to believe. I am not surprised at this, for it is difficult for the same persons to write twice without conflicting with his own statements. They may believe almost any thing; the country contains all the extremes of garden and desert, wealth and misery, sickness and health, beauty and ugliness, that can be found in any country. It is bound to be one of the greatest countries on the globe, for intelligence, wealth, and enterprise; but the presence of woman is needed to make a happy or a virtuous nation. * * *

I hope no friend of mine will come to this country without a wife, and all his household gods, even if he comes but for a few years. For those who come thus, there are many healthy and pleasant places, where competence and comforts are as sure as life and health. Families could live very comfortably here now, any where in the country not under water; and many are coming in. By next spring the country will have the appearance of having been settled for half a century. The pioneer must find a new field for his hardihood and daring. But I have said enough. J. D. B. S.

A COLLEGE—WHAT FOR?

If we are to have a Denominational College, we want, before we make the outlay to build and endow it, to be informed what are to be its denominational advantages. I infer, if it is to be denominational, that it must of necessity have a denominational faculty. If so, who are to fill the professorships? Who is to be President? Of course, denominational men. If we have the men qualified, they are unquestionably, a majority of them, already engaged in teaching in our academies. Will a transfer from a teacher's desk to a professor's chair, either make them better instructors or enlarge their circle of influence with those calling for instruction? If they will become better instructors, or instructors of more, by being professors in a college, than teachers in an academy, there is something gained.

It can not be true, that any of our educated teachers are ambitious to be called Rabbi, because already has the excessive democracy of the times dubbed each pedagogue professor. They are not ambitious. And yet it is believed, by grave and thinking men, that the resolutions of Associations and the Conference, touching a denominational College, Minerva like, were born by the expansion and bursting of some Jupiter's skull. From the shades of Academus has the inspiration gone forth, We must have a College. If our teachers are what we proudly claim for them, how far short of a college course will they leave those who resort to them for instruction? Really, do not our existing seminaries of learning afford all the advantages that a college would, and that, too, without an unnecessary outlay of fifty thousand dollars in stone and mortar, in the end to glory in the sobriquet of the "Seventh-day Baptist Denominational Stone-Heap," at ———; where? Who wants it? And who will show his parchment, "signed sealed and delivered" at such a place?

But we are admonished that the progress of the age demands a college, and that the academies and schools "on every hill-side and valley," demand educated teachers. The call for a college to educate teachers very much resembles the slave-holders' unceasing circular cry, "Raise more cotton, to buy more negroes, to raise more cotton, to buy more negroes," ad infinitum. The time has past when a man's character and influence are measured by his literary titles. When we see "A. B." appended to a man's name, we are at loss whether to expand it into "Bachelor of Arts," or "A Booby." And when we see a list of "A. M.s" connected with some college commencement, we are at a loss to know whether they are "Masters of Arts," or "fore noon" men, that is, men in the "fore noon of life," alias young men. Their after history is to develop their characters, without any collateral aid, even from their literary titles. Honorary titles do not honor men, but some men honor their titles. There may be danger of falling into the error of the frog in the fable endeavoring to swell itself to the dimensions of a cow.

All who understand our position as a sect of religionists, must feel that in all matters touching our denominational character we want able champions. And yet our success has been more brilliant as Davids than as Goliahs. A well-educated people and ministry can better detect the sophistry of learned ignorance; and a spiritual people and ministry can better detect and expose "pious frauds" and religious sin. Thorough education, with true piety as a people, will most of all serve the cause of religion. The weakness of a cause is suspected when it has no foundation of its own to rest upon, but shows itself in picking its opponents. Why do not some of those advocates of a college, who hide themselves in their incog., give us an argument standing on its own merits. If we are to have a College, "What for?"

IGNORAMUS.

AN OLD MEETING-HOUSE.—The Seventh-day Baptist Meeting-House in Newport, R. I., was built in the year 1730, and consequently, is now (1850) one hundred and twenty years old. Henry Collins and Jonathan Weeden were appointed by the church, Nov. 9th, 1729, trustees, to "take a deed of a lot of land of Mr. Almy for the church, and also to be a committee to build a new house, to undertake the whole affair of erecting said house, and to raise the money by subscription, the house to be 36 ft. by 26 ft." It was subsequently provided with a clock by the celebrated Claggett, the maker of the experimental apparatus for Dr. Franklin, which is yet in good condition. The following anecdote was related by the Rev. Wm. Bliss to his grandson, respecting this house of worship:—During the Revolutionary War, Newport was in the possession of the British troops, and many of the meeting-houses in the town were converted into barracks for the soldiers. The Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house was selected for this use; but when the officer, who was sent to take possession of it, and fit it for his majesty's use, opened the door, he discovered the ten commandments, written on two tables, resembling marble, over the pulpit, and immediately commanded his men to retire, observing that "he could not spoil a house in which were written the sacred laws of God." The house was accordingly saved, although of but little use to the Church during the captivity of the town. S.

BAPTIST FREE MISSION SOCIETY.—The American Baptist Free Mission Society recently held an annual meeting at Bristol, Ontario Co., N. Y. From a brief notice of it, which appears in the Christian Contributor, we learn that Rev. A. L. Post was appointed Corresponding Secretary of the Society, in place of C. P. Grosvenor, who has long held that office, but is now mostly occupied with the affairs of the N. Y. Central College. The publication interests of the people occupied a large share of attention, and measures are in progress to effect a union of the Christian Contributor and Western Christian, so as to have one paper issued under the patronage of the Society, probably from Utica, N. Y. The notice before us says, "The Society, after a long and animated discussion, sustained the action of the Board in the recall of Bro. Jones from Hayti." The reasons are not given.

DEATH OF MR. FREY.—Rev. Joseph Lemuel C. F. Frey, died at Pontiac, Michigan, on the 5th inst., in the 79th year of his age. He was born of Jewish parents, in Germany, and was for several years a reader in a Synagogue. When about twenty-five years of age, he became a Christian, and soon after a student of divinity at Berlin. He was subsequently engaged nearly all the time in efforts to convert the Jews. It was at his suggestion that the London Missionary Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews was founded, in 1808. In 1816 he came to the United States, and was for a time pastor of a Presbyterian church in New-York, but changing his views upon the subject of baptism, he joined the Baptist church, and was settled over congregations at Newark and at Sing-Sing, until the Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews was founded, and he became its missionary. He wrote several books, which display considerable learning and an amiable and honorable temper. The most popular of his productions is one entitled "Joseph and Benjamin," designed to illustrate the points of difference between the Jews and Christians

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—At a meeting of the Executive Committee on Monday of last week, it appeared that the recepts for the month had been $22,125; grants for the same period 1,373,496 pages; issues from the Depository $15,107; and the amount due on notes for printing paper was $37,171. The number of new Colporteurs commissioned since April 1, including theological students for their vacations, and several for the foreign emigrants, has been ninety-one. The number of publications printed and issued daily, averages more than 25,000. The circulation of the American Messenger is 164,000 monthly, exceeding by nearly one-half the circulation of any other periodical in this country or in Europe. An edition in the German is also issued, numbering about 12,000 copies.

RECEIPTS OF BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.—The receipts, during the past year, of the principal Religious and Benevolent Institutions whose anniversaries were celebrated in New York, show a gratifying increase over previous years. The aggregate is larger than was ever before contributed to the same objects during a similar period:—

American Tract Society,	$258,300	$308,423
American Bible Society,	251,870	284,614

SUNDAY TRAVELING IN NEW JERSEY.—The Newark Advertiser says that numerous applications have been made to the Directors of the New Jersey Railroad Co., to run a Sunday morning train between New York and Rahway, at an early hour, so early as not to interfere with regular church services. It is stated, that it will be a great accommodation to many young persons employed in New York city, who are not able to visit their parents on any other day, as also to others, who have been in the habit of attending church with their friends and relatives. It is also alledged, that the resort to steamboats, omnibuses, hacks, and other vehicles, by persons visiting various places on the line of the Railroad, has been so general and so annoying on the highways, and in the towns and villages, that a railroad train is deemed by many the least desecration of the Sabbath. The Directors will, it is said, give the matter early consideration.

UNION ACADEMY, AT SHILOH, N. J.—A well-printed Catalogue of the officers and students of Union Academy, at Shiloh, N. J., for the year ending June 24, 1850, has just been issued. In the Classical Department there are 28 students, of whom 12 are gentlemen, and 16 ladies. In the department for general studies, there are 74 students, of whom 32 are gentlemen, and 42 ladies. Total number of students, 102. We learn from the Catalogue, that a Department of Agricultural Chemistry has recently been formed in connection with the Institution, and that fifty-three individuals have subscribed twenty-five dollars each, making a fund of $1,325, for the purpose of procuring apparatus for that Department.

ARRIVAL OF MISSIONARIES.—Letters received at the Rooms of the American Missionary Association, announce the arrival of three Missionaries, Rev. D. B. Bradley, M. D., Rev. L. B. Lane, M. D., and Prof. J. Silsby, with their wives, at Singapore, March 8, all in good health. This company sailed from New York in the Ernani, October 24. Their voyage was much protracted in consequence of calms, strong adverse currents, and monsoon head winds. In the Straits of Banca they were twenty days in going the distance of 80 miles.

UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—A Triennial Catalogue of Union Theological Seminary in the City of New York, (June, 1850,) has come to hand. The Institution was founded January 18, 1836; opened for instruction December 5, 1836; incorporated March 17, 1839. Two hundred and ninety-five persons have completed the regular course of study in the Seminary, of whom twelve have died, and two hundred and eighty-three are now living. Twenty-five have gone, or are soon to go, as missionaries to foreign countries; three have gone as missionaries to California, and three to Minnesota; the remainder, scattered all over the country, are laboring as pastors, teachers, agents, editors, &c. The present Professors are—of Biblical Literature, Rev. Edward Robinson, D.D. L.L.D.; of Systematic Theology, Rev. Henry White, D.D.; of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology, Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, D.D. Rev. Luther Halsey, D.D., lectures on Biblical and Church History; and Wm. Wadden Turner, A. M., gives instruction in the elements of Hebrew, &c.

COLLISION OF FORREST AND WILLIS.—The quiet of Washington Square, New York, was disturbed one day last week by an encounter between Edward Forrest, the tragedian, and Nathaniel P. Willis, editor of the Home Journal. It seems that as Mr. Willis was passing through the Square, he was overtaken by Mr. Forrest and two of his friends, knocked down, and severely beaten with a whip or cane made of gutta percha. Mr. Forrest and Mr. Willis were immediately arrested and taken before a Police Court, where, as the latter refused to make a complant, both of them were held to bail to keep the peace for six months. The cause of the affray is pretty well known to the public. Mr. Forrest has for a long time been trying to get a divorce from his wife, charging her with improprieties, and implicating Mr. Willis, who has taken a somewhat active part in her defense.

WATER-CURE CONVENTION.—The advocates of Water as an agent in the cure of Disease, held a Convention in New York last week, at which they organized what they call the "American Hygienic and Hydropatic Association of Physicians and Surgeons." One provision of their Constitution is, that no person is to be admitted to membership without a certificate of a regular medical education, and testimonials of having practiced Hydropathy one year. A Committee was appointed to prepare an Address to the public, which may be looked for at an early day. At the next meeting of the Association, Dr. S. O. Gleason, of Cortland County, is to be the orator; Dr. T. L. Nichols, of New York, alternate.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE is one of the most interesting and valuable publications of the day. It is a literary repository, richly and amply filled with the most readable articles of the Reviews and Journals of Europe. Being issued every week, it is able to keep pace with the movements of the world, and to exhibit very fully the spirit of the age as developed in its literature, science, commerce, and politics. Published by E. Littell & Co., Boston; Dewitt & Dovenport, Tribune Buildings, New York; Getz & Buck, Philadelphia; W. Taylor & Co., Baltimore; Wm. Strickland, Mobile; J. C. Morgan, New Orleans; Post & Co., Cincinnati.

THE GREAT ROGUE-CATCHER DEAD.—Jacob Hays, the oldest officer of the N. Y. City Government, and the oldest officer in the county, died at his residence in New-York, on the 21st inst., in the 79th year of his age. Mr. Hays was born in Westchester County, in 1772, was appointed to office by Mayor Edward Livingston, in 1801, and has been High Constable of New York for nearly half a century. He was the terror of rascals of every grade, and in the course of his official career, quietly brought to the bar of justice scores of the most daring villains, whose discovery seemed for a time very problematical.

A THUNDER-STORM.—New York was visited by a very severe thunder-storm on Thursday afternoon last, which did considerable damage. A number of houses were struck and set on fire by the lightning. The steamer Knickerbocker had just started on her passage to Norwich, Ct., and was driven on a dangerous rock near Hurl Gate; her passengers were immediately taken off, and she was got off after a day's effort. Several small boats in the vicinity of New York were upset, and three persons were drowned.

DESTRUCTION OF THE NAUVOO TEMPLE.—In 1845, the Mormons completed their famous Temple at Nauvoo. In 1848, it was destroyed by fire—all its timbers having been consumed, leaving only the four walls standing. When the Iconian Community wanted a place to settle, they fixed upon the vicinity of Nauvoo, and bought the Temple, with a view of refitting it for schools, refectories, &c. But their hopes are now disappointed, a hurricane having passed over the place on the 27th of May, which prostrated what remained of this monument of Mormon folly.

NEW YORK CENTRAL COLLEGE.—The exercises of this Institution of the Free Mission Baptists have been somewhat interrupted of late by sickness among the scholars, two of whom have died. The Christian Contributor of June 13, says that the sickness has abated, and the recitations have been resumed. The commencement exercises of the institution occur on the Fourth of July.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. Second-day, June 17.

After the transaction of morning business, and the consideration of sundry private bills, the Compromise Bill came up. The question was on the amendment of Mr. Soule, providing that when New Mexico and Utah want to come into the Union they may come with or without slavery. Mr. Webster made a speech, reaffirming the position taken in his speech of March 7, as to the uselessness of the Wilmot Proviso, and maintaining the consistency of that speech with all other speeches and acts of his political life. Some discussion followed, in the course of which Mr. Seward stated that he knew no circumstances which could induce him to vote for the admission of slave States formed from these territories. Mr. Baldwin then moved to amend the amendment so as to provide that States may in due time be admitted from the territories according to the principles of the Constitution. This was followed by a passage between Mr. Cass and Mr. Hale, in which the Senator from Michigan suffered badly from the ever ready wit and good nature of the Senator from New Hampshire. The question then came up on Soule's amendment, and it was lost by a vote of 12 yeas to 38 nays.

A Message was received from the President, in reply to a resolution of the Senate, inquiring whether any orders had been issued to any military officers at Santa Fé, to hold possession against the authority of Texas, or in any way to embarrass the exercise of her jurisdiction over that country. The President says that no such orders have been given. The boundary between Texas and New Mexico is still in dispute, concerning which the President remarks :—

"Information has been received recently, that a certain Robert S. Neighbors, styling himself Commissioner of the State of Texas, has proceeded to Santa Fé, with the view of organizing counties in that district under the authority of Texas. While I have no power to decide the question of boundary, and no desire to interfere with it as a question of title, I have to observe, that the possession of the territory into which it appears that Mr. Neighbors has thus gone, was actually acquired by the United States from Mexico, and has since been held by the United States, and in my opinion ought so to remain until the question of boundary shall have been adjusted by some competent authority. Meanwhile, I think there is no reason for seriously apprehending that Texas will practically interfere with the possession of the United States"

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

An ineffectual attempt was made to introduce a resolution, making the special order of the day for Monday next, and thereafter until they shall have been disposed of, the bills for the payment of Revolutionary and other Pensions, Naval Pensions, Expenses of the Military Academy, Indian Department service, of the Post Office Department, expenses of the Navy and Army, and for Fortifications of the year, ending 30th June, 1851. A vote was passed to meet hereafter at 11 o'clock instead of 12 o'clock. Two resolutions of inquiry were adopted. A resolution was also adopted instructing the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill granting to each State in which there is, or may hereafter be, a public institution for the deaf and dumb, blind, or insane, a township of land for the use of such institution. An attempt was made to get the California bill out of Committee soon, but to no purpose.

IN SENATE. Third-day, June 18.

The Senate spent the whole day in considering the Compromise Bill, a great part of the talk being upon the question of slavery in the territories. Adjourned without coming to a vote.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

In the House, the day was worn out in reconsidering a resolution already passed, which inculpated the Secretary of the Treasury for allowing balances to be transferred from one appropriation to another—it is alledged, in violation of law. The resolution was not disposed of.

IN SENATE. Fourth-day, June 19.

The Compromise Bill, as usual, was the principal subject of discussion. Some half-a-dozen amendments were proposed, which led to much talk, without materially changing the provisions of the bill. At the conclusion of the session, the day for engrossing the bill appeared farther off than ever, and many of its friends felt much discouraged.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Bayly of Va., from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1850, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill granting bounty lands to soldiers of the war of 1812—'13—'15, with Great Britain; the Indian wars of 1811, the Florida war of 1835, and the war known as Gen. Wayne's of 1792 to 1795, that have not heretofore been provided for. Numerous short speeches, pro and con, were made, but no action was taken upon the bill.

IN SENATE. Fifth-day, June 20.

Mr. Clay presented the resolutions of the adjourned Constitutional Convention of Kentucky, in favor of the Compromise Report.

Mr. King reported a joint resolution in favor of presenting a gold medal to Capt. Cook for rescuing the passengers of the ill-fated Caleb Grimshaw, which was passed.

Mr. King's bill for land for a railroad from Selma, Ala., to the Tennessee River, was amended and passed.

The California Bill was taken up at 1 o'clock; the question pending on Mr. Underwood's amendment, providing for testing the boundary of Texas in the Supreme Court in case of rejection by that State of the propositions made to her in the bill. The amendment, after additional debate, was rejected by yeas 16; nays 24.

A discussion then arose upon a proposition to amend, so as to give California but one representative in Congress, instead of two, until an actual enumeration of inhabitants shall show that she is entitled to more. The amendment was lost; after which the Senate adjourned over to Second-day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House talked on the bill granting Bounty Lands to Soldiers in the War of 1812, Gen. Wayne's Indian War, and the Florida War. At 1 o'clock, the debate was stopped, except as it was continued on the five minute system till adjournment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. Sixth-day, June 21.

The bill granting bounty lands to the survivors of all the late wars, not heretofore provided for, was taken up, several amendments moved, numerous five-minute speeches made, and finally, without acting upon the bill, the House adjourned over to Second-day.

AWFUL STEAMBOAT DISASTER.

One of the most fatal disasters which it has ever fallen to our lot to record, has just occurred on Lake Erie. The steamer Griffith, Capt. Roby, left Buffalo on Sunday morning, June 16, for Toledo, with a full crew, 45 cabin passengers, and 256 steerage passengers. When about 15 miles from Cleveland, she took fire and burned to the water's edge. Between forty and fifty persons only, out of more than three hundred on board, reached the shore, showing the destruction, by fire and water, of over two hundred and fifty lives. One hundred and forty dead bodies were lying on the beach in the vicinity of the disaster at one time. Only two females, and no children, were saved.

The Griffith was a new boat, of medium dimensions, and of excellent character with the traveling public. She had just been purchased by Capt. Roby, a worthy officer, who had entered in command of her. This, we think, was his first trip, and it has proved of dreadful fatality to himself and an interesting family, all of whom fell victims to the fire or flood,

Mr. Franklin Heth, formerly of Buffalo, but lately of New York, was on board with his wife and four children. He only of the family escaped.

Mr. C. Spencer, of Ashtabula, Ohio, was a passenger, and gives the following account of his escape: "I saved myself by swimming ashore. There were 300 passengers on board, and out of that number 50 only were saved. The steamer was about three-fourths of a mile from shore when she was abandoned, and 15 miles east of Cleveland. The fire was supposed to have originated from the boilers or the furnace. The passengers were thick around the boat, and a great many that could not swim would hold on to others and drown them as well as themselves. It was a sorrowful and heart-rending scene. The manner in which I got out of their way was by jumping about twenty feet into the water, and taking directly out into the lake. I then swam up a little distance to get out of the reach of others and to prevent them pulling me down. I then swam for the shore. There were about 5,000 people on shore when I reached it, from Cleveland, Willoughby, Painsville and Fairport."

Mr. R. G. Parks, of Beaver, who came on board the Griffith at Erie, says that when about 14 miles below Cleveland, and about 4 o'clock in the morning, the Griffith was discovered to be on fire around her smoke pipe, on the main deck. She was about three miles from shore. The second mate, then on watch, gave orders to run her ashore. The boat was then headed for the shore, and when about half a mile from shore she struck a bar, and before the flames burst out above. Immediately after she struck, the flames burst out in forward and after cabin and pilot house. An officer gave word to the passengers to save themselves. Capt. Roby gave orders for the wood piles to be thrown over, which was done. The cabin and deck passengers were then jumping over in crowds. The Captain remained on board, on the upper deck, forward of the wheel house, until the flames drove him off. He then threw over his wife, children, mother-in-law, and the barber's wife, and jumped in himself, and remained on the surface a moment with his wife in his arms, when they sank together.

The Buffalo Express, of June 19, gives the following connected account of the matter:

The fire was discovered between 4 and 5 o'clock in the morning, issuing in flame from the combing of one of the smoke pipes. A strong and determined effort was made to extinguish it, but without avail. Soon, it broke out below and communicated with the cabin, which, in ten minutes time, was wrapped in flame. The alarm was sounded and the passengers waked from their slumbers and told to save themselves. The boat was headed in shore, and the crew and passengers abandoned themselves to despair, as the flames spread with such fearful rapidity as to cut off all hope of escape except by taking to the water. The scene of consternation that ensued was appalling beyond description. The only place that was not pervaded by flame or suffocating smoke was forward, and there the three hundred human beings were huddled, presenting a sight that would appall the stoutest heart. When within less than a mile of shore, the boat struck and lost her headway.

As this moment the flames were fast approaching the passengers, and soon the heat became so intolerable as to force them into the lake to save themselves from the consuming fire. Within five minutes after the boat stopped she was entirely deserted, and the lake filled with the three hundred persons struggling in the flood. Husbands threw their wives and children into the struggling mass below, and then followed to share a common fate. Mother after mother was seen to toss their offspring overboard, and then betake themselves to the waves in the vain hope of saving them. The lake was still, and the water clear, and within a few minutes nearly all this vast multitude had disappeared from the surface, and could be seen on the bottom clinging to each other in the cold embrace of death. The family of Mr. Heth was found in a group. Captain Roby was locked in the arms of his wife—and poor Donavan, the steward, fell a victim to a determination to save the daughter of Capt. Roby, and was found with her folded to his breast.

Mr. Forsyth, Clerk of the Troy, who spent an hour at the scene of disaster on the afternoon of the occurrence, states that there were 35 cabin passengers on board, and 250 steerage, mostly emigrants, nearly all of whom were lost.

An English woman and her four children, who had been sent for by the husband, a resident of Cincinnati, had risen early and dressed themselves in their best to greet their husband and father—all were lost.

The row of corpses along the beach, with green leaves laid over the face of each, and the limbs distorted, was a sight we hope never again to witness.

The boat was insured in Buffalo for $27,775, and Capt. Roby recently had his life insured for $6,000.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Cambria arrived at New-York on Sunday last, with European news to June 8, the substance of which will be found below.

England.

The English press has wasted an immense amount of ink and paper relative to the invasion of Cuba by Lopez. The matter has given rise to long discussions in Parliament. The expedition was characterized by all manner of hard names.

Although the Greek question is still unsettled, there appears to be little apprehension that the difficulty between the several Governments concerned will lead to any serious result.

From a report recently presented to Parliament, it appears that the largest importation of Wheat and Flour this year into Great Britain, has been from France. The quantity from the United States is comparatively small.

France.

The Electoral Law was passed on the 31st May, by 433 to 241. The President promulgated the bill as the law of France on Monday. The preparations of the Government in anticipation of a revolt appear to have been superfluous, as the opposition seemed to be disposed to let the whole affair pass over quietly, at least for the present.

A bill had been laid before the Assembly by the Finance Minister for increasing the President's salary from 1,000,000 to 3,000,000 francs. All accounts agree in representing Louis Napoleon as suffering from pecuniary embarrassments.

A Committee of the Assembly has under consideration the memorial for removing the seat of Government from Paris.

M. Larmartine is about to proceed to his estate in Smyrna.

It is atated that Mazzini, with ten other Italian refugees, passed through Paris a few days ago, on their way to London.

The prosecution of editors, for articles offensive to the Government, continues, several instances having occurred in the week preceding the latest dates from Paris.

The Mayor of Bleneau, department of the Yonne, has been sentenced to 100 f. fine by the Police Court of Ioligny, for having circulated Socialist writings.

A letter from Dreux states that all the crops of every description in that neighborhood have been destroyed by a hail storm. The hail-stones were as large as pigeons' eggs.

Italy.

The Pope has published an address and explanation of the startling events of his reign, and commenting on the affairs of the Roman Catholic world. He especially stigmatizes the prosecution of the Archbishop of Turin by the Piedmontese Government The houses of English residents and others are being closely searched for Bibles, not even excepting the British Consul's.

The Pope has declined granting a second audience to Dr. Townsend, who had returned to Naples on purpose.

The financial difficulties of the Roman Government continue to form a question of most vital importance, and a thousand alarming rumors circulate with respect to the mode in which it intends to get rid of the plague of a paper currency.

Miscellaneous.

A correspondent of the Tribune says that political matters in Germany are at present, if anything, worse than previous to 1848. The people in general have fallen, as regards such, into a complete lethargic state, and despotism is playing more pranks than heretofore.

Kossuth's children left Pesth by steamer on the 26th ult. for Kutayeh, in Asia Minor, where their parents are. They were accompanied to the quay by a crowd of persons, who bade them farewell in the most touching manner.

The Conference of Preachers of the Prussian Church had voted an address of congratulation and support to the Bishop of Exeter for his conduct in the Gorham case.

By the upsetting of a barge on the Wesel, nearly 100 persons, forming part of a religious procession to the convent near Neumark, Prussia, had been drowned; the greater part of the pilgrims were women.

The Emperor of Russia arrived in Warsaw on the 24th ult., from St. Petersburg. During the stay of the Emperor at Warsaw, all the regulations of the police are enforced with the utmost severity.

Attempted Insurrection of Slaves.—A letter from Guadaloupe, W. I., dated May 23d, says: On the night of the 12th inst. the city of Point Petre was fired by the negroes, that being a signal for a general insurrection. However, the negroes did not succeed in entering the city, having been deterred by the prompt measures of the citizens, but sundry overseers' houses were burnt to the ground, and the smoking ruins and destitute families presented a scene difficult to describe. The city has been fired four different times since, by which eighteen houses have been burned. The Governor has put the city in a state of siege, and for the present it is considered safe. No citizen is allowed to be out after 9 o'clock. Several conspirators have been arrested, and will be tried, and probably will be shot. The Governor-General is expected to-day with troops from Martinique. We have at present about eight hundred troops and a body of Militia, (the latter all colored) under orders. God alone knows what the end may be, but to judge of the future from the past, it may yet form a second edition of the St. Domingo tragedy.

The Boston Shipping List contains a list of the vessels now on their way to California, corrected down to the latest dates. The number vessels that have left the Atlantic ports in the United States for California is 1,227, viz: 379 ships, 343 barks, 264 brigs, 207 schooners, 2 sloops (one of these is at St. Thomas in distress, and will return to Boston), and 28 steamers.

Two Weeks Later from California.—The steamer Crescent City, from Chagres, arrived at New York on Second-day morning last, with news and mails from California to May 15. San Francisco was visited by another terrible fire on the 4th of May, which destroyed over two hundred and forty buildings, and property valued at between four and five millions of dollars—more, it is said, than could be destroyed in any other city in the same space. It is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary, and $5,000 reward is offered for his detection. The reports from the mining regions are quite favorable. New digging ground has recently been discovered in several places, concerning which large stories are told.

The American Prisoners at Havana.—By the Bark Rapid, Havana papers to June 13th have been received. The trial of the prisoners taken at Woman's Island was still progressing, on board of the Spanish 74, lying in the port. A large number of gun boats were kept rowing around her to prevent any persons from communicating with her. The United States Consul, Mr. Campbell, and Commander Randolph, asked permission to see them, but the authorities refused to allow them to hold any communication with them, stating that they would be tried by the laws of maratime nations, and if found guilty they should be dealt with accordingly. There have been several deaths among the prisoners. The Captains and crews of the bark Georgia and brig Susan Loud, were kept in confinement on board of the same vessel with those who were taken off Woman Island.

The Late Storm in Illinois.—We continue, says the Galena Advertiser, to receive accounts of destruction by the storm that passed over the middle of the State a few days ago. The Fulton Republican says much damage was done on Spoon River. Wheat, fruit, &c. in large quantities, were destroyed. A letter from Havana says: "The growing wheat crop, for a space of six miles wide, was partially, and on many farms wholly destroyed. Many houses were blown down or injured. The hurricane accompanying the hail was terrific. The damage in this county, as far as heard from, may be estimated at $100,00o." The storm was equally furious in Warren County. The Obuawka Spectator says: "Several gentlemen living near Swan Creek had, in addition to the growing crops, a number of colts, cattle, sheep and hogs killed by the hail."

SUMMARY.

The Carrolton Democrat says the Murrell plan of selling negroes and enticing them away to sell them again has been practiced upon a citizen of Carroll County. The fellow sold two negro men for $2,000, and in 3 or 4 weeks the owner came, proved property and took them home. The thief has been lodged in jail. His plan was to keep selling the negroes till he acquired as much money as he wanted, then carry the negroes to a free State and divide the money.

We learn from the Gloucester Telegraph that, notwithstanding the depression of the fishing business, and the severe disasters which have visited the fishermen of Cape Ann the past spring, with their accustomed enterprise, they are making arrangments to pursue this business with increased vigor and energy. The Telegraph says, "About fifteen or twenty new vessels, costing from $60,000 to $80,000, will be added to our fleet the present year."

A lead mine has been recently discovered in Prospect, Me. The Belfast Signal says that the vein of ore makes its appearance in a ledge beneath low-water mark on the shore of Penobscot River, and thence runs under ground, following the direction of the ledge. An analysis of several samples, differing from each other in value, has been made by Dr. Jackson of Boston, which gives as a mean 75 per cent. of lead, and 13 of silver.

We learn from the Coldwater (Mich.) Sentinel, that the County Treasury of Branch County was robbed on the night of the 10th inst. of $1,400. The office and safe are both supposed to have been entered by false keys, as no marks were discovered about the windows or doors. $1,200 of it was the school money just distributed, in Michigan Insurance bills. The Sheriff has offered $500 reward for the thief and money, or $300 for the thief.

Mexican papers contain accounts of the terrible ravages of the Cholera. In Tabasco the disease had broken out with great violence. At Queretaro the number of deaths since the commencement of the epidemic amounted to 728. The Government has decided, in case the Cholere should attack the capital, to form a new cemetery at Molino del Rey.

Gen. Paez, the Venezuelan hero, was to embark at Cumana, May 24, on board a Venezuelan steamer for St. Thomas. Thence he will probably come to the United States. He leaves his country as an exile.

The extensive Powder Mill of Messrs. Lyman & Fenton, in Bennington, Vt., was blown up on Saturday evening, the 15th inst. at about 11 o'clock. The machinery was extensively damaged, but no lives were lost.

In Washington, on Sunday afternoon last, there was a heavy thunder storm, and several buildings in the heart of the city were struck by lightning. Many persons were stunned, but none seriously injured.

Dr. Wm. R Winston was tried lately in Eaton, Ohio, for seducing Harriot Keever, aged 19, and adjudged to pay her father $15,000. Winston is a married man and a doctor. Miss Keever was residing with him as a patient.

At a recent meeting of the trustees and faculty of New York University, Rev. George W. Bethune, D. D., was unanimously elected Chancellor of the University, in the place of Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen.

50,000 baskets of Strawberries were brought to New York by the Paterson train on Friday night. They were picked mostly in Bergen County, N. J.

Late advices from Point Petre state that the Government had succeeded in suppressing the insurrection among the negroes, but not until several of the ringleaders were shot.

The little steamboat Swallow, running from New York to Dobb's Ferry, was burnt near New York on Sabbath morning last. There were sixty or seventy passengers on board, all of whom were taken off and saved, except a child, which was thrown overboard by the mother, who jumped after it, and she only was fished up.

The Supreme Court at Boston have delivered an opinion on the petition of Prof. Webster for a writ of error. They are unanimous in dismissing the petition, considering that every form necessary to constitute a legal trial was complied with.

MARRIED,

June 4, by Rev. W. B. Gillett, Mr. Eden Boice, of Rahway, to Miss Isabel F. Randolph, of Plainfield, N. J.

In Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 8th of June, 1850, by Daniel Potter, Esq., Mr. Jason L. Worden to Miss Phebe A. Bliven, all of Alfred.

DIED,

June 14th, Nehemiah F. Randolph, of Piscataway, N. J., after a painful illness of two months, which he bore with the meekness and patience of a child of God. He had been for a number of years a worthy and faithful member of the church of God, faithful to his duty, always willing to bear his part; it was for him but to know that a work was necessary to be done, and then, without hesitating, he was ready to do it. In the death of this brother, his family and the church suffer a great loss; but their loss is his gain. W. B. G.

In Plainfield, Otsego Co., N. Y., May 30th, Mrs. Mary Langworthy, consort of Mr. Henry Langworthy, and daughter of Mr. Amos Rogers, of Preston, N. Y., in the 37th year of her age. Mrs. L. became pious when about 16 years of age, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Preston, then under the pastoral care of her grandfather, Eld. Davis Rogers. She bore, with much patience, her last painful illness; and gave to her friends satisfactory evidence that her only hope and confidence were placed upon Jesus. She has left an affectionate husband, and many relatives and friends, to lament their loss.

In Westerly, R. I., April 14th, 1850, Mr. Joel Crandall, aged 79 years. He left a widow and several children to mourn the loss of a kind father and an affectionate husband.

In Hopkinton, R. I., May 31st, Rowland Babcock, aged 77 years. They rest from their labors and their works follow them.

Eclectic Magazine for the Year 1850.

THE Eclectic Magazine of Foreign Literature, Science, and Art, aims to present to its readers a complete survey of the whole field of British Periodical Literature, comprising the selections of all the articles of the most able and celebrated Reveiws, Magazines, and Journals, which have any interest or value to American readers. It not only contains the articles which are desirable in those periodicals reprinted in this country, but in the far greater variety of able and popular Reveiws, Magazines, &c., which form so splendid an element of the literature of the day, and which are inaccessible to the mass of American readers, except by some such medium as the Eclectic Magazine. By omitting what is merely local in interest or feeble in character, the ample size of the Eclectic Magazine enables the editor to embody all that is really desirable in the whole range of journalism. As only the best articles of each periodical are selected, it is evident that the contents of the Eclectic Magazine must be superior to those of any one, however great or celebrated; and, taken together, must constitute a more desirable and able body of periodical literature than can be found elsewhere in the same compass.

Each number is embellished with a suberb steel engraving, from the well-known burin of Mr. Sartain, of subjects of elevated character and general interest, including portraits of distinguished living authors and celebrities, making twelve rich and elegant prints in a year.

TERMS.

The Eclectic Magazine is issued on the first of every month, in numbers of 144 large 8vo. pages each, on fine paper, making three volumes a year, with title-pages and indexes. Price $5 per year, if paid strictly in advance—otherwise invariably $6.

Miscellaneous.

STRANGE INSTINCT OF THE DEER.

The large American panther has one inveterate and deadly foe, the black bear. Some of these immense bears will weigh eight hundred pounds, and their skin is so tough that a musket-ball will not penetrate it. As the panther invariably destroys all the cubs which come in her path, so does the bear take great pains to destroy the panther, and fortunate indeed is that animal who escapes the embrace of this black monster. The following exciting and interesting scene is related by a gentleman who was an eye-witness:—

A large deer was running at full speed, closely pursued by a panther. The chase had been a long one; for, as they came nearer, I could perceive both of their long, parched tongues hanging out of their mouths, and their bounding, though powerful, was no longer elastic as usual. The deer having discovered in the distance a large black bear, playing with her cubs, stopped a moment to sniff the air, then coming still nearer, he made a bound, with head extended, to ascertain if Bruin kept her position. As the panther was closing with him, the deer wheeled sharp around, and turning back almost upon his own trail, passed within thirty yards of his pursuer, who, not being able at once to stay his career, gave an angry growl and followed the deer again, but at a distance of some hundred yards. Hearing the growl, the bear drew his body half out of of the bushes, remaining quietly on the lookout. Soon the deer again appeared, but his speed was much reduced; and as he approached toward the spot where the bear lay concealed, it was evident that the animal was calculating his distance with admirable precision. The panther, now expecting easily to seize his prey, followed about thirty yards behind, his eyes so intently fixed on the deer that he did not see Bruin at all. Not so the bear. She was aware of the close vicinity of her wicked enemy, and she cleared the briers and squared herself for action, when the deer, with a beautiful and powerful spring, dashed clean over the bear's head, and disappeared. At the moment he took the leap, the panther was close upon him, and was just balancing himself for a spring, when he perceived, to his astonishment, that now he was faced by a formidable adversary, not the least disposed to fly. He crouched, lashing his flanks with his long tail, while the bear, about five yards from him, remained like a statue, looking at the panther with her fierce glaring eyes.

One minute they remained thus; the panther, his sides heaving with exertion, agitated, and apparently undecided; the bear perfectly calm and motionless. Gradually the panther crawled backward, till at a right distance for a spring, when, throwing all his weight upon his hind parts, to increase its power, he darted upon the bear like lightning, and fixed his claws into her back. The bear, with irresistible force, seized the panther with her two fore-paws, pressing it with the weight of her body, and rolled over it. I heard a heavy grunt, a plaintive howl, a crashing of bones, and the panther was dead. The cub of the bear came to ascertain what was going on, and after a few minutes' examination of the victim, it strutted down the slope of the hill, followed by the mother, who was apparently unhurt.

A HUNGARIAN BARON.

As one of the last characteristic barons of feudalism, I may name the Baron Palocsay. On his manor he never permitted any of the county officers to execute the decrees of the county; but requested to have them immediately communicated to him, and always enforced them himself most conscientiously, even when they were against his own interest; but he jealously refused to allow any one but himself to rule on his estates. As he spent immense sums on elections, and by his superb hospitality and beneficence had great ascendancy over the county officers, they often yielded to his feudal whims; as also, no less willingly, did his numerous guests. From time to time, especially in winter, the castle, where the old baron dwelt the whole of the year, being in a lofty and bleak situation, would chance to be without visitors. At this, his lordship felt annoyed, and in such cases habitually sent out in search of guests. His servents went to the high-road that leads to Galicia and Szepes, and when they saw a traveling carriage, they forced the travelers to turn to the castle, where the baron, without listening in the least to their protestations, entertained them for three days in the most princely manner, because, as he said, "The Hungarian has a right to keep his guests for three days: if they are willing to remain longer, it is a great honor to the host." This notion many Hungarians still retain, even if they no longer enforce it as practically as the old baron used to do. Indeed, I know of the case of a Mr. S——, who when once he came on a visit to a Hungarian country gentleman, remained for seven years in the house of his host. This certainly was a little eccentric, but visits for several months are not unusual; and persons who come with three or four children may be heard to apologize for not having brought with them the rest of the family. Baron Palocsay's castle, however, never presented a more curious aspect than every year in autumn, which, in the highlands, is the general wedding season with the peasant, who rarely enters into this auspicious state until after the harvest, when his most pressing labors are over. At that season the baron used to assemble in his hall all peasant girls, from sixteen to twenty years old, and all the lads, from twenty-two to twenty-six, belonging to his manor; which had a Slavoc population. He had them ranged opposite to one another, sorted them pair by pair, and said: "Thou Janci (John) art precisely fit for Marcsa (Mary), and thou Andras (Andrew), for Hancsa (Anne)," and so on. The couples thus designated went to the chapel, where the chaplain announced their marriages, which, after a fortnight were performed, and every one of the newly-married received a cow and many other accommodations for their establishment. When, however, one of the lads objected to the choice made for his benefit, and mentioned his disinclination for Hancsa, and his preference for Hya (Ellen,) the baron would reply, that he did not believe it, and obliged the lad, as a proof of his love, to endure twenty-five lashes. If he underwent this trial, he was free to choose for himself.

[Memoir of a Hungarian Lady.

MUMMIFICATION.

Mr. Gliddon, the distinguished lecturer on Egypt, delivered the concluding lecture of a series, at the Tremont Temple, in Boston, on the 7th inst. He commenced with some remarks on the origin of Mummification, which he traced to the practice of burying in the sand, which in Egypt contained alum, niter, and another salt, that preserved the bodies. He fixed the age of this Mummy, by the coffin and mode of embalming with bitumen, and by other marks, to as late a date as 1500 years B. C. Mummies continued to be made as late as the fourth or fifth century, A. D., and there must have been as many as 500 million embalmed during the 4000 years continuance of the practice, at an expense of 300 millions of dollars, which went to the priests. His opinion was, that the practice was first adopted from convenience, and that it owed its continuance partly to the fact that it brought a revenue to the priests.

In regard to the Mummy exhibited to the audience, Mr. Gliddon said that the outer case, the inner coffin, and the carving of the face on both, were those of a female; and so was the inscription. But the body turned out to be that of a man. But mistakes would occur in the best regulated families; and where there were 7,000 bodies on hand at the same time, it was no wonder that one should occasionally get into the wrong coffin. He then read the letter of Mr. Harris, who obtained the Mummy, who said this kind of case usually contained the best kind of Mummy. It has been authenticated, also, on the way. The coffin was that of a first-class Mummy, but the wrong body had got into it.

Mr. Gliddon said he had discovered, on the leather straps across the breast, the name of the King, in whose reign this mummy was made, which was Osorcon III., who was the sixth descendant from Shishab, the conqueror of Rehoboam, which was about 900 years B. C. He remarked, also, that with or near every corpse, there was buried an image of the Mummy, as a testimony that the person had been embalmed; and he exhibited one of them which he had found in Egypt, and which was that of the mother of this King, Osorcon III., in whose reign this Mummy was made.

Mr. G. then concluded with some moral reflections, with a comparison of the people of whom the specimens exhibited were remains, with ourselves and our ancestors, showing that they were, like us, of the Caucasian family.

LEAD-PIPE AND SHOT FACTORY.

The N. Y. Tribune gives the following account of an extensive lead-pipe and shot factory situated in Water st., in this city:—

"It is entirely devoted to the manufacture of Lead-Pipe, Block-Tin Pipe (a new article,) Sheet-Lead, Drop-Shot, and compressed Buck-Shot and Balls—all carried on within the same building. The partners in the firm are Thomas O. Le Roy and David Smith, who have been in the business four years. They are far the largest consumers of Pig-Lead in the United States—employing in the various branches of their manufacture more than Eight Million pounds per annum. They employ only about 30 men and boys, most of the labor being performed by steam power.

"The Shot is manufactured upon an entirely new plan, recently patented by Mr. Smith in this country and Europe. The principle involved is the application of an artificial current of air to the descending Shot—by which means the great hight hitherto deemed indispensable in this manufacture, is altogether obviated; as the hight of an ordinary three-story store, with a trifling outlay, is amply sufficient under this improved method. The work is accomplished by sending an artificial current of air up a flue, down which the shot are dropping, thus making the falling shot come in contact with as much air in passing down forty feet, as they would in falling through two hundred and fifty feet of stagnant air in a high tower. The labor of making the shot is performed almost entirely by steam machinery; two men being employed above to melt and pour the metal, and one man and two boys below completing the subsequent processes of screening, weighing and bagging the different sizes. It is believed that, with present facilities, the establishment can manufacture a sufficient supply of Shot for the whole United States. A part of the second story of the store is devoted to the machinery for making the Cempressed Bullets. These are made of all sizes, struck from cold lead, with great rapidity, and most beautifully perfect.

"The Pipe Machine is driven night and day. The process is exceedingly simple, and marvelously expeditious, and the Pipe is of excellent quality. The Block-Tin pipe is something long demanded in the Arts, and we believe has never been produced elsewhere. Its great superiority over other materials for soda fountains, water-pipes, and other uses, or where chemical agencies are at work, creates an active demand in this department. The pipes are warranted pure tin, and can be produced at a cost very little exceeding that of the common lead-pipe. Experiments have recently been made to test the strength of the tin-pipes, the results of which were entirely satisfactory. Being subjected to an enormous hydraulic pressure, the samples expanded in dimensions as the force grew stronger, but broke only at four thousand pounds to the square inch."

SINGULAR DISPLAY OF COURAGE.

An exhibition of a novel and attractive character has just been opened at Hyde Park Corner, London. Mr. Roualeyn Gordon Cumming, a young gentleman of property in the Highlands, and as keen a sportsman as the Highlands have ever produced, has filled the old Chinese Gallery with the trophies of his skill—the produce of five years' shooting in the far interior of Southern Africa, many hundred miles beyond the farthest point hitherto reached by any white man. "When we state," says the London Athenæum, from which we get these facts, "that Mr. Cumming has killed eighteen lions, twenty-eight specimens of the black rhinoceros, seventy-six hippopotami, and one hundred and five elephants, our readers will know what his daring is, and what his success has been. His lions' skins are the finest we remember to have seen—worthy coverings for the king of beasts. He has at least one thousand pounds worth of ivory in the room, and a pair of elephant's tusks measuring nine feet—the largest known. The whole gallery looks like a combination of a baronial hall and a furrier's shop. Antlers of the largest size and the most elegant proportions arrest the eye at every turn. The fore feet of an elephant (exhibited on the dais) afford a noble idea of the enormous size of the herds of elephants which he had the luck to fall in with. Mr. Cumming would realize Charles the Fifth's idea of a hero. He knows not fear. His coolest moments seem to have been in confronting half a dozen lions, or an enraged lioness with her young—or in lying at his ease at night near to fountains where lions are slaking their thirst and making the desert roar with the deep thunder of their voices."

SIBERIAN SLEDGE DOGS.

These dogs are said to resemble the wolf, to have long, pointed, projecting noses, sharp and upright ears, and long bushy tails; color various—black, brown, reddish brown, white and spotted. They vary also in size, but a good sledge dog should not be less than two feet seven inches high. Their howling is that of a wolf. In the summer they dig holes in the ground for coolness, or lie in the water to escape the mosquitoes, which in those regions are not less troublesome than one of Pharaoh's plagues. In winter they burrow in the snow, and lie curled up with their noses covered by their bushy tails. The preparation of these animals for a journey is carefully to be attended to. For a fortnight, at least, they should be put on a small allowance of hard food, to convert their superfluous fat into firm flesh. They are at first to be driven from ten to twenty miles daily; after which, Von Wrangle says, they have been known to travel a hundred miles a day without being injured by it.

"We drove ours," he says, "sometimes at the rate of one hundred wrists (sixty-six miles) a day. Their usual food is fresh fish, thawed and cut in pieces; and ten frozen herrings are said to be a proper daily allowance for each dog. A team consists commonly of twelve dogs; and it is of importance that they should be accustomed to draw together. The foremost sledge has usually an additional dog, which has been trained as a leader. On the sagacity and docility of this leader depends the quick and steady going of the team, as well as the safety of the traveler.

A FOG IN LONDON.

There was a remarkable fog in London on the night of November 21, of which the Times gives the following account:—During the early part of yesterday the fog which overspread the metropolis and its neighborhood was not very dense—at least a Londoner would not consider it; but as the evening advanced the decreasing of light became apparently accelerated by a very great increase in the thickness of the atmosphere, and before 5 o'clock the whole of the metropolis was overspread by that which, without exaggeration, may be designated as a "thick darkness." The streets presented, in every quarter, appearances of the utmost confusion and alarm. Persons on foot literally groped their way through the mass of smoke and vapor which filled every street, whilst carriages of all descriptions, wagons, omnibuses, and cabs, made their way at a snail's pace, and under circumstances alike dangerous to the parties who guided them, and to those with whom they were every moment coming in contact. In vain were vehicles provided with lamps and preceded by torches—in vain was the greatest care and caution observed by those who led or drove, accidents became of momentary occurrence, and amidst the shouting of men, the occasional screams of the few women and children who ventured abroad, the glare of the torches, and the active dexterity of thieves, the police found abundant employment, while every one who had a home, and no very pressing business to keep him out of doors, hurried into shelter with as much expedition as the prevailing darkness and confusion would permit.

Music of the Pacific.—No one can be in Monterey a single night, without being startled and awed by the deep, solemn crashes of the surf as it breaks along the shore. There is no continuous roar of the plunging waves, as we hear on the Atlantic sea-board; the slow, regular swells—quick pulsation of the great Pacific's heart—roll inward in unbroken lines, and fall with single grand crashes, with intervals of dead silence between. They may be heard through the day, if one listens, like a solemn undertone to all the shallow noises of the town; but at midnight, when all else is still, those successive shocks fall upon the ear with a sensation of inexpressible solemnity. All the air, from the pine forests to the sea, is filled with a light tremor, and the intermitting beats of sound are strong enough to jar a delicate ear. Their constant repetition at last produces a feeling something like terror. A spirit worn and weakened by some scathing sorrow, could scarcely bear the reverberation.

[Taylor's California.

Execution of a Crow.—The rookery in front of the Uxbridge Arms Hotel, in Carnarvon, has been the scene of a most extraordinary occurrence. One morning, a solitary crow was observed advancing towards the place, and three of the feathered tenants of the said rookery sallied forth to meet the apparent stranger. The company having entered the hallowed precincts of the rookery, amidst a good deal of cawing and other peculiar noises, the victim was pounced upon, and vi et armis borne to a tree, where its neck was firmly fixed between two branches, and while one of the executioners stationed himself above, the others rendered material assistance by suspending themselves a dead weight to the feet of the unfortunate culprit. The work was soon accomplished, as life in a few minutes became totally extinct. The carcass still remains dangling in the air, probably to serve as a warning for others!

Singing Shells—Mr. Taylor, a tourist, when at Bathculoa, in Ceylon, on going at night on a lake near the fort, was struck by a loud musical noise proceeding from the bottom of the water. It was caused by multitudes of some animals inhabiting shells. The sounds are like those of an accordeon, or Æolian harp, guitar, &c., vibrating notes, and pitched in different keys. A snail, abundant in Corfu, if irritated by a touch with a piece of straw, will emit distinctly audible sound in a querulous tone, and thus it frequently repeats if touched.

Singular Divorce Case.—A favorable report on a petition for divorce was made in the Connecticut Legislature recently. The circumstances, as detailed by the Chairman of the Committee, were as follows:—The petitioner was married at the age of 20. She was a respectable and intelligent young lady, but owing to some peculiar circumstances, her mind became affected, not to absolute insanity, but she was in a distracted state, and in this condition came to New Haven on a visit to her sister. At this time she became acquainted with her husband, who is a colored man, through the agency of a colored woman who was employed by her in washing. Her husband had never proposed the match, nor had she; but one evening she was invited to the house of her washerwoman, and there found a company assembled, and she was informed she had been published, and that those present had come to see her married. She consented, and the ceremony was performed by a colored clergyman. Her husband then carried her to New York, and placed her among associates that were very disagreeable to her. He went to California some months ago, but has recently returned. She has recovered from her hallucination, and looks upon her husband with disgust and horror. He had received notice of her application for divorce, but did not appear in opposition.

Tremendous Storm.—A tremendous storm of hail, rain, wind and thunder, recently swept over Sangamon County, Ill. The Springfield (Ill.) Journal says: "We hear of damage done in Shelbyville, Jacksonville, Rushville and Alton. But its most awful effects were felt in Sugar Grove, in Menard, some 20 miles north-west of this city. A gentleman describing the approach of the storm, says that he saw it approaching with great rapidity, the cloud seeming to be near the surface of the earth. It was accompanied by fearful wind, thunder and lightning, and the rain and hail fell in a perfect avalanche. Timber trees were broken, twisted, and blown down; fences were prostrated for miles; roofs of houses were blown off. A stone dwelling was entirely prostrated. Hogs were killed in great numbers; the fruit trees were broken and bruised, the bark on the west side peeled off and entirely denuded of leaves and fruit. The small grain was entirely cut up, as well as all vegetables in gardens. Fowls were killed, and sand-hill cranes, plovers and prairie-chickens, were dead about the prairies. In a word, it seemed utterly impossible to describe, truly, the desolation of the scene."

Singular Amalgamation.—A friend left at our office, a few days since, says the St. Paul Chronicle, May 25, what may be considered, so far as our knowledge extends, a production peculiar to Minnesota. It was a grub worm, apparently of the ordinary species, from the head of which had sprouted a plant some three inches in length. Both animal and vegetable life had become extinct, when we first saw it, though vitality clearly existed in each when taken out of the ground. We understand this species of production is not uncommon in the vicinity of Point Douglass, where this was found. The weeds springing from the head of the worm grow to the hight of two or three feet, the legs of the insect meantime extending themselves into the earth in the shape of roots. Animal life remains apparent until the vegetable shoot above ground is killed by a change of season, but whether a crop of grubs is produced in the way of seeds, we are not advised. What can't we raise in Minnesota?

Coal Trade of the Ohio.—The amount of coal taken from the mines on the Ohio and its tributaries is estimated to exceed 35,000,000 of bushels. This costs the consumers two and a half millions of dollars or more. The yearly consumption of New Orleans is about 8,000,000 bushels, and is increasing at the rate of 33 per cent. per annum. The average increase of consumption in the West is estimated at 25 per cent. a year. Lieut. Maury, who has given considerable attention to the subject, predicts, that should a canal or railway be constructed across the Isthmus of Panama, in a few years after the completion of either, the demand for Ohio River coal on the coast of the Pacific will be equal to 80,000,000 of bushels a year. No coal has been discovered from Cape Horn to the mouth of the Columbia. The Panama and San Francisco steamers, now use Pennsylvania and Liverpool coal at $30 a ton. The ocean steamers, from New York, touching at New Orleans, are great consumers, taking in 25,000 bushels a trip.

A Five-Footed Horse.—A short time ago a horse was brought into a blacksmith's shop in Cambridge, Mass., to get five feet shod. The horse was of a larger size than usual, but in other respects in no way remarkable, with the exception of the supernumerary foot. This was upon the left hind leg, having its origin upon the inside, just above the fetlock joint, or, to speak more exactly, between the larger pastern and cannon bones—had its own tendons for bending and extending the foot, and these motions were effected independently of the natural foot, showing an independent set of muscular fibers also. The foot and hoof were well shaped, but were not more than one-half or two-thirds of the size of the others. It was placed firmly upon the ground in walking, and the shoe, which was well-worn, showed that the foot did its duty in supporting and moving the animal.

Papers in North Carolina.—There are 33 newspapers printed in North Carolina, all weekly, except two semi-weekly and one tri-weekly. No magazine or other periodical is issued. The Raleigh Register, from the best information it can obtain, averages the weekly circulation of each paper at 550, which gives a total circulation of 18,150 per week, for the whole State. The population of North Carolina is 800,000, or say 108,000 families, so that not more than one out of six families is supplied with a newspaper.

Immortality of the Soul.—Barry Cornwall puts into the mouth of Julian the Apostate the following beautiful argument in favor of the immortality of the soul:—

> "I cannot think that the great soul of man,
> With its accumulated wisdoms, too,
> Must perish. Why, the words he utters live;
> And is the spirit which gave birth to thoughts
> Beneath its own creation?"

Bunyan's Influence.—Bunyan was buried in Bunhill Fields, where his tomb is often visited. Not long ago a funeral took place there, which was attended, among others by the celebrated Doctor Maginn, for a long time one of the most brilliant writers of Blackwood's Magazine. As soon as the ceremony was over, the Doctor said to the sexton: "Grave-digger, show me the tomb of John Bunyan!" The grave-digger led the way, and was followed by Maginn, who seemed deeply thoughtful. As they approached the place, the Doctor stopped, and touching him on the shoulder, said: "Tread lightly." Maginn bent over the grave for some time in melancholy mood, deeply affected, and exclaimed, in solemn tones, as he turned away: "Sleep on! thou prince of dreamers!" The "dreamer" had lain there one hundred and fifty years, but no lapse of time has destroyed the spell which he still holds over the strongest minds.

The Pacha of Egypt is causing the work of macadamizing the Desert Road to be proceeded with yet more vigorously. An agreement has been made with contractors to enlarge the station houses on the Desert, so as to admit of the necessary stabling accommodation for eight or ten relays of horses, instead of four or five, by which means fifty or sixty persons will be moved across in one train, instead of, as at present, half that number. Mules again are to be substituted for baggage camels in the transport of the Indian luggage and cargoes, with a view to a reduction of the time consumed in this operation between Suez and Cairo, from thirty-six to twenty-four hours.

A Noble Boy.—A touching incident occurred recently at a steamboat sinking, on the Missouri river, near St. Louis. Among the persons who were swept overboard, were a woman and a boy about twelve years of age. A man on the steamer seeing the boy buffeting the waves just beyond the boat, threw him a rope, and called to him to take hold of it. The little fellow replied: Never mind me—I can swim; save mamma. They were both rescued.

Variety.

In New York, on the day the last English steamer sailed, a young Irishman, named Michael Lowry, established himself at the outside of the Post Office window, where he stood, receiving letters and postage from all the simple-looking of his countrymen and women, who came to deposit and pay. He was detected by some person, who called one of the 1st district officers and had him arrested. On his person were found some twenty or thirty letters, for all of which he had been paid postage.

A process for preserving milk for any length of time, invented by a Russian chemist named Kirkoff, consists in evaporating new milk by a very gentle fire, and very slowly, until it is reduced to a dry powder. This powder is to be kept in bottles carefully stopped. When it is to be employed, it is only necessary to dissolve the powder in a sufficient quantity of water. According to Mr. Kirkoff, the milk does not lose by this process any of its peculiar flavor.

In matters of great importance, and which must be done, there is no surer argument of a weak mind than irresolution. To be undetermined where the case is so plain, and the necessity so urgent; to be always intending to lead a new life, but never to find time to set about it; this is as if a man should put off eating, and drinking, and sleeping, from one day and night to another, till he is starved and destroyed.

John C. Calhoun, in his younger days, pursued a course of legal studies under Judge Reeves, of Litchfield, (Conn.) After he completed his studies, it is stated that Judge Reeves, in remarking on the peculiar talents of different individuals, said, if he had a case in court where life depended on persuading a jury that pumpkins were the natural fruit of apple trees, he knew no man whom he should employ with so much confidence as John C. Calhoun.

Gov. Hammond, of South Carolina, estimates the present capacity of the slave-holding States as equal to the support of 200,000,000 of inhabitants. To give Virginia as dense a population as Belgium has, (which exports far more of human food than Virginia does,) would require all the people now in the United States to reside in the "Ancient Dominion."

"You may say what you please," says Lysimachus, "but there is no heat in the sun's rays." The argument was dropped, and he fell asleep. His opponent singed his beard with a burning glass. He awoke in great pain. "Indeed, my friend," says Lysimachus, "this is a SENSIBLE demonstration."

It is curious to see how intimately the habit of intemperance, and also ignorance, are connected with crime. Of 537 prisoners in Auburn State Prison, last year, 450 had been habitually intemperate, and nearly all the rest regular drinkers. In England, of 4,105 convicts transported in 1840, only 390 (less than one tenth) could read.

German papers state that Mr. Gunther, the head of a locomotive factory at Neustadt, near Vienna, has solved the problem relative to the ascent of trains on inclined planes; and built an engine which will draw with ease, up an incline of 40 degrees to 50 degrees, a train of the weight of 2,500 tons.

In M. Lombard's returns for Geneva, the average longevity of stone cutters is stated at 34 years; sculptors, 36; millers, 42; painters, 44; joiners, 49; butchers, 53; writers, 51; surgeons, 54; masons, 55; gardeners, 60; merchants, 62; Protestant clergymen, 63; and magistrates, 69 years.

Plutarch tells of a wolf, who, peeping into a hut where a company of shepherds were regaling themselves with a joint of mutton, exclaimed, "What a clamor would these men have raised if they had caught me at such a banquet!"

The most perfect and the most abandoned characters are found among women. It was probably for this reason that the ancients represented both the Graces and the Furies as women.

Snow, as it falls, is twenty-four times lighter than water, which may be proved by melting twenty-four measures of snow, and they will be found to produce but one of water.

Littell's Living Age.

PROSPECTUS.—This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope, and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contribution to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia, and Africa into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as merchants, travelers, and politicians, with all parts of the world; so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening, through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selections; and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive to their wives and children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste.

Terms.—The Living Age is published every Saturday; price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

☞ To insure regularity in mailing the work, orders should be addressed to the office of publication.

Clubs, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:

Four copies for - - - - -	$20 00
Nine " " - - - - -	40 00
Twelve " " - - - - -	50 00

Complete sets, in 24 volumes, to the end of March, 1850, handsomely bound, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principal cities free of expense of freight, are for sale at forty-eight dollars.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Judge Story—Chancellor Kent—President Adams.

I have read the prospectus of "The Living Age" with great pleasure, and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more; it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character. JOSEPH STORY.

CAMBRIDGE, April 24, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of your work; and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit, and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day. JAMES KENT.

NEW YORK, May 7, 1844.

Of all the periodical journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

DUTY OF THE CHURCH TO AID IN EDUCATING CANDIDATES FOR THE MINISTRY.

Report of a Committee of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, adopted at the recent meeting of that body, and published by its request.

Your Committee, having carefully examined the subject submitted to their consideration, respectfully present the result of their deliberations in the following view.

The necessity of an educated ministry has been fully set forth and demonstrated in the Report of a Committee, presented to this Association, adopted at its last session, and published in the Sabbath Recorder of May 2d and 9th, 1850. At that session, it was

Resolved, "That this Association recommends young men who are looking forward to the ministry, to take, as a preparatory step, a regular course of academical and collegiate studies, equal to that required for the first degree in the colleges or universities of this country; and, secondly, to take a regular theological course, equal to that marked out for the graduate course in the Union Theological Seminary of New York, or some similar Seminary."

Now, if this requisition upon young men looking forward to the ministry be a just one—if they owe such a preparation previous to entering upon the service of the church—the question at once arises, What are the reciprocal duties of the church? For, it were a repudiation of all principles of reciprocity, to expect that one party shall make all the sacrifices, and the other party share equal or superior profits. It has been truly said, that the gospel ministry demands more extensive qualifications than any other profession; and with equal truthfulness it may be said, that it demands greater sacrifices. The young man who shall understandingly dedicate himself to the ministry, must do so at a sacrifice of that universal and almost irresistible impulse of the human heart, which stands out as the distinguishing characteristic of human society, namely, the desire for wealth and emolument. Fields of honor in the world of literature, of profit in business, and renown in politics, may open all along his way, but he must be foresworn not to enter them, however decked with inviting couches of ease, and sunny bowers of pleasure. There, too, flock scores of his young associates and friends, all inviting him to partake. He must not only relinquish all these, but, if called, must even relinquish all the endearments of home and country, and find an abode in the uncongenial society of savage heathen, under the scorching rays of the torrid zones, or the gelid cliffs of the frigid, where death in ten thousand horrid forms may await him, with no kind hand to wipe away its cold sweat. Whether at home or abroad, the faithful minister must travel the straight road of unremitting toil. If he rests a day from his watch-tower, hords of ravenous wolves may rush in upon his flock, or unsuspecting lambs may be lured from the fold to certain destruction. He must feed the weak, comfort the afflicted, restrain the wayward, and dispense the word of life to all, with unfaltering zeal. He must endure the scoffs of enemies, and the ingratitude and treachery of pretended friends. He must both be praised and censured for the same act. The minister, then, in short, must sacrifice all that is most cherished among men, and expect in return all that is most dreaded. But, in addition to this, he is recommended to pursue the course of study prescribed in the above-mentioned resolution, to accomplish which, not less than ten years unremitting toil must be spent in the study of books, shut up in the gloomy halls of learning, deprived of the conveniencies and endearments of home, and compelled, by the very nature of the avocation, and of necessary college restrictions, to yield his social nature to the dread dominion of a stoicism little better than annihilation; and this at a pecuniary sacrifice of two hundred and fifty dollars per annum, which, for the ten years of preparatory study, would amount to two thousand and five hundred dollars.

The above is no exaggerated account of the sacrifice demanded of the young man who shall give himself to the ministry. Now we appeal to our brethren, How many of you would make such a sacrifice of personal ease, aggrandizement, and pecuniary profit, even with a prospect, as certain as usually attends business transactions, of receiving in due time principal and interest in return? Few, very few! How many, then, can be expected to make this outlay, with a prospect, demonstrably certain, of receiving in return nothing but toil and a bare subsistence, amid abundance never their own?

But suppose young men enough could be found to fill all the pulpits of our denomination when vacated by their present occupants, who were willing to make the sacrifices above mentioned; we ask, how many there are who can do it? There are doubtless many who can and will sacrifice all to save the 2,500 dollars; but we venture the assertion, that not one in a hundred of our young men possess that amount of available property at the age of twenty-one; and let the past history of our churches tell how many parents are willing to bestow that amount upon their children for the purpose of education. Now if we admit that one in every hundred of our young men, on arriving at legal accountability, possess the requisite funds for acquiring the education recommended by this Association, then we believe that the chances are a hundred to one against the devotion of himself and his funds to the work of the ministry. The children of the rich alone can inherit this amount, and none can possess it except by gift or inheritance. And it is a fact, painful yet obvious, that the children of the rich usually grow up profligate and ungodly. Exceptions there are, but not enough to invalidate the proposition. Our godly young men are found among those whose early years have not been associated with ceaseless praises to the god of this world. For a devotee at the shrine of Mammon to present to the church a son trained to the love and praise of the true God, would be a prodigy with scarcely a parallel. We are then to seek for amor-bearers of the Lord among those of the church who come upon the active stage of life with no patrimony but an honest heart, and hands hardened by toil. Having determined to consecrate himself to the ministry, he naturally looks to his brethren for counsel; he reads the report adopted by the Association, recommending a course of ten years' study; he computes the cost, and lo! two thousand five hundred dollars at least must be expended; his countenance saddens; gloomy forebodings hang over him. But, not despairing, he reviews the calculation, and determines to endure privations enough to reduce his expenses to two hundred dollars per annum, thus reducing the aggregate to two thousand dollars. And now, true to the habits of industry in which he has been trained, he calculates that by laboring to the best advantage one-half of the time, he can lay aside enough, besides his support, to go to school the other half. Then joy illumes his countenance. But another look at the account, and despair succeeds; for, alas! at this rate of progress, twenty years must be consumed in study. Is there a young man in Christendom whose courage would not quail before such a task? The scaling of the Alps, the crossing of the Rubicon, or the storming of Vera Cruz, were pigmy enterprises in comparison; and the courage of Bonaparte, Cæsar, and Scott, is but courage in miniature!

The alternatives are few. 1st, The Association must annul its resolution, and recommend a less extensive preparation; or, 2d, Young men must spend twenty years in preparation; or, 3d, The churches must help bear the burden of expense. Brethren, which of these alternatives will you accept? Will you annul the resolution? Then you must invalidate the arguments by which it is sustained, and show it to be founded in folly—a work which you will scarcely undertake, after having so lately deliberated and passed upon it. The events of a year have only confirmed it. Will you adopt the second, and expect young men to spend half their lives in college? If you adopt this, you doom yourselves to constant disappointment, for no sensible young man will do it? If, then, you reject the former two, only the latter remains. Will you adopt or reject?

Your Committee are now ready to enunciate the proposition, that it is the duty of the church to aid in the education of candidates for the ministry. We predicate this proposition, 1st, Upon the principle of reciprocity set forth in the scriptural injunction, to "bear one another's burdens." This principle is as broad as is human intercourse. Wherever, in any modification of human society, one man or set of men makes a sacrifice for the good of another, that other is, from that moment, under obligation, high and holy, to return some suitable tribute of gratitude. Now all the labors and expenditures of the student of divinity are for the church, and not for himself. The church, then, cannot escape the obligation to return the tribute of gratitude by the alleviation of his toils for her. 2d, We base this proposition on the propositions—1st, That the church is obligated to do whatever will tend to increase her own efficiency as the appointed means of salvation; 2d, An educated ministry tends to increase her efficiency; Therefore the church is obligated to secure an educated ministry.

We apprehend that the major proposition of the above syllogism will elicit no controversy; it is an affirmation of reason.

The proposition that an educated ministry tends to increase the efficiency of the church, is controverted, and we often hear it denounced as an innovation upon the principles of the Bible. When we speak of educated ministers, we mean no distorted monstrosities, such as sometimes walk about under the cover of a sheep-skin, laid on by some college as false to humanity as its offspring are; we mean men of God, wielding the glittering sword of truth, with that power which knowledge alone can give. With such men as watchmen, Zion shall march as a mighty man of war to certain victory. This is no fiction; universal history confirms it. "As the priests, so the people," is a truth demonstrated by the church in every period of her history and in every subdivision of her body. So extensive is the influence of the priesthood, that even nations yield to its sovereignty. The educational attainments of the ministry have always a correspondence in the educational attainments of the people, and consequently a corresponding advancement in the sciences and arts. Let facts testify. Look at Spain! Why that dark veil of ignorance which covers her? Why has non-progression hung its onerous pall upon her? Why no railroads, no telegraphs, no school-houses, academies, and colleges? Why are Spaniards savages? Let her lazy, selfish, ignorant, and superstitious priests, hovering around the bloody portals of her thousand inquisitions and monasteries, answer. Spain will be the by-word of the world till she shall cast off her licentious priesthood. As the priests, so the people. The priests of Ireland are miserably superstitious; and what are the Irish? Despised, debased, and like their priests. Why are the Chinese what they were in the days of Confucius? Their priests are now, as then, silly babblers, and so are the people. But why go abroad for illustration? Look at any church that has long been under the influence of an ignorant and superstitious minister, and see if that church is not behind churches with educated (though no more pious) ministers, although she may possess all the other facilities that other churches do. The influence of Luther, Melancthon, and their associates, this day gives character to Germany; while France reels under the soulless delusions of Voltaire, her great high priest. Scotland is overflowing with everything that can beautify and bless a nation, because her numerous pulpits have been filled with some of the brightest gems of sanctified intellect; and so of England. Why do the barren rocks of New England smile with verdure, and her sails whiten every sea? Because men of God, baptized in the pure waters of the Pyerian spring, have held the helm of Church and State. Change the priests, and the people follow in the wake. Look at Burmah; where once the juggling priests burnt incense to false gods, and an ignorant people followed the delusion, the praises of the true God now ascend from altars consecrated to him. Why all this? Judson, Wade, and others, filled with light and knowledge, have superseded those ignorant priests—a change of priests has produced a change of people, and so it will ever be. This principle lies at the very foundation of our missionary enterprise. The people need better priests; and as their priests, so shall be the people in due time. Why should this not be so? Who so often stands before the people as an instructor? Who so intimate with every influence as the faithful minister, and who can shape the influences so well as he? This is his business—to mould the people into his own image; and this he will do, be that image what it may. How vastly important, then, that he have the image of a perfect man in Christ Jesus.

Having thus sustained the proposition that the efficiency of the church is increased by efficient ministers, the conclusion is inevitable, that it is her duty to secure an efficient ministry. But the ministry is efficient in proportion as it is properly educated. It follows, then, that it is her duty to secure an educated ministry. [Remainder next week.

WESTERN MISSION.

The following communication from Bro. Davison, of the Western Mission, has been on hand some time, and would have been given to our readers sooner, but for the almost continued absence of the Corresponding Secretary for the last six weeks. It bears date 1st of April, and is addressed to the Missionary Board.

DEAR BRETHREN,—It is due to you that I write another quarterly report of my labors as your missionary. I have no great things to report, yet I feel grateful to our Heavenly Father for the success that has so far attended the undertaking. Our congregations at Farmington, and at South Hampton, are quite respectable and regular. In the vicinity of Farmington we have had eighteen families of Sabbath-keepers during the winter past, besides a number of single young men living in other families. Our meetings have been interesting and profitable. Ten persons have been added to our number as members of the church. A sister B., a worthy member of the First-day Baptist church, openly avows her full faith in the divine requirement to keep holy Jehovah's holy Sabbath day, and meets with us to worship thereon. Her husband, who is a member of the same church, seems almost persuaded to do likewise. Within a few weeks a young man, a member of the Methodist Society, has commenced keeping the Sabbath, and assembles with us. A few weeks ago a beloved sister, a devoted Sabbath-keeper, and an accomplished lady, paid us a visit, with the intention of settling her family in Farmington; but the way did not appear quite open at present; she hopes, however, to see it accomplished at another time. Her husband and family are Sabbath convicts (if such a term is allowable.) They would keep the Sabbath if they could live among us, and provide for their own necessities, but have not faith to venture all for the truth's sake. Their present residence is about ninety miles from this. We have several promising young people among us, and some others, who have met considerably with us the past season, of whom we sometimes hope well. I do hope to report some baptisms shortly. Next Sabbath day we commence a Bible Class and Sabbath School, and an additional prayer meeting. We are not lifeless; there is considerable interest in the congregation. Our greatest difficulty is, that we live too wide apart for our own convenience.

At South Hampton there are now seven families settled compactly together, who keep holy the Sabbath day, and maintain regular Sabbath meetings for worship. Bro. Anthony Hakes preaches to them when no other ministering brother is present, and a number of them take an active part in their prayer and conference meetings. At the time of my last visit, they referred the subject of their organization into a church to my judgment and decision. My present calculations are, that we shall hold a series of meetings for the occasion, toward the latter part of next month, when the people will have planted their corn, and perhaps some other emigrants joined them. I am very much in hopes that several first-day families will there yet take hold of the Sabbath of the Lord to keep it. There are two specially concerned about it—one a Methodist, and the other a Baptist family. All that is wanting, seemingly, is faith to trust Jehovah, and to realize that he has more pleasure in them that keep his commandments than in those who keep the customs of society. A Doctor and his wife are among the converts I mentioned in my last report; they are very steadfast in the way of the Lord.

At Glen Creek (near Lewiston,) where we have four brethren and their families, there is no alteration. The small-pox prevented our holding the meeting I intended, until, about three weeks ago, they sent word that it was now gone, and the way was clear; but other previous engagements have prevented my going down to them as yet. I expect to go soon.

I am ashamed to report the number of sermons I preach, when I read the number that some other missionaries report; neither would they be a fair representation of my labors for the cause. I have standing appointments on Sabbath days and first days, and other opportunities, but our settlements are far apart, and we cannot very well have more than one assembly in a day. Besides, we have other brethren among us, of whom we think it right that they should exercise their gifts, as they frequently do. I have not traveled as much as some of our missionaries do; there are several reasons for it, among which I may mention that I have no buggy, and having an infirmity of 12 years standing, I cannot ride far in the saddle without serious injury.

In addition to the routine of labors I have had the past year, I purpose, if I can have means to do it, to visit some families of Sabbath-keepers in Jerseyville, near Alton; and I cannot much longer put off visiting Wisconsin. Our brethren have sent to me from there so often that I am ashamed of not complying with their invitations. If I can get money enough to do it, I propose to visit them the early part of the summer.

I have not received a penny on the field of labor the past quarter. The brethren have, however, helped me considerably about building a house; but as it is not done, nor their engagements, I cannot tell what they will charge me at present. I will have it referred to the church, to report upon it when their engagements are through with. As I have described the country as very fertile and productive, I am informed that some think those here ought to support their own minister. No doubt they will soon; but, rich as the soil is, neither furniture, nor fences, nor houses, nor grain itself, grows spontaneously; and as not one of our brethren came in here forehanded, it takes all they can do to provide these things for a few years. They are making property, but it is not disposable property at first; it is in making homes and comforts for their families. I am sure they do not intend to be burdensome to the Board long. I am yours, with much esteem,

SAMUEL DAVISON.

ONCE.

BY L. K. WILLIE.

"Did you ever attend the theater?" said a young man to a blue-eyed maiden, who hung on his arm as they promenaded the streets of New York one mild evening in October. The cheek of the lady crimsoned with a blush as she answered the interrogatory in the negative, and added: "My mother has taught me from childhood that it was wrong to attend such places." "But your mother formed perhaps improper prejudices, from exaggerated accounts given by others; for I have often heard her say she never attended one in her life." And he spoke eloquently of the drama, comedy, and tragedy; and dwelt with glowing pathos on the important lessons which we there learn of human nature. "Go with me once," said he, "and judge for yourself." Persuasion and curiosity triumphed over the maternal precept and example, as she hesitatingly replied, "I'll go but once." She went, and in that theater a charm came over her like the one which the serpent sent forth from his dove-like eye. She went again, and again, and from that house of mirth and laughter she was led to one from the portals of which she never returned.

Around a center table, where an astral lamp was shedding its mild light, sat three young ladies; while one held in her hands a pack of cards. At the back of her chair stood a young gentleman, who for years had successfully resisted every effort made by his companions, to induce him to learn the characters on cards. "Come," said she, "we need one to make our game; play with us once, if you never play again." Her eye, cheek and lip, conspired to form an eloquent battery, which sent forth its attacks upon the fortress of good resolutions, in which he had long stood secure, until it fell like the walls of an ancient city, when jarred by the fearful battering ram. He learned the cards and played. A few weeks afterward, I was passing his room at a late hour, and a candle was shedding its dim light through the window. Since that time I have looked from my chamber nearly every hour "from close of day till morn," and seen that light faintly struggling through the curtains that screened the inmates of that room from every eye save His which seeth alike in darkness and at noonday. Gaming brought with it disease, and death came, just as he had numbered the half of his three score years and ten. During his last hours, I was sitting by his bedside, when he fixed on me a look which I shall never forget, and bade me listen to his dying words. "I might have been a different man from what I am, but it is too late now. I am convinced that there is a state of existence beyond the grave; and when I think of the retribution which awaits me in another world, I feel a horror which language is inadequate to describe." These were among the last words he ever uttered.

The junior class of a southern college had assembled in a student's room, to spend the night in riot and debauch. Amid that crowd was one who had never recited a bad lesson since his matriculation. In his studies he was head and shoulders above his class. That day he had failed. A shade of deepest gloom came over him, and he was indescribably melancholy. But the wine and jest passed round, while himself felt like Lucifer in Eden, where all was joy and gladness around him. Said a classmate, "Come, Bob, quaff this bumper, and it will make you feel as bright as a hermit's lamp." The tempter whispered in his ear, "Drink once, and forget the past. A similar occasion will never return." A powerful struggle seemed going on in his mind for a moment; but at last he silently shook his head, and retired to the grove, gave vent to his feelings in a flood of tears. That boy never drank—not even once. He took the valedictory! is now D.D., and President of a College.

Once! Once! Oh, on this slender pivot hath turned for weal or woe the destiny of many a deathless spirit! Cæsar paused but once on the banks of the Rubicon; but it was a pause like that which nature makes when she is gathering her elements for the desolating tornado. Eve ate the forbidden fruit but once, and her countless posterity have felt the fearful consequence resulting from that rash act. Reader! remember once!

THE PRESENT RACE OF TURKS.

The Turks in Constantinople certainly looked much less like Turks, and were far more civil, than in 1828. They were incomparably less picturesque and imposing in their outward appearance. The forced change of costume has transformed them into a rather mean, shabby-looking people. But for the glaring red fezz, (a mean, ungraceful head-covering in itself,) they might pass for Franks who employed bad tailors, and seldom got their clothes brushed. A blue frock-coat, buttoned up to the chin, and dirty duck pantaloons, not wider than we wear them, were the prevailing fashion. In my time, the Sultan Mahmoud had made war on flowing, bright-colored robes, and a fierce attack on the loose, baggy nether garments of the Mussulmans; but still the prejudice was strong in favor of amplitude of trousers, and a shabby fellow continued to be designated as a "tight-breeches," or "narrow-breeches;" but now every man's breeches were narrow in Stamboul, except among the common people, Oalema, Dervishes, and a few old-fashioned country people, from the mountains in Europe, or from the interior of Asia Minor. In many cases it gave me trouble to distinguish between Mussulmans and Rayahs. Twenty years ago there was no possibility of confounding them; for, even without the then marked distinctions of dress, of head geer, of boots, or papoushes, the Osmanlees were to be known by their swaggering gait, their overbearing looks, and their contemptuous, insolent manners. The Turks now seem to have lost their pride, and their sense of importance. Over in the city they were the quietest and most modern part of the population. Their former swagger and rudeness appeared to be transferred to the Armenian seraffs and their dependents. Where I had been repeatedly insulted, and more than once spit at by the Turkish rabble, we certainly found nothing now but civility. In 1828 there was no going across the Golden Horn into Constantinople without being attended by one or two armed Turks; and the presence and guard of the faithful could not always screen one from the most gross and opprobrious language. We are now alone, my son and I. In the bazaars we meet some Frank ladies, dressed in the French fashion, unveiled and unattended, walking about unconcernedly, and making their purchases. They are constantly doing this, walking over by the Galata Bridge, which is about the best promenade here, and walking quietly back in the midst of Turks, and not unfrequently in the midst of troops. Formerly it was a solemn and hazardous enterprise if any European ladies ventured from thence to Stamboul! It was quite a field of anxious forethought, and many preparations were necessary. The Turkish authorities must be spoken to, half-a-dozen canvasses or chaoushes, girded and armed to the teeth, must be provided for the escort by some embassy or other, or the ladies must be muffled up and disguised in Turkish costume, and wear the white muslin face-covering yashmac, which makes the liveliest and loveliest of living woman look like so many walking spectres. It must be noted, however, that we did not stroll far from the bazaars, where they are accustomed to the daily visits of Franks; and that the ladies from Galata and Pera confined their rambles to that quarter. We very soon found that beyond these limits a good deal of the old fanaticism and hatred of Christians remained, and that we could seldom walk or ride about without being insulted, and that it was fear, sheer fear of consequences, that saved us from actual injury. The Turks were usually said to commit more crimes during their Ramazin than in any other month of the year. It struck me, however, that the common people in the capital fasted with better humor now than formerly. A new-school Turk would tell me the reason—it was because a great many of them had emancipated themselves from prejudice and (secretty) broke the Ramazin. It was anomalous, and very contrary to the Koran, but the Turkish ladies chose this very month of Ramazin to show themselves most abroad, or to make the greatest display of their charms and splendor. On the afternoon of every Friday (their Sabbath,) the large, irregular, but, at least open square, near the barracks and palaces, and offices of the Seraskier Pasha, which stand over in Constantinople on the site of a palace of the Greeks of the lower empire, was converted into a Hyde Park or Champs Elysées, or Prado, the wives of the pashas and other grandees parading up and down, and round and round, in arubas, telikes, kotchys, and (some few) in light, gay, and really beautiful, small open carriages, made chiefly at Vienna. Although this open space was almost the only part of Constantinople where a carriage could be driven at all, it was uneven, rough, and dusty, the inequalities giving such rumbles and jolts as to try the springs of the carriages rather severely; for, without counting children, each dame of quality had generally two or three friends with her. It used to astonish us how they packed themselves up in those vehicles, and how two small horses, and at times but one, could drag them and the vehicle over such a road. Some had their coachman seated before them in a coach box or driving-seat; the more cautious made their driver walk on foot, holding the reins rather short, in his two hands; but in either case there was generally a man servant at either side of the carriage, to be prompt with his assistance in case of an upset. Beyond a snail's pace, or at most what the Italians call Bishop's pace, they never went, and certainly never could go, without the exceeding great risk of a catastrophe. The grandest of the ladies were attended by a sworded man on horseback, being generally a Nubian of neutralized gender, but insolent and fierce enough to look at. These creatures very frequently behaved as if there was no Tanzimaut; nor were the fellows trudging on foot by the sides of the carriages remarkable for their civility to Rayahs or Christian strangers. DOING AND RECEIVING FAVORS.

Mrs. Francis D. Gage, in a letter to the Ohio State Journal, comments upon the particularly "cool" mode in which some American ladies receive a favor from a gentleman. She says:—

"Two years ago I made a journey to New England, accompanied by my husband, and also my father-in-law, an old man of four-score years. I have often seen that good old man offer his seat to some hale woman of half or less than half his age, and seen her accept it as if it were a right, without even a passing notice of his grey hairs, or the right of years that entitled him to her kindness and attention. Once, and only once, a lady of queenly grace and beauty, sprang from her seat as we entered, and with a voice that was musical in its every tone, said, "Father, take this arm chair." How my heart sprang to meet her in her angel goodness! Such has ever been our idea of a lady—which is synonymous with a true woman."

We are reminded, by the above, of a little adventure of our own, about a year ago. Riding in an omnibus, we perceived that a lady who had recently got out, had left a small package behind her. Thinking the loss might be of considerable inconvenience, we stopped the omnibus, and taking the bundle, overtook her by fast walking, after she had gone about a quarter of a square—the omnibus of course driving on without us. When we presented the bundle, a few words, or at least a smile of thanks, would have been some compensation for our trouble—but the lady received it just as coolly as if we had been an errand boy attached to the omnibus, and walked on without so much as a "thank you." We had frequently given up our seat to ladies at concerts and other places without the least acknowledgment, but this, we thought, was carrying "woman's rights" a little too far. Still, the perfect "coolness" with which the whole thing was done, caused us to feel more amused than indignant, and as we walked home we found ourselves every minute or two laughing outright at the peculiar notions of American women.

GIVING OF THANKS.—It was one of the peculiarities of Mr. Clarke, (says Everett in his Portraiture of Adam Clarke,) in performing the duty of what is usually termed "saying grace," not to do it in the language of a petition, as asking a blessing, but in the strain of general thanksgiving, alledging as his reason, that a mistaken idea originated and continued the practice. "The food," he observed, "is already blest, and will bless and nourish us; all the graces which the Bible demands and enjoins to be exercised for temporal benefits, may be summed up in the term gratitude: hence I thank God before as well as after the meal." This view of the subject was brought before his mind by the absurd request of a man who, "wiser than the elders," once said to him, on joining the dinner-table, "Uncurse this food for us, Mr. Clarke," imagining, in the sufficiency of his ignorance, that it was under the curse of Him whose every creature is good, and thankfully to be received. "That is a strange hymn of Charles Wesley's," Mr. Clarke observed, in continuation of the above subject, "where he says,—

"'Enslaved to sense, to pleasure prone,
We trembling taste our food;'

he must, surely, just then have fallen out with God, with his works, and with man, to have written thus."

WALKING WITH GOD.—I love poverty, because Jesus loved it. I love wealth, because it gives me the means of assisting the wretched. I wish to deal faithfully with all men. I render no evil to those who have done evil to me, but I wish them a condition similar to my own, in which they would not receive from the greater portion of men either good or evil. I am to be always true, just, and open, towards all men. I have tenderness of heart towards those whom God has more strictly united to me. Whether I am alone or in the sight of men, I have, before me, in all my actions, the view of God who will judge them, and to whom I have consecrated them all. These are my feelings, and I bless my Redeemer every day of my life, who has planted them in me, and who, from a man full of weakness, misery, lust, pride and ambition, has formed one victorious over these evils by the power of that grace to which I owe every thing, since in myself there is nothing but fear and misery. THE RIGHT USE OF PROPERTY.

In viewing the Christian as a steward of God's bounty, we remarked, last week, that he should consider himself the property of his Lord—as truly so as the slave is, in the eye of the law, the property of his Master; and that whatever amount of money he may be able to accumulate by industry, should all be laid at the Master's feet, accompanied with earnest prayer for direction as to the manner in which it shall be used. We suppose that no real Christian will call in question the orthodoxy of this view. He who has not learned that his property, as well as his person, belongs to the Lord Jesus Christ, has not learned the first rudiments of Christianity. Yet, in asking to be divinely directed as to the manner of using it, he almost always expects to receive a very liberal grant for himself; and it is, perhaps, not too much to say, that he is very apt to think that the whole of it ought to be returned to him. He can easily persuade himself, that the whole is nothing more than what he shall actually need; and offering his prayer under the influence of such feelings, he generally obtains, or thinks he obtains, about such an answer as he had before settled it in his own mind that he ought to obtain. It is difficult, if not impossible, to convince such a person, that any body but himself, or his own family, ought to participate in his wealth. Accordingly, he finds ways to expend it all upon his own family. He supplies them, not according to their actual necessities, but according to their imaginary wants. He takes into consideration, not merely what will be for their good, as it respects both this life and that which is to come, but those innumerable artificial wants, which a state of society, tempered mainly according to the corruptions of the human heart, has created. For these he makes abundant provision; and when he dies, takes careful precaution, that all the superabundance of his estate shall be entailed upon children and children's children. Now, if such be the manner in which God will have his people use the property in their hands, it strikes us, that their pretense of laying all at His feet, and seeking direction how to use it, is a mere farce. The most graceless mammon-worshiper on earth serves God, on this principle, as acceptably as any one else. If, in answer to prayer for direction, God allows his people to make such use of their—or rather His—property, as is perfectly consistent with the natural selfishness of the heart, what need of their praying at all? In view of the false judgment so often made on this subject, it may be worth while to inquire, What is the right use of property?

We have one general answer to this question. God bestows property upon his people, or allows them to accumulate it, on purpose that they may use it in doing good. To do good is the special vocation of Christians; it is, indeed, the appropriate work of every man. It is the only object worth living for, the only end for which God has placed us here on earth. In some form or other, every one must do good; though it is not for every one to do it in the same way. For instance, it is not for the poor man to do good by the distribution of wealth, for he possesses none to distribute. He sometimes wishes that he were possessed of more, and exclaims, "How much good I would do, if I were as rich as some of my neighbors!" But he need not spend his time in such complaints. God has not called him to such a method of doing good. His usefulness to his fellow creatures is to be exerted in a different line. But if any one does possess "this world's good," upon him devolves the duty of using it in such a way that it shall be a blessing to mankind. If the talent which God has bestowed upon him is mainly a talent for business—a talent for the accumulation of wealth—he is as much bound to use it for the promotion of God's cause, as if it were a talent for preaching the gospel. For this very end was it bestowed upon him. And it may be added, that there is no good reason why he should restrict the benefit of it to his own family, any more than there is that a minister should restrict the preaching of the gospel, and all his efforts to save souls, to his own family. The one ought to be as free and expansive in its operation as the other; for, in each case, the gift is bestowed, that it may be exercised for the benefit of mankind, according to that established principle, "None of us liveth to himself;" or according to that unalterable law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." We know that there is a Scripture, (and selfish disciples have acquired a wonderful facility in quoting it,) which says, "If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." But it may with equal truth be said, that a minister of the gospel, who does not labor for the salvation of his own family, has denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel. Nevertheless, if any one upon whom God has bestowed the gift of preaching, should be forever pleading such sentiment in justification of his limiting his ministry to his own household, he would be thought to have but a poor understanding of his duty. They are equally mistaken, who suppose that their talents for business should be made subservient exclusively to the welfare of their own families. We may, in a future number, consider how far one's own family has a claim to the wealth he earns. At present, we insist only upon the general duty of doing good to all men.

There is a remarkable text of Scripture, from which some instruction may be gathered on this point. Says Paul to the Ephesians, "Let him that stole steal no more; but rather let him labor, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth." Did ever any body hear of such a motive to stimulate a man to industry? "That he may have to GIVE to him that needeth!" Can it be, that the Apostle meant to say so? Did he not rather mean to say, "That he may have to SELL to him that needeth?" This would have been much more in accordance with worldly policy. Now-a-days, when we wish to stimulate a man to industry, we tell him that he will thereby be enabled to live above want, that he will be in a condition of fullness and plenty, will be able to gather around him the luxuries of life, and secure to himself the respect and honors of the community. By some such motives as these we should expect to rouse a man to action; and perhaps we should succeed. These, at all events, are the motives which govern people generally. But the Apostle makes no account of such motives. He simply urges the fact, that by industrious, honest labor, a man may be able to do good to the needy. He appears to think that this is motive enough for a good man. The reason of his thinking so, is easily explained. He took it for granted, that he was writing to a church of real Christians—to those who had by regenerating grace been made to partake of the same benevolent spirit with their Lord and Master, who always acted upon the principle that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." He knew, therefore, that he was placing before them a motive which they could readily appreciate. But the plain, undoubted inference from the passage, is that which we wish to impress upon our readers, viz: that the Apostle considered giving to the needy to be the right use of property—the very thing for which it is bestowed—the object which should be had in view in all our toils to acquire it.

Let us now see in what light the Inspired Volume speaks of those who act on a dieffrent principle; that is, of those who act on the principle commonly received in the world. It presents us the case of a certain person whose ground brought forth plentifully, and who was consequently very successful in "laying up for a rainy day." He had "much goods laid up for many years." Why, surely, this was a wise man—was he not? He acted only the part of prudence. Alas! he was far from being wise. "God said to him, Thou FOOL." Why? Because he "laid up treasure FOR HIMSELF, and was not rich towards God." Yet we ask if this man did not act exactly as thousands of the professed disciples of Christ are acting at this day? He is not represented as having been guilty of any crime shocking to the moral sense of community. He is not represented as profane, or debauched, or fraudulent in his dealings. For aught that appears to the contrary, he may have been what the world calls a well-doing, upright, honest man. The head and front of his offending consisted in making himself the great object for which he lived. He did not make a right use of his property. What would have been a right use of it, we may readily learn from the manner in which our Savior goes on to instruct his disciples, immediately after he had cited this case. "Sell that ye have," says he, "and give alms; provide yourselves bags which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens, that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth; for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." Luke 12: 33. Here we have it, as plain as language can make it, that the duty of the Christian, with regard to his property, is not to hoard it up, for the sake of getting into such a condition that he and his children can say, "Soul, take thine ease; eat, drink, and be merry;" but to dispose of it in works of charity. The same lesson was inculcated to the rich young man, who inquired what good thing he should do to inherit eternal life. "Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor." And if we compare these passages with what is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, that "all that believed were together, and had all things common; and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need," (Acts 2: 44, 45; and again, that "as many as were possessors of lands or houses, sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the Apostles' feet; and distribution was made to every man according as he had need," (chap. 4: 34, 35,)—we shall see, that the great lesson of Christianity with regard to property is, that it is to be held in readiness to supply the wants of the destitute, and to promote the cause of God in the earth. The altered state of the times may render it unnecessary that Christians should actually sell their property, and throw it into one common fund, as they did of old; but the duty of considering it not their own, and holding themselves in readiness to yield it up whenever the clear leadings of Providence shall demand it, remains in full force. It may also be quite unnecessary to lay down the proceeds of our property at the feet of any supposed successors of the Apostles, to be disposed of according to their dictation. That was a measure suited to the then existing state of the Church, when the canon of Scripture was not complete. The Apostles, in directing it to be so done, acted by inspiration, and in laying the money at their feet, the disciples simply yielded it up to the disposal of their Lord and Master. But our Lord and Master now speaks through the full and completed canon of Scripture, from which every conscientious disciple may learn, as unequivocally as if we had Apostles to declare it by word of mouth, that the true use of property is to make it minister to the temporal, spiritual, and eternal good of mankind.

GLASGOW, June 14th, 1850.

The review since our last presents a number of important subjects for notice. A preference is, however, due to that which it is the especial honor and privilege of THE RECORDER to maintain—what bears favorably or unfavorably upon the observance of the Sabbath of the Lord. And, first, of Lord Ashley's motion in the House of Commons, the telegraphic announcement referred to in my last communication was not strictly correct. The notice given by his Lordship was of a motion for an Address to Her Majesty to take measures for the shutting of the Post-Offices, and also for preventing the transmission of the mails on Sunday. The friends of the measure, however, as it now appears, regarding so large a demand as hopeless, urged that the measure should be restricted to an address praying for the shutting of the Post Offices, and for consideration of the question of the mails. The London Record avows, that the alteration was made in order to secure votes which would otherwise have been refused. But the success of the motion, even in this modified form, has confessedly taken its friends themselves by surprise; and one of the London journals, unfavorable to the measure, says that had it not been the day after Derby day (the races,) it would have been lost—no very flattering consideration, that the nation's Sabbath should be either made or mended by attendants on the race-course.

What the result of this motion, may be, scarcely yet appears. Since it passed, Mr. Hume, on the 3d inst., asked in the House of Commons if Government would consent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire how far, and at what expense, the objects at which it aims could be carried out. Lord John Russell replied, that if Mr. Hume made a motion upon the subject, he would give it his consideration. But more recently, Government have intimated the intention of acceding. In the present tone and temper of British society, it seems impossible that such a resolution can be persevered in. The first result will, probably, be the establishment, by private parties, of the facilities which the Government denies. The spirit of observing truly either Sabbath or Sunday is not felt; and the external barriers which may be raised to give a semblance of it, will speedily be overthrown. It is this very want of an inward spring of action, which renders it so necessary, on the part of the ecclesiastical leaders, to maintain so zealously the means of agitation. In the General Assemblies, both of the Established and Free Churches, which have lately been in session, the subject was again brought up. It is the Free Church which is especially earnest in the cause. They have, however, met with a mortification in the matter. On a former occasion of the discussion of the subject, the London Times, the leading journal, as it claims, and is allowed to be, gave a leading article, so much to the mind of the Free Church, that a vote of congratulation—offensively fulsome, was passed in their Church court, which the Times professed duly to prize. But, alas! on the decision in favor of Lord Ashley's motion, this unprincipled journal, as it is, and as it had been, has devoted a leader to the denunciation of the hypocrisy which it now sees will be implied in giving that motion effect. Speaking of the numerous petitioners for the shutting of the Post-Offices, the Times says, "We confess to a considerable degree of disgust at seeing so many persons demanding from the State, in the name of God and His commandment, that which they will not do themselves, as may be seen at every church door in the metropolis, not to speak of still more gratuitous Sabbath desecration."

The Sunday Fairs' Prevention Bill has also passed, and a bill to prevent Sunday trading is before the House of Lords. On the debate, in Committee, Lord Brougham asked why newspapers were sold on Sunday, and Bibles forbidden—why "Bell's Life," with accounts of horse-race bets, was to be had, when he could not buy a Prayer Book? Such, indeed, are part of the inconsistencies of our Legislature; but the inconsistency is in the people's practice as well as in the law. White petitions were pouring into Parliament, praying that the Post-Offices might be shut up, I observed, that on one Sunday, last month, "167,000 persons landed and embarked from the different steam-boats plying between Chelsea and Woolwich, exclusive of numbers conveyed to Richmond, Putney, Gravesend, Margate, &c."

On the Continent of Europe, the disregard of the day, as a day having divine authority, is known; and the manner of its observance in France at the time of the Revolution was chronicled in the Recorder. It is within the scope of our calling still to note such observances as fill up the day which supplants the Sabbath of the Lord. On the first Sunday of the present month, the President of the French Republic attended the races at Versailles; and the second Sunday he presided at the opening of a branch line of the Northern Railway. At the races, the British Ambassador was in the President's stand, while other English noblemen were present. The number of spectators is stated to have been immense.

The German correspondent of a religious paper in this country, speaking of the efforts being made at present for promoting Sunday sanctification in Germany, states that a "Magazine" has been commenced chiefly with that design. He refers to articles recently inserted, one of which maintains "that the Law was given to the Israelites in the same intention as to us," and "that neither the Law nor the Fourth Commandment, which forms part of it, is abolished, but that they are both of permanent obligation." How strangely that commandment is read, when Sunday sanctification is found in it! Speaking of the present observance in Berlin, the writer of an article in that Magazine says, "On Sunday morning we went to the New Market and the Rosenthal Gate; the bustle and cursing, and buying and selling, showed that no one thought of the Sabbath." At nine o'clock the Police, however, announced that it was Sunday, and that worship was about to commence; but "the Sunday market continued undisturbed." The shops, with few exceptions, were open, and brewers' drays rolled along. Little attention is paid to church services, and much to pleasure. The beer-shop, the coffee-house, and the trains, are crowded; and, "in the evening, all stream to the theatres." Dancing saloons are also open. This, indeed, is said to be the general state of most cities in Germany.

The state of the weather here has mercifully been favorable, and the crops generally are looking well. A greater number of potatoes have been planted than for several years past; in Ireland, it is said there are four times as many as last year. The general report, both for Scotland and Ireland, as well as England, is, I believe, that they are hitherto without disease; although one paragraph I have seen which stated that there had been observed symptoms of disease on those in the vice-regal gardens at Dublin.

J. A. BEGG.

COLLEGE AND THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

In all discussions of our educational interests, the College and the Theological enterprise should be considered as one and inseparable. It would, doubtless, be expedient, under existing circumstances, to locate a Theological Professor at some one of our Academies, until we could get a College started; but this should be considered only a temporary arrangement—an arrangement adopted rather from the necessities of the case than from its being the best in and of itself. Any plan proposing the permanent establishment of one without the other, or both independent of each other, will fail in the end of producing the greatest good to the denomination. The truth of this is so evident, that it needs no labored proof.

This being premised, the questions arise: When shall we have both? How shall we go to work? The time and method depend very much upon each other. There have been two distinct and opposing methods proposed; consequently, there might be expected two different times for accomplishing the object. It was the opinion of Conference, that "it is exceedingly desirable that we, as a denomination, should have a College and Theological Seminary." That body also appointed an Educational Committee, whose duty it was to commence active operations for the accomplishment of so desirable an object. Thus, then and there, was commenced an enterprise, which may nothing prevent from being brought to a prosperous termination—an enterprise, not undertaken rashly, nor intended to be driven forward with an inconsiderate zeal, but undertaken deliberately, to be prosecuted as fast, and only as fast, as sound discretion might dictate. This has been conclusively shown by "A Member of the last Conference."

It is a little difficult to determine, accurately, what is desired on the other hand. The author of "A College—Practical View," gives the denomination to understand, that the course which it has marked out for itself is wrong, entirely wrong. In "What is Needed," he informs the denomination that a College is not the thing—"it will stand directly in the way of educating the people." A College would educate only a "few," and that "few" would be doomed to evaporation; neverthelesss, these evaporated, gaseous substances, might indeed be useful in carrying forward the enterprises of the denomination. Truly, we have unique denominational interests and enterprises, that can be advanced by such instrumentalities! As one of the grand "Ways and Means"—the great climax, the crowning glory—a College is proposed—that thing which is to stand in the way of the education of the people. What will become of the people then?

The denomination is not informed when this result will be brought about. It is only by inferences, drawn from the several facts stated, that the approximate time can be ascertained. He says: "A College, to be an honor to our denomination, or one where our youth can be properly educated, must stand on a level, in respect to facilities, with the best colleges in the land, if not actually above them. Any thing less would be a dead weight—a hinderance—a curse." "A College, to bear a medium reputation, should have at least fifty annual graduates." Now, of course he would not wish to have a College when it would be a "dead weight—a hinderance—a curse." The most ardent "aspirants" after the welfare of the denomination had not anticipated, that commencing now, and laboring faithfully and zealously, as proposed by Conference, it would have a College on a level with the best, short of fifty, seventy-five, or perhaps even a hundred years. If, in that time, fifty annual graduates—the number stated to be necessary for a college of "medium reputation"—could be sent forth, they would be satisfied that a great and good work had been performed. It is more, in proportion to our numbers and resources, than other denominations are doing. Amherst, Brown, Dickinson, Hamilton, Harvard, Meadville, Madison, Oberlin, Union, and Yale, are ten institutions, which, as a class, sustain, at least, "a medium reputation" with American Colleges. According to their late Catalogues, the average number of graduates from the ten, for the past year, was only about forty-three, and for the present year it will be about the same. Deducting Harvard, Union, and Yale, the remaining seven average only twenty-five. Harvard, considered the leading institution in America, has not, since its first endowment, averaged thirty annual graduates. Although the common level of Colleges falls so far below the point of even a "medium reputation," will it be said that they are all a "dead weight—a hinderance—a curse?" Should we flatter ourselves with the vain hope of so far outstripping all that have gone before us, as to perform, without "preparatory measures," what they have not been able to accomplish in many years, with a "long circuit of means?" If it will take thus long, commencing immediately, to come up to the desired number, how long will it take, adopting the plan of not commencing until we can burst forth npon the world with the splendor of a College of fifty or a hundred years growth? One would naturally suppose, that such a College would not commence operations until the present generation had slumbered in their silent graves for ages; but all doubts upon that point are removed by the writer's own language. He places it in that far-off future—in the "good time coming"—when the erection of a College will be only a "pastime"—when New England, Wisconsin, and California, will be "adjacent neighborhoods." The time is likened to that when there "sprang at once into being this mighty globe." "No long circuit of means would be required—no preparatory measures." Now, the most "ardent" had not hoped for such a time as that, before the millennium "shall roll around." But, admitting this to be a wrong view—admitting that the message is soon to be committed "to the wings of the electric dove"—that she is soon to perform the proposed journey, attended with the predicted success, so that ere she would have had time to return, and nestle snugly in her eastern dove-cot, or ere the vision of college schemes has scarcely begun to dance through the brains of those so unexpectedly awakened, it should be announced to an astonished, delighted denomination, that it had a College, all officered and manned, and ready to turn off fifty graduates at its first commencement—would the denomination have breath, skill, and experience, sufficient to blow such a "whistle?" Would there not be danger of "reaction?"

Any view taken of this subject, which tends to convey the impression that the erection of a College will be a mere "pastime," is illusive. The denomination should be made to understand, and to feel, that such an enterprise, undertaken at any period short of the "good time coming," will cost labor—hard, persevering labor. We should "know the worst, and provide for it." Nothing tends so much to cause "reaction," as flattering prospects, which are never to be realized. Conference evidently anticipated a long and arduous struggle, and determined to commence accordingly. The reviewer of the Conference plan seems to have labored under the impression that this enterprise is to proceed with such rapidity, that a College will burst upon us so suddenly that we shall be utterly unprepared for action; consequently a "reaction" must take place. There is not much danger of this.

From the above facts and inferences, the two plans, as far as developed, appear to be about as follows: Conference proposed to commence operations immediately; the author of the opposing plan proposed to commence, if at all, in an indefinite future. To the former, "the plan of making it a gradual, progressive work, appeared the most feasible;" to the latter, that of making it a work with a few or no "preparatory measures," appeared the most desirable. The one expected a long and arduous struggle; the other, a mere "pastime." Conference thought it best to commence bearing the burden early, and to increase it as we are able; the brother, on the other hand, thinks it best not to commence until we can shoulder at once one far above the "medium" size. The former, like Ortugrul of Basra, determined to arrive at success by "persevering industry;" the latter, like the same in his dreams, desires the stream of success, when it shall once commence flowing, to be quick and violent. Which of the two appears to be the practical, common-sense, every-day, working method—the method for securing, in the shortest time, the best College and Theological Seminary?

A FRIEND OF PROGRESS.

TURNER'S LANDSCAPES.—Under date of London, May 9th, a young American artist says: "The Exhibitions are all finally open, and I have seen all that English art can show. There are several pictures by Turner, the great landscape artist, the most beautiful things I ever saw. One of them has the Sun in the center, painted in such a way as really to dazzle you, and make your eyes twinkle. He is now an old man, nearly eighty, yet he retains his powers of mind to such a degree as to be continually improving, and painting better each year than the year preceding. His pictures sell at from $5,000 to $15,000 each. With us, these would seem to be enormous prices; but they are not considered remarkably high here. Some instances are known of $5,000 being paid merely for permission to engrave a picture. I shall consider myself well repaid for my trouble in coming out here by seeing Turner's pictures. I have seen, I suppose, two or three hundred of them, and hope to see many more before I return."

THE WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Western Association met with the church at Friendship, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 19th day of June, and continued in session three days. The Introductory Discourse was preached by Eld. Leman Andrs, from 2d Cor. 4: 5; after which the Association was called to order, and JAMES BAILEY chosen Moderator, and ASA C. BURDICK and EZEKIEL R. CLARK, Secretaries.

The Letters from the Churches show but little clear increase during the year. A good many additions are reported, but there are also reported a good many dismissions and exclusions—a circumstance which attracted the attention of the Association, and led to the adoption of a resolution suggesting the inquiry whether the discipline of the churches is not radically deficient either in spirit or in form.

The Missionary Operations of the Association have been tolerably well sustained, and the results of the labor bestowed are truly cheering. We shall soon—probably next week—give the Report of the Executive Committee entire.

A letter from the 2d Alfred church requested advice from the Association relative to the ordination of Bro. Jared Kenyon to the work of the gospel ministry—a request which was referred to the Presbytery, who advised the ordination, at such time as the church shall appoint.

The subject of Education was largely discussed by the Association, and a lengthy report upon it was adopted, the first part of which will be found in our paper to-day.

Among the resolutions adopted by the Association, was one expressive of unqualified opposition to Secret Societies; another deprecating the indifference of parents to the religious instruction of their children, and earnestly recommending all parents to adopt a systematic course of family worship and religious instruction. A committee was appointed to prepare, and present at the next meeting of the Association, a report on the subject of religious instruction in families.

The Officers of the Association for the ensuing year are as follows:—Thos. E. Babcock, of Independence, Cor. Sec.; D. R. Stillman, of Alfred, Treasurer; T. E. Babcock, W. C. Kenyon, J. A. Langworthy, C. D. Langworthy, and N. V. Hull, Executive Committee.

The next meeting of the Association is to be held with the 2d church in Alfred, on the fourth Sabbath in June, 1851—to continue two days only.

This imperfect sketch of the Association's proceedings is prepared after a hasty perusal of the MS. of the Minutes. We shall probably copy the more important of the reports at an early day.

HOLIDAY OF CHIMNEY SWEEPS.—A letter from Wm. Jas. Stillman, dated London, May 9, 1850, says:—"The first of May was the Sweeps' Holiday. They paraded the streets, dressed, as their custom is on that day, in fantastic array, and accompanying a 'Jack in the Green'—a man encased in a hollow pyramid of ivy leaves, surmounted with flowers. At intervals they stopped, formed themselves into a ring around the pyramid, and danced a sort of jig to the music of a pan-pipe and drum; the 'Jack in the Green,' meanwhile, going through very strange evolutions and revolutions, whirling and spinning with a velocity that would turn any one's head that was not crazy. They were accompanied by divers females, gaudily attired, trimmed with flowers, and carrying brass ladles in their hands, which they passed round the crowd in hope of receiving sundry half-pence; after which they move on to victimize some other locality. It is, I suppose, a relic of the May-day Festival; but—O tempora! O mores!—to think that all which remains of that beautiful custom should be in the hands of Chimney Sweeps."

REVIVAL AT ADAMS, N. Y.—A letter from Eld. Alexander Campbell, pastor of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., dated June 23, says: "It affords me much pleasure to inform you, that God is favoring us with a precious season of refreshing in Adams. It is about three months since there began to be apparant some seriousness upon the minds of the young people in this place, which has been constantly increasing and ripening into a glorious revival of religion. Christians have been quickened, strengthened, and encouraged; some backsliders have been reclaimed; and between twenty and thirty perishing souls have been hopefully converted to God, eighteen of whom were added to the Seventh-day Baptist Church by baptism last Sabbath. The gracious work appears to be moving onward."

RICH INCENSE BURNER.—A foreign paper gives some account of a rich Incense Burner recently sent as a present from the clergy of France to the Pope, on his restoration to the papal throne. It is one of the finest pieces of workmanship ever seen. It is of solid gold, adorned with carbuncles of extraordinary size, said to be the gift of a lady of the Faubourg St. Germain, whose wedding parure they once adorned. The chasing of the vessel is exquisite, representing the incidents of the life of St. Peter, while the lid is surmounted with the Gallic cock, with expanded wings, composed of the most brilliant and costly gems of every color. The names of the workmen employed in the chasing, as well as the manufacturer of the article, are engraved on the inside of the cover.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, June 24.

Robert W. Barnwell, successor of the late Mr. Elmore, who succeeded Mr. Calhoun, appeared and took his seat as Senator from South Carolina.

The Compromise Bill was taken up, and Mr. Douglass gave notice of an amendment providing that two new States, to be called Sacramento and Colorado, may be erected out of the territory of California, with the consent of that State, said States to be admitted upon an equal footing. Mr. Soule offered his amendment, and made a speech on the subject, which occupied the remainder of the session. He proposes to limit the southern boundary of California to the Missouri Line of 36° 30′, with a declaration that the Territory south of that line may come in bye-and-bye, as a State, under the name of South California, with or without slavery, as her people may desire.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House adopted a resolution instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of providing a law, compelling all craft carrying passengers, and navigating the waters of the United States, to be provided with ample and suitable resources of escape to passengers, in cases of accident by fire or otherwise.

The Bounty Land Bill was then taken up, and three hours were occupied in five-minute speeches upon amendments, not one of which was adopted. Without disposing of the subject, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, June 25.

The Senate did nothing worth mentioning, except to listen to the conclusion of Mr. Soule's speech in favor of the Missouri line to the Pacific.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Bounty Land Bill came up, and after rejecting several proposed amendments, the House adopted the Bill by a vote of 155 to 36.

This bill provides that each of the surviving commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians or privates, whether of regulars or volunteers, rangers or militia, who performed military service in any regiment, company, or detachment in the service of the United States, in the war with Great Britain, declared by the United States, on the 18th day of June, 1812, or in any of the Indian wars since 1790, and each of the commissioned officers who were engaged in the military service of the United States in the last war with Mexico, shall be entitled, for twelve months' service, to one hundred and sixty acres of land; for six months' service to eighty acres of land, and for three months' service to forty acres of land—provided the person so having been in service shall not receive said land, or any part thereof, if it shall appear by the muster-roll of his regiment, or of his corps, that he deserted or was dishonorably discharged from service, or if he has received or is entitled to any land bounty under any act of Congress heretofore passed.

Section two provides, that each commissioned and non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, for whom provision is made by the first section hereof, shall receive a certificate or warrant from the Department of the Interior, for the quantity of land to which he may be entitled, and which may be located by the warrantee, or his heirs at law, at any Land Office in the United States. In the event of the death of those who shall have served as aforesaid, prior or subsequent to the passage of this act, the benefit is to inure to their widows.

IN SENATE. FOURTH-DAY, June 26.

Mr. Foote presented a resolution calling on the President for copies of all orders to Col. Monroe, and all correspondence between that gentleman and the authorities at Washington in regard to the civil and military Government of New Mexico, and the recent movement for a State organization, &c.; the resolution lies over.

The Senate then took up the Compromise Bill, and, after remarks by Mr. Douglass, laid it down again; renewed the order for meeting at 11 o'clock, and finally adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Stanton of Tenn. offered a resolution asking the President to tell the House all about the state of affairs in New Mexico. Objection was made, and the resolution was not introduced. The remainder of the session was spent in the consideration of the Iowa contested election case. No action.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, June 27.

The Supplementary Census Bill was taken up and passed.

Mr. Foote's resolution, in relation to proceedings in Mexico, was amended and adopted.

The Compromise Bill was taken up, and the remainder of the day was spent in talk about the Missouri Compromise Line. Mr. Webster exhibited the futility of the effort to extend that line, and the unreasonableness of further resistance to the admission of California. Remarks were also made by Messrs. Foote, Barnwell, Butler, and Davis.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Iowa contested election case occupied the House all day, and the end was not reached even then.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, June 28.

Several speeches were made on the Compromise Bill, and a vote was taken on Mr. Soule's amendment, (extending the Missouri Line to the Pacific,) which was lost by 17 majority—yeas 19, nays 36. Mr. John Davis made a speech against the entire compromise scheme, and in favor of the Wilmot Proviso.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Iowa contested election case was early on the docket and occupied the whole day.

IN SENATE. SABBATH, June 29.

Two or three resolutions of inquiry were submitted, and briefly discussed; after which the Compromise Bill was taken up; Mr. Davis of Mass. concluded his speech against it, and Mr. Cooper followed in support of it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Nothing done in the House except to dispose of the Iowa contested election case. It was voted, 102 to 94, that Mr. Thompson is not entitled to the seat. It was then voted, 109 to 84, that a vacancy exists in the representation from Iowa. And so the matter rests.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

By the steamer Canada, arrived at Boston since our last, intelligence was received from Liverpool to June 15th, London 13th, and Paris 12th, of which we give the substance.

The debates in the British Parliament present few features of general interest, beyond the fact that Ministers have been again beaten by a majority of 32. On Tuesday, Lord Nass moved that the House resolve itself into Committe to consider the present mode of levying the duty on home-made spirits in bond. The Chancellor of Exchequer resisted, and made the motion a Government question. A discussion ensued, the House divided, and the Government were thoroughly beaten. The Chancellor has announced in the Commons that it is the intention of the Government to close all Post-Offices on Sunday, and an inquiry was to take place to see if it be not practicable to stop the mails also. This movement has met with no favor from the majority of the people. A new bill to limit the sale of Encumbered Estates in Ireland has been introduced and twice read in the House of Lords. The object of the bill is to exempt from sale all estates not mortgaged to a certain amount, and fixing the minimum.

In the French Assembly, the bill for suppressing clubs and the political bodies has been voted for another year. The bill for granting pensions to the families of those killed and wounded in the affair of February and June, was rejected by a great majority. The bill granting pensions to the deserving of the working classes when infirmity overtakes them, was also passed by a full House. The Committee appointed to consider the proposed great increase in the salary of the President have not recommended acquiescence in the demand. It is said, however, that the leaders of the majority intend voting for the bill, and a sharp contest is expected. Another project of law, for fettering the press by a stamp duty, at present is engaging the attention of Government. M. Thiers has left Paris to visit Louis Philippe in England. It is said that his visit has a deep political change in view. He had an interview with the President before leaving Paris. A union of the two houses of the Bourbons is said to be the object of M. Thiers' visit to the Ex-King at London.

Latest accounts from Rome state that the Pope is wholly absorbed in religious ceremonies, to the exclusion of all attention to his Temporal Government. The people are said to evince a very uneasy state of feeling, and nothing but the presence of foreign troops restrains a popular demonstration against the Government.

Four Days Later from Europe.

By the American steamer Pacific, which arrived at New York on Second-day last, we have Liverpool dates to June 19th, four days later. In the British House of Lords on the 17th, an exciting debate grew out of a motion relative to the conduct of Government in the Greek affair; on dividing, the Ministers were left in a minority of 39 in a House of 300. The Times says that should the Ministry not speedily resign, there is a growing belief that the great exhibition of all nations in London will fail for want of funds.

It is rumored that the Bishop of Exeter, in disgust at the termination of his controversy with Rev. Mr. Gorham, is about to secede to the Church of Rome.

The Royal Mail Steamship Company have been defeated in the action brought against them by the owners of the Charles Bartlett, run down at sea by the steamship Europa last year.

The growing crops throughout England and Ireland are said to look unusually promising.

M. Thiers has raturned to France from London, and is considered dangerously ill.

A terrific hurricane occurred in the Bay of Bengal on the 26th of April, which was felt a distance of twelve hundred miles; the banks of the rivers were overflown nearly as far as Calcutta, causing immense damage in the destruction of vegetation.

CALIFORNIA ITEMS.—From the items made up on the arrival of California papers last week, we select the following :—

Gold is still found in great abundance in California. The most extravagant stories are told of "Tuolumo Placer," lately discovered on the river of that name, near Columbia City. The Stockton Times says that a simple statement of facts far surpasses the most wondrous dream of the necromancer. It is stated that lumps of pure gold have been found to the depth of sixty feet from the surface. The 6th of the last month two large masses of gold, one weighing 23 pounds 2 oz., and the other 10 pounds 11 oz., were dug from the placer.

The Stockton Times says that three men, in the space of two weeks, took out $30,000 from one hole, at the new diggings, four miles above Sonora, besides one lump weighing five pounds.

A California paper expresses its pleasure in announcing the recent arrival of some fifty or sixty of the fairer sex, in full bloom. They are from all quarters—some from Yankee land, others from John Bull country, and quite a constellation from merry France. One Frenchman brings twenty—all, they say, beautiful! The bay was dotted by flotillas of young men, on the announcement of this extraordinary importation."

A SOUTHERN TRAGEDY.—Col. DUPREE was recently killed in Hinds county, Mississippi, by his son-in-law, Mr. J. S. Graves. The parties had a difference for some time previously. On the 8th inst. they met at a church near Brownsville. Graves left the church, but was soon followed by Dupree, who approached him and asked if he was armed. Graves, hoping to prevent a difficulty, said he was not. Dupree then pulled Graves from his horse, and cut him several times with a knife, when Graves drew a pistol and shot the Colonel through the body. Col. Dupree died in about two days. Mr. Graves gave himself up to the authorities and was acquitted, the evidence proving justifiable homicide.

The Erie Railroad Company has advertised to discount all its outstanding liabilities due previously to the 1st September, on application at the office of the Company.

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION IN MEXICO.—In times past it was very dangerous for individuals or the public press to speak against the Catholic religion and in favor of religious toleration in Mexico. Of late, things are much changed, and greater freedom is allowed. The newspaper El Monitor has recently commenced a kind of crusade against the priests, by publishing several spirited articles in favor of the tolerance of religious worship; also, against their having anything to do with the education of youth, attributing to their influence the unenlightened state of the people, and asserting, with much truth, that "the clergy, for the sake of their own preservation, are enemies to the progress of intelligence." It is also stated, that the same paper has come out decidedly against the priests for their rebellious sermons preached during the days devoted to the intercession for Divine interference in defending the city from the cholera. Sermons were preached in which it was proclaimed that the vengeance of Heaven was sent on account of their tolerating a wicked government.

IMPORTANT MOVEMENTS IN NEW MEXICO.—Advices from Santa Fé to May 25 have been received. A Convention of Delegates, called by proclamation of John Monroe, Military and Civil Governor of New Mexico, has been held, and has formed and promulgated a Constitution for the Government of New Mexico. The Convention assembled on the 15th of May, and the session lasted eight or nine days, in which a Constitution was formed, which was to go into operation about the first of July. The boundaries of the State were defined, and Slavery prohibited. The Constitution was adopted on the 25th May. In fifteen days afterward, an election was to take place for Members of the State Legislature. Two Senators and Representatives in Congress were soon to be elected, and efforts were also to be made to procure them acceptance at Washington.

LAND WARRANTS.—By reference to the Congressional Proceedings, it will be seen that on Third-day of last week the House of Representatives passed the Bounty Land Bill. To pay these bounties will require a large amount of land—some say five million acres, others say four times that. One effect is, that the price of Land Warrants has fallen. One hundred dollars is now the nominal value of regular Warrants, but the business is at a stand.

SUMMARY.

The steamship City of Glasgow arrived at New York on Sabbath last, having made the passage from Greenock in 14 days and 6 hours. The perfect satisfaction of the passengers with the ship and officers, is set forth in a letter to Capt. Mathews, signed by Robert Renfrew, Chairman of a Committee.

The ladies of Syracuse, N. Y., held a convention on the 24th of June, at which they passed resolutions cordially approving the objects of the Free School Convention, inviting the attendance of ladies upon the Convention, and tendering the hospitalities of the city to all who may attend.

The steamship Viceroy went ashore, on Tuesday evening of last week, on Shag Island, between Cape Sable and the Sea Islands. She will propably be got off. The catastrophe is attributed to the same cause assigned for the loss of the Great Britain—the effect of an iron ball on the compass.

The New Orleans Delta understands that President Taylor has purchased the splendid sugar plantation of Capt. Fullerton, situated about 25 miles from New Orleans, on the river, for which he paid $73,000 in cash. It is the purpose of the General to abandon his cotton plantation near Rodney, which is subject to constant overflows, and concentrate his force upon his new purchase.

A curious freak of nature may be seen on an apple tree in Medford, says the Portland Advertiser, in the yard of Mr. Nathan Childs. Upon a branch of this tree there are three large white roses. Originally there were five; and what is still more singular is, that they are all upon a new sprout of this year's growth.

While a Coroner, at Cincinnati, the other day, was engaged in holding an inquest on the body of a man found drowned in the river, a young man stopped to see what was going on, and after awhile recognized the body as that of his father, whom he had crossed the ocean in search after.

DIED.

In this city, on the morning of the 29th ult., Mr. BENJAMIN JACOB, aged 53 years. The deceased was a native of Ireland, and had been so short a time in America that he died "a stranger in a strange land," and was borne to his grave almost neglected and uncared for, except by his own immediate family—a widow and six children. Nevertheless, there is abundant terson to believe, that though "poor and needy, the Lord thought upon him." During his illness of five months he gave proof of his faith in Him who never forsakes his people.

In Adams, N. Y., on the 10th of April last, of a short and distressing illness, SALLY LEE, aged 33 years. She was a worthy member of the Baptist Church in Adams. She bore her sickness with Christian fortitude and resignation, and expired in good hope of eternal life. She has left an affectionate husband and two children to mourn her loss. The following lines were written by the subject of this notice not long before her last sickness and death:—

O why this dread of death,
When Jesus bids us come,
And calls us from the cares of earth
To Heaven, our better home.

Harper's New Monthly Magazine,
No. 1 published June 1, 1850.

PROSPECTUS.—The design of the Publishers in issuing this work, is to place within the reach of the great mass of American people the unbounded treasures of the Periodical Literature of the present day. Periodicals enlist much of the literary talent and creative genius of the age. The best writers in every nation, devote themselves mainly to the Reviews, Magazines, and Newspapers. Through the pages of these, the most powerful historical essays, the most elaborate critical disquisitions, the most exquisite delineations of manners and of Nature, the highest Poetry, and the most brilliant Wit, have, within the last ten years, found their way to the public heart.

The ablest and best productions of Lamartine, Dickens, Alison, Lever, Bulwer, Croly, and Macauley, are found in Reviews, Newspapers, and Magazines. Their productions, however, intermingled with much that is of merely local and transient interest, are scattered through scores of periodicals, so as to make it obviously impossible that, under present circumstances, any considerable number even of the reading public, and much more, that the great mass of the community, should have an opportunity of becoming familiar with them.

The Publishers of the New Monthly Magazine intend to remedy this evil, and to place such of the Periodical Literature of the day, as has commanding interest, in the hands of all who have the slightest desire to become acquainted with it. Each number of their Magazine will contain 144 pages octavo, in double columns. The volume of a single year, therefore, will present nearly 2,000 pages of the choicest of the Miscellaneous Literature of the age. The Magazine will transfer to its pages, as rapidly as they may be issued, the continuous tales of Dickens, Bulwer, Croly, Lever, Warren, and other distinguished contributors to British Periodicals; articles of commanding interest from all the leading Quarterly Reviews of both Great Britain and the United States; critical notices of the publications of the day; speeches and addresses of distinguished men upon topics of universal interest; notices of events in Science, Literature, and Art, in which the people at large have an interest, &c., &c. Special regard will be had to such articles as relate to the economy of social life, or tend to promote in any way the well-being of those who are engaged in any department of productive activity. A carefully prepared Fashion plate, and other pictorial illustrations, will accompany each number.

This Magazine is not intended exclusively for any class of readers. The Publishers have at their command the exhaustless resources of current Periodical Literature in all its departments. They have the aid of editors in whom both they and the public confide. They have no doubt that, by an intelligent use of these appliances, they can present a monthly compendium of the periodical productions of the day which no one would willingly be without; and they intend to publish it at so low a rate that its cost shall not prevent its making its way into the hands and family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States.

TERMS—$3 a year, or 25 cents a number. The work may be obtained of Booksellers and Periodical Agents, and of the Publishers.

Liberal arrangements will be made with the Trade and with Agents for extra efforts in circulating the work, and specimen numbers will be supplied gratuitously for canvassers.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Miscellaneous.

CONDITION AND PROSPECTS OF HAYTI.

The following, from the Washington Correspondence of the New York Courier and Enquirer, gives the most intelligible account we have seen of the object of Mr. Green's recent mission to Hayti :—

As the return of the special agent—Mr. B. E. Green—who was appointed to visit the Island of Hayti, twelve months ago, has occasioned some speculations in the press, which are calculated to mislead the public, it is proper that the real objects of that mission should be understood, since they were never designed to be secret, and never have been so regarded here. Shortly after the Administration came into power, attention was directed to the diminished state of our commerce with that Island, which, from being larger than with all the British West Indies, had, in a period of seven years, been reduced, by civil wars between the blacks and Dominicans, and other causes, to an inconsiderable trade.

This was a sufficient object, in itself, to have justified the employment of an agent, if there was any reasonable prospect of reviving that depreciated commerce by negotiation or more liberal regulations. The important position occupied by St. Domingo, and the abundant supply of coal which its vicinity furnished, also presented inducements, in connection with our steam marine trading with California and distant parts, to demand the attention of the Government. Superadded to these considerations, however, it was ascertained about the same time that England and France had conceived designs for obtaining a foothold on the eastern part of the Island, under the Dominican Government, which might operate to the disadvantage of the interests of the United States.

It was under these circumstances that Mr. Green was employed to obtain the necessary information concerning the population, wealth, and resources of that portion of Hayti called Dominica, and inhabited principally by the white and mixed races. One of the objects was to ascertain their capacity for self-government, for the administration of justice and the like, looking to the recognition of their independence, should it become necessary, as a means of saving this territory from foreign jurisdiction, or be rendered proper, by the spirit of enlightened progress and civilization. The intelligence communicated to the Government on these subjects is interesting and important, and may be used with benefit to the great commercial community.

The agent was instructed, after fulfilling his mission at St. Domingo, to proceed to Port-au-Prince, for the purpose of obtaining the recognition of consular agents, who had never before been received or acknowledged, and of procuring a repeal of a standing imposition of ten per cent. duty against American commerce. In the wars against the Dominicans, Solouque had confiscated American property to carry on hostilities, and the arguments of the agent were strengthened by a demand for reparation. I am gratified to say, that the American flag now affords protection to American commerce at Port-au-Prince ; that the impost has been abandoned, and that the just indemnity will be forthcoming in good season. Mr. Green is engaged in the preparation of his report, which will be laid before Congress at an early day.

A Washington Correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin, under date of June 19, makes the following statements in relation to the condition and prospects of Hayti :—

It is quite possible, from the aspect of our relations with Hayti, that a brush will ensue with his Sable Majesty, Solouque, notwithstanding the efforts of Mr. Clayton to prevent it. The fact is, that the arrogant ruler of that naturally fair isle conceives himself as potent in his imperial greatness as ever Louis Philippe was in the palmiest of his days, and a war with the United States is not looked upon by him as a matter of such dreadful moment, but that it may lead to the annexation of the American Confederacy to his own dominions. But let us reverse the tables. If Hayti provokes a war, she must pawn her territory, because money she has not, and never can have, while England and France are so largely her bondholders.

Cuba excepted, the island of Hayti is the largest and most fertile of the West India group. It is 260 leagues in length by 40 in breadth, and has a superficial area of 2,450 square miles, or 1,478,000 acres. It embraces a population of 820,000, of which only 30,000 are whites, and even this computation is supposed to be exaggerated. Port-au-Prince contains 20,000 souls, and Cape Haytien about 11,000. The natural fertility of the island is not its only richness. Mines of gold, silver, copper, tin, iron and salt, are supposed to exist in considerable quantities ; but owing to the political condition of the country, they have never been extensively worked, or even explored, by the whites, and the blacks are too indolent. The products are less than one-sixth now of what they were in 1789, and less than one-twentieth of what they might be under Anglo-Saxon management. To illustrate this fact, I append the gradual decline since the year named, which will also show how unfortunate it is that a gift so valuable to commerce, should be consigned to the ignorant care and ownership of a community of blacks, whose only merit to notice, is their extensive laziness and pompous indulgence in what they conceive to be the pride of civil freedom. Here are the figures—mark well these havocs of time :—

The imports from Hayti for the year 1789 were,

Clayed Sugar	lbs.	47,516,531
Muscovado Sugar		92,575,000
Coffee		76,835,219
Cotton		7,001.814
Cocoa		658,813
Indigo		758,628
Molasses		25,749
Dye Woods		8,000,030
Tobacco		20,640
Castor Oil	gals.	120
Mahogany	feet.	6,000
Cigars	probably	300,000

* * * * * *

In 1832, the exports had declined to :

Coffee	lbs.	30,000,000
Cotton	lbs.	1,500.000
Mahogany	feet	6,000,000
Tobacco	lbs.	500,000
Cocoa	lbs.	500,000
Dye-Woods	lbs.	5,000,000
Cigars	lbs.	500,000

In 1843 the exports fell off to about the amount shipped in 1821, except in woods, which have steadily advanced from that period to the present. But taking the example of 1789, before the black revolution, which destroyed the island, and we will perceive what it would be capable of producing, provided it were under the dominion of white rulers, and subject to free white tillage, instead of being consigned to the abuse of a horde of self-emancipated slaves, too ignorant to appreciate its immense natural advantages, and too lazy to provide except for their immediate wants.

At an earlier period, Hayti was a great shipping mart for ginger, wax, hides, tortoise shell, and bullock's horns ; but these articles are now exported in very limited quantities. Hides particularly formed a splendid staple, and brought to the Spanish treasury, annually, a sum averaging $1,000,000. Four millions of dollars worth of the article were yearly sent to the English and American markets, while now that sum has been reduced to as many hundreds. The imports are, rice, flour, mess and cargo beef, fish, timber, cotton goods, Irish and Scotch linens, earthenware, cutlery, ammunition, liquors, satins, wines, gin, toys, haberdashery, jewelry, canvas, &c. &c. Of these imports, the United States furnish to the amount of $600,000.

Such was Hayti in 1789—such is Hayti now. Solouque is fast converting what was once a paradise into a barren desert, if it has not already attained that degree of wretchedness ; and by way of facilitating this destiny, conceives it a matter of skillful policy to engage in a contest with the "execrable Yankee." Should war, therefore, result, the only alternative by which the island could be saved from ruin so palpable, would be to annex it to the United States ; and it would be the only way left us to indemnify for the expenses and concurrent consequences of such a war. The bonds held against the "Empire" can never be met from the "Royal" Treasury, because its income now is less than $2,000,000, while its support of Majesty and the wheels of Government exceed annually $400,000. Either, therefore, the island will revert to France as the largest creditor, or it will revolutionize under the patronage of Great Britain ; for the latter has been casting many longing glances toward its rich cotton plains, now abandoned to idleness, but which are capable of producing as many pounds as the whole of Mississippi, Alabama and Louisiana together. It is morally impossible that the Government can pursue this downward career and maintain itself. Hence it is equally certain, that if Solouque compels us, to send thither an army of men, and a few vessels of war, the island must fall into our possession ; for it is a mistake that we can condescend to characterize his indolence, and then indemnify ourselves for the outlay, in considering the honor of coping arms with him a full and satisfactory equivalent. The last advices from the court of his majesty are ominous.

MORE OF THE GRIFFITH DISASTER.

From the Cleveland Herald of June 20.

We spent most of Wednesday at the scene of the sad disaster. No bodies were obtained, although the search was continued with grappling hooks and a seine. But few of the many bodies recovered were found in over eight feet of water, and it is thought most of the drowned have been taken out. Doubtless a number were burned on the boat, and if so but few traces of the bodies will be discovered. The fire was one of tremendous heat, and apparently burned everything combustible down into the hull. The outside planks and timbers and portions of the wheels alone remain. The water is now just over the boilers, and a diver in search of the safe yesterday brought up the ruins of the clock in the clerk's office, a mass of melted glass, wheels, &c. It told the last moment of time for many on that fatal morn. No bones or portions of bodies were seen. The wreck lies in about ten feet water, a hundred feet or more below where the boat first struck, and with the first rough weather must go to pieces.

The German Committee appointed to take charge of the remains of their countrymen buried in a common grave on the bank overlooking the place of disaster, after much deliberation, decided to purchase the site, enclose it, take up the bodies, make the necessary search for money and valuables, records of identity, &c., place them in board coffins, re-inter, and erect an appropriate monument. For this purpose numbers were employed yesterday in digging a second vault beside the one already filled, and from which the earth had been removed the night previous, and in making the necessary boxes to enclose the dead, numbering nearly one hundred. The final sepulture took place last night. A number of English, some Irish, and a few Americans, occupied the same grave with the Germans, and the surviving friends of some of them were present to take charge of the bodies. Two or three bodies in boxes had not been committed to the earth yesterday, and were awaiting a final disposition by friends.

The Germans were from Baden and its vicinity, and considerably exceeded 100 in number, perhaps as high as 150. The fatality was terrible.

Mr. Studdeford, one of the owners of the Griffith, was landed at the wreck yesterday. He had taken his wife and her sister to Buffalo, left them to return by the Griffith, and took the North Shore line to Detroit on business, expecting to join them at Monroe. Both the ladies were lost, and the bodies had not been recovered yesterday.

The Toledo Blade adds, that Capt. Roby seems to have been peculiarly the sufferer of disasters by fire. In his first business operations he lost two steam mills by fire at Perrysburg—the Indiana, a boat which had been under his command, was destroyed by fire. Last year the Defiance, a schooner owned by him, was nearly destroyed by fire, and lastly the Griffith. The bodies of the captain, his wife, child, mother and grandchild, had arrived at Toledo, in charge of the father of Mrs. Roby and others.

Mr. H. A. Loudry, of Pennsylvania, has invented and patented a new Self-Acting Frog for Railroad Crossings, which seems to be perfection, and which is very warmly praised by the Railroad Officers and leading journals of Pennsylvania and Delaware. By means of it a train of cars will cross the track of another Railroad without a particle of jar, strain on the axle, or danger of fracturing the wheels or wearing away the rails.

TO A BEREAVED PARENT.

BY JAS. RUSSELL LOWELL.

When on my ear your loss was knelled,
And tender sympathy upburst,
A little rill from memory swelled,
Which once had soothed my bitter thirst.

And I was fain to bear to you
Some portion of its mild relief;
That it might be as healing dew
To steal some fever from your grief.

After our child's untroubled breath
Up to the FATHER took its way,
And on our home the shade of death
Like a long twilight haunting lay ;

And friends came round with us to weep
Her little spirit's swift remove,
This story of the Alpine sheep
Was told to us by one we love:

They in the valley's sheltering care,
Soon crop the meadow's tender prime,
And when the sod grows brown and bare
The shepherd strives to make them climb

To airy shelves of pastures green,
That hang along the mountain's side,
Where grass and flowers together lean,
And down through mist the sunbeams slide.

But naught can tempt the timid things
That steep and rugged path to try,
Though sweet the shepherd calls and sings,
And seared below the pastures lie,

Till in his arms their lambs he takes,
Along the dizzy verge to go ;
Then, heedless of the rifts and breaks,
They follow on o'er rock and snow.

And in those pastures lifted fair,
More dewy soft than lowland mead,
The shepherd drops his tender care,
And sheep and lambs together feed.

This parable, by nature breathed,
Blew on me as the south wind free,
O'er frozen brooks that float unsheathed
From icy thraldom to the sea.

A blissful vision, through the night,
Would my happy senses sway
Of the Good Shepherd on the height,
Or climbing up the stony way,

Holding our little lamb asleep ;
And, like the burden of the sea,
Sounded that voice along the deep,
Saying, "Arise and follow me." [Knick'r.

FREE SOIL IN HAWAII.

It appears from the following extract from his speech at the opening of the Legislature on the 10th of April, that Kamehameha III., King of the Sandwich Islands, is taking the lead in giving up to the rightful owners the free use of God's earth :—

"In June 1849, in concurrence with my Chiefs, and with the aid of my Privy Council, I made a division of lands upon the principle of surrendering the greater portion of my royal domain to my chiefs and people, with a reserve of certain lands for the support of the fort and garrison of my capital, and certain other lands as my own private property, in lieu of the share which I, inheriting the right of my predecessors, held in all the lands of the Islands. Under that joint tenure, all lands, howsoever or to whomsoever donated, were revocable at will ; no man's possession, even that of the highest chief, was secure, and no man thought of improving land the possession of which was so uncertain. To remove this great bar to improvement, the division was made ; but as the interests of my poorer subjects appeared to me to require farther protection, with the concurrence of my Chiefs, and the aid of my Privy Council, as aforesaid, on the 21st December, 1849, certain resolutions were passed with the view of giving to the industrious cultivators of the soil a lawful title to the portions they occupied, and to facilitate the acquisition of land in fee simple, by others inclined to be industrious."

Mr. Lokomaiki, Representative from Molokai, followed His Majesty, and said :—

"On one point in His Majesty's speech I will remark with pleasure—that is, in relation to the land. The land has been distributed, and a portion given to all. This is good. It was not so in former days. Then the chiefs only owned the land, and gave and took it at pleasure. Now the King has given to each the land he has cultivated and occupied, to be entirely his. This is a great benefit. It is in accordance with right ; for the great God of Heaven has made the earth for the good of all men, and He wishes every man to dwell on the earth and be happy. This declaration of the King, therefore, in reference to the land, gives me great pleasure."

REGULATIONS OF THE CALIFORNIA MINES.

The Act recently passed by the California Legislature, "for the better regulation of the Mines, and the Government of Foreign Miners," sets forth in fifteen sections the following rules and regulations :—

No person who is not a native or naturalized citizen of the United States, or who may not have become a citizen under the treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo, (all native California Indians excepted,) shall be permitted to mine without first having obtained a license. A Collector of Licenses to foreign miners is to be appointed by the Governor for each of the mining counties. The licenses are to be in the following form :—"Number , (Date.) A. B., a citizen of , age years, complexion , is hereby licensed to work in the mines of California for the period of thirty days." Each license $20; subject to renewal at the same rate per month, until the Governor shall issue his Proclamation announcing the passage of a law by Congress regulating the mines of precious metals in this State. In case of the refusal of any foreigner to take out his license by the second Monday of May next, it is the Collector's duty to furnish the names of the offending parties to the Sheriff or any Deputy Sheriff, whose duty it shall be to summon a posse of American citizens, and, if necessary, forcibly prevent him or them from continuing such mining operations. Should such foreigner or foreigners, after having been stopped by a Sheriff or Deputy Sheriff from mining in one place, seek a new location and continue such mining operations, it shall be deemed a misdemeanor, for which such offender or offenders shall be arrested for a misdemeanor, and imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months, and fined not more than $1,000. Licenses to foreigners are not transferable. The Collector receives $3 for each, as his fee. The XIVth section makes it the duty of the Governor, as soon as he shall have been officially informed of the passage of a law by the United States Congress, assuming the control of the mines of the State, to issue his proclamation, requiring all Collectors of Licenses to foreign miners to stop the issue of licenses. Two thousand copies of this Act have been printed in English, and two thousand in Spanish ; and sent to the mining districts for circulation among the miners.

THE WORLD'S INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION OF 1851.

An English paper says that considerable progress has been made in the preparations for submitting to public competition the design for the vast building that will be required to carry out this undertaking on a scale commensurate with the dignity of the nation. We have reason to believe that the following information on the subject will be found to be substantially correct :—

The building will be about 2,300 feet long, rather more than 400 feet across, and the roofed area will probably extend to about 900,000 square feet, or upwards of 20 acres.

In the center of the south front, opposite Prince's Gate, will be placed the principal entrance and offices. There will be three other great entrances in the center of the other side of the building. Gangways, 48 feet wide, clear and uninterrupted, excepting by seats, will connect the entrances, and at the intersection of these main lines it is proposed to form a grand circular hall for sculpture, 200 feet in diameter. Considerable spaces surrounding the old trees (which must be carefully preserved,) will be fitted up with refreshment rooms, surrounding ornamental gardens with fountains, &c.

The vast area, destined to be filled with the products of all climes, will be covered with a remarkably simple iron roofing, of 48 feet span, running from end to end of the building, supported by hollow iron columns, resting on brick piers, and covered very probably with boarding and slate.

The extent of the roof covering the main avenue will be 96 feet. The lowest line of the main roofing will be 24 feet high, and the clear height of the central gangway will be about 50 feet. The floor will, for by far the greater portion of the area, be formed of boarding laid on joists and sleeper walls. The external enclosures will in all cases be constructed of brick. The light will be principally derived from skylights.

The central hall will be a polygon of 16 sides, four of which will open into gardens around it. Its main walls will be of brick, and about 60 feet high. The covering of this splendid apartment will be of iron, and probably conical.

CURIOUS DISCOVERY OF NINEVITE REMAINS.

A London correspondent writes to the Belfast News Letter, in reference to the recent discoveries, by Captain Layard, as follows :—"I suppose you have seen the account of Layard's recent discovery at Nimroud. A ship has been sent out to bring home the precious relics, and antiquarians are all on the qui vive with the expectation of beholding the actual throne whereon the kings of Nineveh have sat. There is a curious story relating to a portion of the Nineveh remains. You may perhaps remember, that Mr. Layard deplored very much the loss of two of his most valuable vases. Well! the clergyman of Gealmpton, a village in Devonshire, was reading this account, with a description of the missing treasures, in the newspaper, when, all at once, it occurred to him that he knew something about them. Ringing the bell, he bid his servant bring down 'those jars from the loft.' He compared them with the newspaper, and they tallied in every particular. The old gentleman was perfectly astonished, as well he might be, for, curious as it seemed, he could not doubt that they were the actual vases. The mystery was soon solved. They had been presented to him, a short time previously, by the captain of a vessel, lately arrived from the Mediterranean, to whom they had been sold by an Arab. Not seeing any particular beauty in them, and ignorant of their antiquarian value, the reverend gentleman consigned them to the lumder room, where they lay in ignominious dust and darkness till this accident, as fortunate as it was strange, rescued them from, probably, eternal oblivion. They were immediately forwarded to Mr. Layard, and are now in the British Museum."

LITERARY CURIOSITY.—The Deutsche Reform publishes, as a literary curiosity, a selection from the small cheap journals which sprang into existence after the revolution at Berlin and Vienna, not more than three or four of which now exist. The names of some are curious. The Hornet, Wasp, Gadfly, Torch, Taper, Jet of Gas, Ever-burning Lamp, Lantern, Snuffers, Shrieker, Berlin Widemouth, Dat's Music, Street Journal, Tower of Fools, Barricade Journal, Traveling Devil, and Devil Revolutionary. These, together with an almost infinite number of untranslatable names, constituted the intellectual food with which the minds of the people were for months supplied.

LAND ENTRIES IN MINNESOTA.—The St. Paul Chronicle and Register of the 3d ult. says :—More land has probably been entered at our Land Office the past week than during the whole season previous. Among numerous others who are now looking at our country, is a delegation from a colony of 2,000 Norwegians, who are awaiting below the action of those sent here in advance. They are pleased with what they have seen, and will probably induce their people to settle in Minnesota eventully. The Norwegians are an industrious, frugal and moral people—just the kind of emigrants we desire.

IMMENSE COAL FIELDS.—The Somerset Post contains the following notice of the immense coal beds of Perry County, Ohio :—"Near Straitville, in Salt Lick Township, in this county, there is a bed of coal which is probably the largest in the world, which has been computed by competent judges to be about 128 feet in thickness. We have visited it several times, and we know from observation that it exceeds even the most extravagant idea we could have formed of a coal bank, without traveling out of all reason. The coal strata exhibits a bold front of about 27 feet from the abrupt portion of the hill."

FOWL-BREEDING BUSINESS.—One young farmer gentleman in our vicinity has gone into the fowl business in good earnest, and reduced it to a perfect system. Eggs are taken in to hatch for so much a head ; the name of the owner of the eggs, and the date of their being laid, written upon the outside. Hens are let to those who have eggs of a choice kind, but who have no hens to hatch them. Three and even four dollars per dozen is by no means an uncommon price for eggs of a coice kind.

THE STAWBERRY SEASON.—Although two weeks later than usual, says the N. Y. Tribune, the Strawberry Crop this year is more abundant than we have ever known it. The quantities of this fragrant and delicious fruit which are daily poured into our city, would surprise a stranger not acquainted with the taste of its inhabitants. No less than 70,000 baskets, as we have been informed, were received in one morning by the Erie and New Jersey Railroads, in addition to those from other quarters. Washington Market is a great storehouse of strawberries. Its thronged avenues, of a morning, are bounded by huge scarlet heaps and pyramids of the melting, aromatic fruit. There are strawberries in baskets, in boxes, in basins, in buckets, and in tubs—wild strawberries from the hills, with a piquant acid in their juice—ripe garden strawberries, bursting with their fat, full sweetness—incomparable Hoveys and plump Pineapples—in short, all shades, sizes, and flavors of the first and tenderest fruit of the year, the only eatable embodiment of the perfume and daintiness of Spring. Washington Market, these days, might answer for a grotto of the fairies, the Court of Pomona, or the banquet-hall of Epicurus. The aroma of the place is so keen and palpable that it almost satisfies the tongue, and stops the involuntary moisture at the root. However, no one need now be reduced to the substitute of eating strawberries with his nose. They are so cheap and abundant, that the man must be beyond help who cannot afford a basket.

THE SHOE BUSINESS IN FARMINGTON, N. H.—Farmington is the banner town in New Hampshire for manufacturing shoes. For the year ending first of April last, it was estimated that the whole number manufactured in this town exceeded 425,000! valued at $300,000. The amount paid for labor, boxes, freight and trucking was near $90,000. The boxes alone cost $3,300, and required 210,000 feet of boards to make them. There are now six large manufacturers, beside some smaller ones ; all together are capable of turning out 600,000 per annum, should the wants of the trade require, and the prospect warrant it. The shoe trade now is rather dull ; but a fair business may be reasonably expected before the last of July, especially now that Cotton, Flour and Pork, three great staples, have advanced, any one of which usually exerts a favorable influence on the shoe business.

DEATH FROM SUPERSTITION.—David Boston, a colored man, died near Ilchester, Md., on the 1st ult., from the effects of superstition. He had contracted a severe cold, and suffered much from an accumulation of phlegm on the chest. The choking sensation and hoarse breathing consequent on this, induced him to believe that he had a frog in him, and that he had been "tricked." His wife went to Baltimore and consulted a "fortune-teller," who confirmed her suspicions, and added, that the first person who should come to her house, after her return home, was the trickster. This was sufficient. The poor man took little or no nourishment ; no one was allowed to visit him ; and after his death some fifty cotton balls were found placed about him for the purpose of breaking the "spell."

MARVELLOUS STORY OF A PICTURE.—An original portrait of Charles I., which was supposed to have been lost in the time of the Commonwealth, when, to prevent discovery of the portrait, they reduced it in size by cutting it, has been found at Barnstable. It was painted by Vandyke in the year 1640, when the King was 40 years of age, one year before the painter died. After tossing about for many years among rubbish, a Mr. Taylor bought it for two shillings, from a furniture dealer who had scrubbed it with a scrubbing brush and hung it up in his ware rooms to dry. Within a week Mr. T. was offered £20 for it, and has since been offered £2,000, but it is considered worth £20,000, being one of the most valuable paintings known.

BABY TALK.—Judge——, of Wisconsin, though an incorrigible old bachelor, is a great admirer of the ladies, and few men are more polite or attentive to them, but "baby talk" is his abhorrence. It is said of him, that traveling one day in his wagon, he overtook a woman and baby. "Madame," said he, "that child must be a burden to you. If you will promise not to talk nonsense to it, you may ride in my wagon." This the lady readily promised ; but soon forgetting the scruples of her companion, she commenced with, "Bess its little heart ! So it should go ridy pidy in de coachee poachee!" "What!" thundered the exasperated Judge, "get out of my wagon."

DYING OF JOY.—A New York letter in the Philadelphia Inquirer says :—"A death from sudden and unexpected joy occurred here yesterday. A poor German emigrant, who left the home of his fathers, and all the associations of a long life, to seek the New World, with the view of bettering his fortune, actually was unable to bear the shock of seeing a well-beloved brother. The moment his eye fell on his countenance, his frame was convulsed—he swooned with joy—sunk and died. The fond and devoted heart had ceased to beat, and its possessor had at last found quietude in that place where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary are at rest."

INSTINCT OF THE BEE.—That the bee selects its flowers more by keenness of sight, than nicety of smell, we have recently had most convincing evidence. A honey bee entered the open casement of a chamber, the walls of which were covered with paper, on which were representations of bouquets of flowers, blue and red, alternately. The bee alighted several times on the paper, always on the red flowers—evidently expecting to procure honey therefrom, passing the blue flowers and other parts of the room without alighting.

USE OF LIME IN THE CULTURE OF THE APPLE.—Lime is found to enter more largely into the structure of the apple tree than of any other tree known. The analysis of Dr. Emmons has given us 51 per cent. of lime in the ash of its bark ; hence we learn that lime should make a prominent ingredient in all our composts for the apple orchard. Where, from exhaustion, lime has become deficient, and the orchard seems to be on the decline, the work of re-invigorating may be speedily accomplished by a liberal use of it.

Littell's Living Age.

PROSPECTUS.—This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope, and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery ; and the contribution to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia, and Africa into our neighborhood ; and will greatly multiply our connections, as merchants, travelers, and politicians, with all parts of the world ; so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening, through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selections ; and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive to their wives and children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation ; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste.

TERMS.—The Living Age is published every Saturday; price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

☞ To insure regularity in mailing the work, orders should be addressed to the office of publication.

CLUBS, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:

Four copies for - - - - - -	$20 00
Nine " " - - - - - -	40 00
Twelve " " - - - - - -	50 00

Complete sets, in 24 volumes, to the end of March, 1850, handsomely bound, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principal cities free of expense of freight, are for sale at forty-eight dollars.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents ; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Judge Story—Chancellor Kent—President Adams.

I have read the prospectus of "The Living Age" with great pleasure, and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more ; it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character. JOSEPH STORY.

CAMBRIDGE, April 24, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of your work, and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit, and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day. JAMES KENT.

NEW YORK, May 7, 1844.

Of all the periodical journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

DUTY OF THE CHURCH TO AID IN EDUCATING CANDIDATES FOR THE MINISTRY.

Report of a Committe of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, adopted at the recent meeting of that body, and published by its request. [Concluded.

We may now consider the question as to who should become subjects of the church's beneficence, and to what extent. We believe the church should, in all cases, select its own objects of beneficence, and choose its own candidates for the ministry.

The question of a call to the ministry, has elicited some controversy in the world; but we design not to enter that field in this Report—simply expressing an opinion, that the duty to preach is not to be indicated by any special revelation from Heaven, or by any means differing materially from indications concerning all duty. We understand the command to love God with all the heart, and our neighbors as ourselves, to be a call to every man. Having this, we are then to look about us to ascertain how we can best serve him. Whatever duty the Bible and an enlightened conscience demands in the form of a specific act, we have a call to perform. We have a call to apply, in every act, all the principles of the divine law that may apply. If, in our best judgments the principles of the divine law will be carried out in the performance of any act, we are called to do that act, although it is no where specified in the Bible. Thus we understand a call to duty, and cannot consider a call to preach an exception to this universal rule of action.

The first inquiry, then, is, Does the love of God dwell in the heart? and, secondly, How can each individual best serve him? It is not to be denied, that different individuals possess different traits of character, which naturally adapt them to different pursuits. We will not affirm, that the requisite traits of character may not be developed in every individual; but economy is always a duty, wherefore every person should have reference to his natural adaptedness in choosing his profession. We could not perceive the adaptedness of a dumb person's choosing the avocation of the ministry, nor a blind man that of pilot. We simply mean, that those who combine all the elements necessary for the greatest success in any calling, should pursue that calling. In determining who are suitable candidates for the ministry, the church should act unitedly. If any one deems himself qualified, he should not confide in his own opinion alone, but the united opinion of the church should be obtained; and if such opinion be adverse to him, he has good ground to suspect his own opinion, and review it. We deem the church to be somewhat in error on this point. If we mistake not, much inefficiency is attached to the ministry by a want of care on the part of the church in looking up gifts among themselves. There is not enough forethought on this subject. Many churches to-day have an aged minister, whose voice will soon be hushed in death; but have they any one in readiness to receive his mantle when it shall fall? Many pulpits thus become vacant, and the church wanders far away, as sheep without a shepherd. She tries to procure one from abroad, but all are engaged, as they should be, elsewhere. We may ask what right a church has to send to some other church and draw from it support? If every church were to do so, whence would come new shepherds? Every church is bound to furnish its quota of watchmen, and if one can furnish a surplus for emergencies, let it do so; but these emergencies need not so frequently occur. It often happens, at the very time when a church is deprived of its pastor, and strives in vain to fill the vacancy, that more than one in the church, if they had been suitably cared for and encouraged, might have been ready to step in and fill the breach. But the church had not sown in the spring. The duty seems to be a plain one, for the church to seek out and encourage talent, and, if possible, at all times to have one or more preparing for the ministry. A little encouragement might draw out talent of the first order, which otherwise might lie dormant forever, and the church suffer for want of it. It is no easy task for a young man to force himself upon his older brethren as a candidate for the ministry; and too many have met a cold rebuke for doing so, from those who should have welcomed them. We now wish to urge the duty of calling out the talent of the church. Let it not lie buried in dust; the gold is worth the digging. The traits of character should be well analyzed by the members of the church, and if young men of promise are found, (as they are in almost every church,) drive them not into other occupations by indifference, but point them to the watch-towers of Zion, and lead them to usefulness. Assure them that the church will sympathize with them, pray for them, and assist them in all suitable ways, to become valiant for the Lord. Thus might an army of faithful soldiers be enlisted and trained for fight in the great warfare against sin. They are needed, and if not thus engaged the places which they ought to occupy must of necessity be occupied by others, such as can be found when the necessity comes. Undoubtedly some are received on the ground of necessity, who otherwise would be advised to seek better qualifications. We have thus indicated to a certain extent whom the church should assist, and to a certain extent how much it should assist them. It should look them up, help decide upon their adaptedness, encourage them by kind words, and pray for them. But we cannot believe that this is the whole duty of the church. He must, at a suitable time, commence his course of study, which, by the way, might be much abridged if the church would seek him out early, and have his early training conducted with reference to his future calling. In this way, at twenty, half of the ten-years course might be accomplished, and thus, at twenty-five, the laborer might be ready for the work.

The amount of pecuniary aid cannot be specified with exactness. Your Committee would not recommend that the candidate should be lifted through without personal exertions, for we well know, that in meeting the difficulties that impede his way, he is cultivating some of the most sterling traits of character. Strength to stand on the hill of science is only attained by the development of mind secured in ascending its rugged sides. We consider, that any individual who is carried entirely through his course of studies by private or public patronage, must lack a fair development of the traits of character which most of all promise success in any avocation of life. Hence the total failures so often made by those graduated from college by gratuitous bestowals and parental patronage. They have never met the stern discipline of necessity; they have never learned to meet want, and overcome it by their own exertions. Their only discipline, in this line, has been writing dunning letters to father for money, and they prove remarkably expert at this all through life. They go forth and commence labor in some department of action. Suppose they enter the ministry; soon they see a dark cloud arising, betokening danger, but they know not how to assail it; they look around for hands that have sustained them, but they are gone; they flee away before the storm, and are never heard of more. Thus pass away a large portion of our college graduates. These considerations induce us not to recommend bestowals sufficient to obviate the necessity of personal exertion on the part of the candidate. But, on the other hand, we deem it equally dangerous to withhold all aid from those nobly struggling to prepare for usefulness. If they have been well selected, they are not toiling for themselves, but that they may gain strength to help bear the burdens of the church. Shall the church, then, be indifferent to their toils? Their labors are of no ordinary magnitude; the most perfect constitution would sink under them when it would endure the hardships of any other avocation. Their privations are numerous; they are away among strangers—yes, and among those who despise their sentiments, slander their brethren, and deride their cause; they cannot enjoy the full advantages of the college, while their classmates, no more worthy than they, arrive sooner at the crowning honors of the institution. Thus situated, who that has not felt it can tell the joy that lightens the heart, by a kind remembrance from home—yes, from his brethren? His last coat is in rags; his bills must be paid; he had just enough left of his own hard earnings to pay them; but whence should come his new coat? He opens the bundle from home—it is there! His brethren, in their abundance, have remembered him. Oh, think you, brethren, those tears of gratitude, those resolves to labor in turn for brethren so kind, so thoughtful of him, are not a fair interest on the cost of that new coat? Brethren little think how much they may treasure up to themselves and the cause of God by such acts as these. Were the gift never appropriated to use, and were there no need of it on the part of the receiver, yet such a demonstration of interest and kindness would not be lost, but would come back with a heart devoted to the good of the donors. But when such a gift is needed, by a poor, pious, struggling student, eternity alone can reveal the good it may do. We have to recommend, then, that while churches shall not contribute to the entire support of their selected candidates for the ministry, they shall not forget them, but bestow enough that, by the labors of the individual during vacations, and such resting spells from study as may be conducive to health, he may continue his course uninterrupted. Thus would our denomination be gathering strength to take her stand on the broad platform of truth, and go on to success.

Your Committee close by expressing their deep regret that our denomination possesses no more facilities for the education of its own members, unimpeded by the disheartening obstacles now before us. We know that there is much to discourage the young; but we rejoice in the prospect before us, and confidently believe that the time is not far distant when we can afford to our youth facilities equal to those which others afford to their own young. A College and Theological Seminary is demanded, and it may cheer the hearts of Christians to reflect upon the favor which the proposition to take the initiatory steps towards erecting one has met with from the denomination. The action of the General Conference on that subject is worthy of all commendation, and the little opposition which the proposition have elicited since the action of the Conference, speaks well for the cause of education among us. In conclusion your Committee present for your consideration the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That this Association recommends to churches composing it, and churches generally, to seek for young men of their number who give promise of usefulness in the cause of God, and encourage such a number to enter the ministry as their means may warrant, by assisting them, as indicated in this report, during the course of study recommended to them at the last session of this Association.

2. Resolved, That this Association heartily approves of the resolution of the last General Conference in relation to the founding of a Theological Seminary, and recognizes the obligation to aid in such an enterprise, as among the most efficient means of advancing the educational interests of our denomination.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

D. E. Maxson,
J. M. Allen, } Committee.

The following resolution was, by the association, substituted for the second attached to the foregoing report:—

Resolved, That we entertain with unfeigned pleasure the hope, that the present movement in relation to our educational interests will secure to us a College, where our youth may enjoy facilities of the highest order, under the patronage of our own denomination, and a Theological Seminary, to which our ministers and candidates for the ministry may resort, with assurances of such opportunities as will fit them for their sacred work.

SUNDAY-MAILISM.

In Wilmer and Smith's European Times of the 15th inst., just received by the Niagara, I find the following editorial "leader" on the Sunday Mail Question, now being pretty warmly agitated in England; which I forward for the benefit of the readers of the Recorder.

Sunday-Mailism is a periodical distemper, of a spasmodic nature, and is characterized by all the fitful vagaries of the most erratic epidemics. Like other great epidemics, the Cholera, the Dengue and the Grippe, it prevails for a short period, after long intervals, sweeping, its progress, over a whole continent with a rush, and leaving nothing behind but the sad evidences of its fanatical virulence; for, when it has expended its jesuitical magazine of legerdemain against the Gibralter rock of the common sense of the community, it retires to the halls of the Sanhedrim, or to the secret cells of the Vatican, until it regains effrontery enough to presume once more on the forbearance of the populace; then it stalks abroad again, to dance its cloven revel on the addled heads of blind devotees. But hear one of the leading English prints on this deeply interesting subject. The symptoms of the disorder, as displayed in that region, are truly rabid; still, a Tecumseh dose (Col. Johnson's Bolus—the Sunday Mail Report in our Congress,) may kill it out-right, in no time, in Great Britain, as it did in this country some twenty years since. W. M. F.

June 28, 1850.

From Wilmer & Smith's European Times.

"I was well; I would be better; and here I am," is the epitaph on the man who quacked himself to death. The advocates of Sunday labor suspension remind us forcibly of that unfortunate victim of a delusion. Not content with the diminished labor which a better system enabled the Government to introduce into the Post-Office, by which a large number of persons employed in that branch of the public service were set at liberty on the Sabbath, the saints have pushed their triumph still further, and the Government, yielding to the pressure, have induced her Majesty to declare, that the collection and delivery of letters shall be entirely suspended on Sundays throughout the realm. Nay, more, an inquiry is to be instituted as to whether the transmission of the mails may not be altogether given up on the Sabbath. Mr. Thornley, startled at this announcement, asked Lord John Russell whether there would be any exemption in favor of foreign correspondence. "Suppose," said the honorable member for Wolverhampton, "that a packet arrived at Liverpool on the Sunday with 10,000 or 20,000 letters; under the present system, these letters were assorted, sent up by the mail the same night, and delivered to the merchants of London the following morning, containing many hundreds of thousands of pounds in bills of exchange, stocks to a large amount, and other letters of the greatest importance. The same would occur at Falmouth and other places. Would there be any exemption in favor of these letters?" To the question thus neatly and tersely put, the answer was the expressive monosyllable, "No!"

We are far from desiring to see the clerks in the Post-Office deprived of any advantages which other classes in the community enjoy; and if a total cessation from labor in that branch of the public service were attainable on the Christian Sabbath, without injury to the community, no persons would more heartily rejoice at it than ourselves. But as the tide ebbs and flows on the Sunday with the same undeviating regularity as on the ordinary days of the week, as the winds of Heaven cannot be hushed, however much the Sabbatarians may be shocked at the desecration, on the first day of the week, the exemption from a small portion of labor on that day by the Post-office officials, cannot be secured without great and serious detriment to that complicated piece of animal machinery which is called society. We cannot disguise from ourselves the fact, that beneath this assumed regard for the sanctity of the Sabbath, there lurks an immense amount of cant, and, shall we say it—humbug. If the great dignitaries who are foremost in the movement were to set an example in their own proper persons of the privations which they are willing to undergo, in order to make Sunday literally a day of rest, we should entertain a much higher opinion of their conscientious scruples. If a bishop, for instance, were to dispense with his coachman and his groom, a pious peer with his cook and his valet—if the one were to clean his own boots (as Punch suggests,) and the other prepare his own dinner, in order that their respective domestics might do no "servile labor" on the Sabbath, but attend exclusively to their spiritual welfare, we could understand the sincerity which prompts the movement, and more—admire it. But we have little faith in that professing Christianity which sacrifices no comfort, foregoes no delicacy in great establishments, but compels on the part of others observances that may materially interfere with that struggle for existence in which the great mass of the world are engaged.

We must not be understood as counseling the breaking of the Sabbath. Physically, a day of rest, exemption from toil and care, is a boon and a luxury of inestimable value; while the higher religious duties which a becoming reverence for the Sabbath demands, elevate the human being above mere animal life. It is the enforced observance of the Sabbath which is galling, converting a divine ordinance into a day of humiliation and gloom, and imposing additional shackles on the working of that postal machinery which, like the pulsation of the animal system, cannot, in a great commercial country, be entirely suspended without fatal consequences.

If the parties who figure most conspicuously in this movement were to evince a little sympathy for the temporal concerns of the clerks in the Post-office, they would then be engaged in a really good work. No class of officers under the Crown are so wretchedly remunerated, or harder worked. The pay, considering their duties and their responsibilities, in the majority of cases, is little in advance of a porter's. With the feelings of gentlemen, they barely receive the emolument of flunkeys; and if Lord Ashley, instead of looking out for show cripples amongst factory operatives, were to direct his attention to this department of the State, he would find abundant room for the exercise of that philanthropy for which he claims credit. As regards Liverpool, a wide field for a more just and liberal scale of remuneration exists. The hint will not, we hope, be lost upon this weak but well-meaning nobleman.

TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION.

A young man recently made his escape from the galleys at Toulouse. He was strong and vigorous, and soon made his way across the country and escaped pursuit. He arrived next morning before a cottage in an open field, and stopped to beg something to eat, and concealment while he reposed a little. But he found the inmates of the cottage in the greatest distress. Four little children sat trembling in a corner, their mother was weeping and tearing her hair, and the father walking the floor in agony. The galley slave asked what was the matter, and the father replied, that they were that morning to be turned out of doors because they could not pay their rent. "You see me driven into despair," said the father, "my wife and little children without food or shelter, and I without the means to provide any for them." The convict listened to this tale with tears of sympathy, and then said:

"I will give you the means. I have just escaped from the galleys; whoever secures and takes back an escaped prisoner is entitled to a reward of fifty francs. How much does your rent amount to?"

"Forty francs," answered the father.

"Well," said the other, "put a cord around my body. I will follow you to the city; they will recognize me, and you will get fifty francs for bringing me back."

"No, never!" exclaimed the astonished listener; "my children should starve a dozen times before I would do so base a thing."

The generous young man insisted, and declared at last that he would go and give himself up, if the father would not take him. After a long struggle the latter yielded, and taking his preserver by the arm, led him to the city and to the mayor's office. Everybody was surprised that a little man like the father had been able to capture such a strong young fellow, but the proof was before them. The fifty francs were paid, and the prisoner sent back to the galleys. But after he was gone, the father asked a private interview with the mayor, to whom he told the whole story. The mayor was so much affected that he not only added fifty francs more to the father's purse, but wrote immediately to the Minister of Justice, begging the noble young prisoner's release. The Minister examined into the affair, and finding that it was comparatively a small offense which had condemned the young man to the galleys, and that he had already served out half his time, he ordered his release. Is not the whole incident beautiful? [Cor. St. Louis Rep.

FRENCH MINISTERS' WIVES.

These French Protestant pastors live in the simplest manner, however distinguished their talents make them, and their wives in general are imbued with the same spirit of mildness, humility and charity as themselves. I know one who, though a woman of singular merit, superior manners, refinement of feeling, and remarkable accomplishments, performs all the duties of her household, without the assistance of a servant; yet her establishment is not without elegance, and she receives her guests with all the grace and hospitality of a gentlewoman well attended. She gives lessons in various languages, which she speaks like a native, in order that she may not be obliged to have recourse to her husband's purse, generally devoted to charity, in case of sickness of any part of her family; and opportunities have not been wanting to prove the prudence of her foresight, for, not long since her husband was attacked by a malady which required such medical aid as could not be procured in the country, when she, to his surprise, was able to provide the necessary funds for his journey and sojourn in Paris. The end she had in view was entirely answered, and her amiable feeling rewarded by the recovery of one most dear to her. The cheerful ease and happy content with which she goes through fatigue, and endures privation, without a thought of self, speak volumes of the inward peace she must enjoy; and, indeed, the ordinary habits and unostentatious way of living of every Protestant minister I have met with, are quite as edifying as those of the estimable pastor of Tours. A PRAYER FOR GUIDANCE.

Father! the skies are dark above me,
  Before me lies a trackless waste—
Long thus hast thou seen good to prove me;
  O God! to my deliverance haste!

I do not ask that thou shouldst lighten
  The clouds impending o'er my way;
I only ask that thou wouldst brighten
  Their darkness with one guiding ray.

I pray thee not to make less weary
  The waste through which my pathway lies;
I would but see that path, though dreary,
  And feel 'tis leading to the skies.

Guide me, my Father! If before me
  The Angel of thy Presence go,
I will not shrink, though clouds are o'er me,
  And round me gathered many a foe.

I do not falter at the distance
  Between me and my heavenly home;
Weary as seems this earth existence,
  I know 'tis bounded by the tomb.

Nor do I dread the ills that gather
  Thick from the cradle to the grave;
Nor from earth's cares and griefs, my Father,
  Do I implore thy power to save.

Only from this—the darkness brooding
  O'er every path of life I tread,
And from the gloomy fear intruding,
  That thou my spirit ne'er hast led.

I seek thy aid—I ask direction—
  Teach me to do what pleaseth thee;
I can bear toil, endure affliction,
  Only thy leadings let me see.

Saviour! thou knowest that earth is dreary,
  For thou hast trod its thorny maze;
Guide me through all its wanderings weary;
  Keep me for ever in thy ways.

O God, my God! make no delaying;
  Haste thee to help me when I cry;
O let me hear thy spirit saying,
  "This is the way," the guide is nigh!

Guidance and strength! For these imploring,
  Jesus! my prayer ascends to thee;
Lead me through life, that I adoring
  May praise thee in eternity. [Episcopal Rec.

PATRICK HENRY vs. INTOLERANCE.

Soon after Henry's noted case of "Tobacco and the Preserves," as it was called, he heard of a case of oppression for conscience' sake. The English Church having been established by law in Virginia, became, as all such establishments are wont to do, exceedingly intolerant toward other sects. In prosecution of this system of conversion, three Baptist clergymen had been indicted at Fredericksburg for preaching the gospel of the Son of God contrary to the statute. Henry, hearing of this, rode some fifty miles to volunteer his services in defense of the oppressed. He entered the Court, being unknown to all present, save the bench and the bar, while the indictment was being read by the clerk. He sat within the bar until the reading was finished, and the King's attorney had concluded some remarks in support of the prosecution, when he arose, reached out his hand for the paper, and without more ceremony proceeded with the following speech:—

"May it please your worships, I think I heard read by the prosecutor, as I entered this house, the paper I now hold in my hand. If I have rightly understood, the King's attorney of the colony has framed an indictment for the purpose of arraigning and punishing by imprisonment, three inoffensive persons before the bar of this Court for a crime of great magnitude—as disturbers of the peace. May it please the Court, what did I hear read? Did I hear it distinctly, or was it a mistake of my own? Did I hear an expression, as of a crime, that these men, whom your worships are about to try for misdemeanor, are charged with—what?" and, continuing in a low, solemn, heavy tone, "preaching the gospel of the Son of God?" —Pausing, amid the most profound silence and breathless astonishment, he slowly waved the paper three times round his head, when, lifting his hands and eyes to heaven, with peculiar and impressive energy he exclaimed, "Great God!" The exclamation—the burst of feeling from the audience—were all overpowering. Mr. H. resumed:

"May it please your worships, in a day like this, when truth is about to be aroused to claim its natural and inalienable rights; when the yoke of oppression, that has reached the wilderness of America, and the unnatural alliance of ecclesiastical and civil power, are about to be dissevered—at such a period, when liberty—liberty of conscience—is about to awake from her slumberings, and inquire into the reason of such charges as I find exhibited here to-day in this indictment"—Another fearful pause, while the speaker alternately cast his sharp, piercing eyes on the Court and the prisoners, and resumed—"if I am not deceived, according to the contents of the paper I now hold in my hand, these men are accused of preaching the gospel of the Son of God! Great God!" Another long pause, while he again waved the indictment around his head—while a deeper impression was made on the auditory. Resuming his speech:

"May it please your worships, there are periods in the history of man, when corruption and depravity have so long debased the human character, that man sinks under the weight of the oppressor's hand, becomes his servile, abject slave; he licks the hand that smites him; he bows in passive obedience to the mandates of the despot; and in this state of servility he receives his fetters of perpetual bondage. But, may it please your worships, such a day has passed away! From that period when our fathers left the land of their nativity for settlement in these American wilds—for liberty—for liberty of conscience to worship their Creator according to their own conceptions of Heaven's revealed will—from the moment they placed their feet upon the American continent, and, in the deeply imbedded forest, sought an asylum from persecution and tyranny—trom that moment, despotism was crushed—the fetters of darkness were broken, and Heaven decreed that man should be free—free to worship God according to the Bible.

"Were it not for this, in vain were all the sufferings and bloodshed to subjugate this new world, if we, their offspring, must still be oppressed and persecuted. But may it please your worships, permit me to inquire once more, for what are these men about to be tried? This paper says for preaching the gospel of the Savior to Adam's fallen race." And in tones of thunder, he exclaimed, "What law have they violated?" While the third time, in a low, dignified manner, he lifted his eyes to heaven and waved the indictment around his head. The Court and audience were now wrought up to the most intense pitch of excitement. The face of the prosecuting attorney was pallid and ghastly, and he appeared unconscious that his whole frame was agitated with alarm; while the judge, in a tremulous voice, put an end to the scene, now becoming excessively painful, by the authoritative declaration, "Sheriff, discharge those men."

TEACHERS FOR THE WEST.

The Board of National Popular Education have issued a circular on the subject of sending Female Teachers to the West. The circular says:—

One hundred and seventy-five teachers have been sent out, in seven classes—commencing in June, 1847. They have been sent to Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennesee and Texas. More than six thousand children and youth are under their instruction. They are all teachers in, and very many of them superintendents of Sabbath Schools. They have done and are doing great good, occupying positions in the circle of beneficent influences at the West that can be filled so well by no other agency.

It is proposed to send out another class on the 3d of October next, and to gather them at Hartford for the preparatory course on the 23d of August; and the undersigned now invites applications from ladies to form that class. The applications should be made by letters addressed by the ladies themselves to Miss Nancy Swift at Northampton, Mass., who has prepared the last four classes, and who will take charge of the next.

Each teacher will know her destination before leaving Hartford, and her wishes will, as far as practicable, be consulted in regard to it. We desire, however, that the teachers should go there with some confidence in the wisdom of those who are to decide upon their locations; but, above all, in such a spirit of consecration to the work of doing good, that they shall be willing to go anywhere and do anything to accomplish, to the greatest possible extent, that true and proper end of human life. They are expected to continue teaching at least two years, unless prevented by ill health. The refunding to the Board the amount expended for them, will invariably be expected, should they, within that time, and without that cause, discontinue teaching.

We have sent teachers of all the "Evangelical" denominations from which applications have been received. Applications from them all are desired. The union feature of our movement is deemed very important. We want teachers in whom the Christian shall decidedly predominate over the Sectarian spirit. We aim not to build up any particular denomination through this educational agency. We leave that to other agencies.

THE WHALE'S STRENGTH.

The most dreadful display of the whale's strength and prowess yet authentically recorped, was thatmade upon the American whale ship Essex, Captain Pollard, which sailed from Nantucket for the Pacific Ocean in August, 1849. Late in the fall of the same year, when in latitude forty of the South Pacific, a school of sperm whales were discovered, and three boats were manned and sent in pursuit. The mate's boat was struck by one of them, and he was obliged to return to the ship in order to repair the damage.

While he was engaged in that work, a sperm whale judged to be eighty-three feet long, broke water about twenty rods from the ship, on her waather bow. He was going at the rate of about three knots an hour, and the ship at nearly the same rate, when he struck the bows of the vessel just formard hf her chains.

At tne shock produced by the collision of two such mighty masses of matter in motion, the ship shook like a leaf. The seemingly malicious whale dived and passed under the ship, grazing her keel, and then appeared at about the distance of a ship's length, lashing the sea with fins ane tail, as if suffering the most horrible agony. He was evidently hurt by the eollisisn, and blindly frantic with instinctige rage.

In a few minutes he seemed to recover himself, and started with great speed directly across the vessel's course to the windward. Meantime the hands on borrd discovered the ship to be gradually settling down at the bows, and the pumps were to be rigged. While the crew were working at them, one of the men cried out, "God, have mercy! he comes again."

The whale had turned at about forty rods from the ship, and was making for her with double his former speed, his pathway white with foam. Rushing head en, he struck her again at the bow, and the tremendous blow stove her in. The whale dived under again, and disappeared, and the ship foundered in five minutes from the first collision. But five souls out of the twenty were saved.

A missionary, writing from India, says:—"Here we have no books but nature's own. We have folio mountains, quarto valleys, pamphlets in flowers, and tracts in flowing streams, and one sad volume bound in black—poor human nature; here we read in every page, in every line, that this nature is depraved."

"Medicine," said Bonaparte at St. Helena, "is a collection of certain prescriptions, the results of which, taken collectively, are more fatal than useful to mankind. Water, air, and cleanliness, are the chief articles in my pharmacopœia."

DUTY OF MEN OF PROPERTY TO THEIR CHILDREN.

The duty of providing for one's family, is not to be called in question. Yet the text of Scripture which directly enjoins it, (1 Tim. 5 : 8,) is so often made a pretext, by covetous men, for withholding their hands from works of benevolence, that we feel disposed to inquire how far one ought to go in this matter. We shall not advocate the doctrine, that parents ought to lay up nothing for their children; yet it is worthy of consideration, whether a young man, in good health, just setting out in life, is not quite as able to work his way through the world, as his father was before him. His father commenced life, probably, with not a dollar in his pocket. Trained to habits of industry and economy, however, he was able to procure a comfortable subsistence, and even to amass considerable property. Why cannot the son do the same? If the father has not trained the son to such habits as are necessary to insure his success in the world, he has failed to do his duty. But upon the supposition that he has done his duty in this respect, it would be far better that the son should be thrown upon his own energies, than that, by being invested with wealth, he should be under a constant temptation to lead an idle life. In nine cases out of ten—perhaps we might say in ninety-nine out of a hundred—the sons of wealthy men come into possession of their fathers' estates, only to spend them in pleasure-seeking or riotous living. We say to parents, Train your children in such a way, that if they should be thrown upon the world penniless, they will still be able to make their living. If your children are thus reared, the necessity of laying up for them is, in a great measure, if not altogether, removed. In regard to daughters, the case is somewhat different. The weakness of the sex renders them incapable of encountering the rough adversities of life, and of accumulating wealth by all those vigorous efforts which are competent to their brothers. But if they are married, and their husbands are industrious, well-doing men, there is no more necessity of storing up for them than for the sons. Their husbands will, of course, take care of them. If any of the children are crippled, or so enfeebled by disease that it will be out of their power to support themselves, duty would seem to require that some provision be made for them. It is worthy of note, that the only text of Scripture which speaks of the duty of parents to lay up for their children, (2 Cor. 12 : 14,) conveys the idea, that it is rather for such children as are in a weak state, and not able to help themselves, that such duty is to be performed, than for those who have attained their full strength. We have no sort of objection to a prudent forecast in regard to such cases. Nor have we any thing to say against the sequestration of something for the widow, that she may not be left to struggle with want after her husband is gone. We trust that these admissions are sufficient to clear us from the imputation of advocating a wanton improvidence respecting the comfort of one's own family. We must say, however, that the general tendency of Christians is to err in the opposite direction. They make more abundant provision for their families than there is any necessity for; and the consequence is, they are hindered from doing their duty to the cause of God. We shall feel ourselves happy, if we can contribute something towards the correction of this evil.

The great object, which every parent should have in view, should be the correct molding of the child's heart—the training of him to habits of virtue, benevolence, and industry—the formation of his moral character, so that he shall be a blessing to the community in which he may live. To this object all others should be but secondary and subsidiary. But if the father's daily course is such as to give evidence that he loves money; if his conversation from morning to night is about dollars and cents, landed estates, and bank stock; if he gives little or nothing to the cause of God, and is scarcely ever known to be concerned in benevolent enterprises, what kind of influence will all this exert upon the son? What sort of training does it give him? The father's daily conduct is the mold into which the susceptible, yielding mind of the child is run. And if, whenever the cause of benevolence is presented to the father, he excuses himself, and shuts up his hand from giving, the son will learn to do so too. If the father always withholds, on the pretext of laying up for his family, the son will learn the lesson, and practice it when he grows up to act for himself, no matter how vast the property he may be possessed of. The son never becomes benevolent, however ample his means. He grows up a close-fisted, selfish, mammon-serving soul, because the example of his father never instilled into him the first principle of noble-hearted, disinterested benevolence. Alas! how mistaken the course of many a fond parent! Our doctrine is, that a parent should, for the sake of his children, accustom himself to deeds of benevolence. The practice of withholding, in order to have something to bestow upon them, exercises a most injurious influence. It injures their moral character, to an extent which no amount of property bestowed upon them can ever afterwards countervail. Their hearts become hardened, and instead of becoming a blessing to mankind, as they might be, had they been instructed in the right use of property, they prove only a curse. They swell the number, already much too large, of covetous men, whom the word of God pronounces idolators. They encourage, by their example, the selfishness of mankind, and become hale companions of those who "sell the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes." Let children be taught to be benevolent. Let them be instructed in the duty of showing kindness to the needy. Let the duty of sustaining the cause of God, in all its various forms, be instilled into their hearts. Let all this be done, not merely by precept, but by example. Do not forget the trite saying here, that "actions speak louder than words." If, in addition to all this, you can lay up something to be bequeathed as an inheritance to such of them as may need it, we shall say nothing against it. Let every man answer his own conscience in that respect. But the first thing—the all-absorbing thing—should be the formation of their hearts, so that they will be likely to do their duty to God and men. Let this be done, even if you leave them penniless.

There are cases, in which the selfishness of the parent works in a way somewhat different from what we have supposed. The children, instead of turning out sordidly parsimonious and miserly, prove exceedingly lavish of the patrimony conferred upon them. There is a natural trait of extravagance, inherited, perhaps, from the mother, which all the father's tutorage has not been able to overcome. Their prodigality seems almost to forbid the idea of their being selfish—lovers of money. But they do love money, as well as the most niggardly. They love it, for the sake of the immediate, present enjoyment it brings to them; and they are as supremely selfish, as the most miserly. They always had enough of natural extravagance to render them proof against the parsimonious example of their father; but on the other hand, his example stood directly in the way of turning that extravagance into the channel of benevolence. The result is, that they are selfish still—supremely selfish—though in a different form from what their parent is. Their selfishness is seen in their prodigality. For, free-hearted as they seem to be, their expenditures have reference solely to their own gratification. Their table is abundantly spread, the furniture of their house is provided without regard to cost, their equipage is splendid, and their entertainments are given on a magnificent scale. There is nothing mean in their manner of living; it is what the world calls noble and generous. It is all conducted, however, with an eye to self; and so far as doing any thing for the cause of God is concerned, they are as contracted as their father was before them. Eventually, their property may be the means of doing some good; for when they have squandered it by their excesses, it will, perhaps, fall into the hands of those who will make a good use of it. In this way, prodigality works better than parsimony. But the immediate influence of it upon the heart is not a whit better. As far as the conduct of the prodigal himself goes, he is no less a curse to society than the man of opposite character.

The conclusion to which we come is, that parents should go no farther, in laying up property for their children, than they can do in perfect consistency with giving them the highest degree of moral and spiritual training. Children are the legacy that a parent bequeathes to society; and if he sets them afloat upon the world, with plenty of money in their pockets, and nothing but selfishness to guide them in the use of it, he bequeathes a curse instead of a blessing, for which a terrible retribution awaits him. To make them a blessing, he must set them the example of making a right use of property. He must set the example of using it in the way God would have it to be used. He must freely set his hand to works of benevolence, not withholding for fear of coming to want, or for fear of not having enough to bestow upon them. Otherwise he not only feeds their natural selfishness, but exposes also his want of confidence in Him who said, "Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." Surely, God will not suffer the family of that man to want, who makes it his first business to train them in the way of righteousness. The seed of the righteous never go begging bread.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

The academic year of DeRuyter Institute ended on the 26th ult., after the usual Examination and Exhibition. We have not received—as we should be glad to receive in all such cases—an official notice of the concluding exercises. We learn, however, from a friend who was incidentally present, that they were of an unusually interesting and satisfactory character. The following list of Orations and Essays we copy from the printed programme :—

1.	There is a Lesson in Every Thing.	Ira J. Ordway.
2.	Labor Conquers all Things.	M. Saunders.
3.	Only the First Step Costs.	Emeline Burch.
4.	The Ministration of Sorrow.	Hannah Burt.
5.	The Christian's Grave.	Jane F. Goodwin.
6.	Field of Action for Young Men.	R. D Burdick.
7.	The Power of Christianity.	Albert Whitford.
8.	A True Friend.	Sarah M. Saunders.
9.	Man the Image of God.	Julia Williams.
10.	Claims upon the Young Men of America.	H. L. Smith.
11.	A Light dispels the Darkness.	Iretus G. Cardner.
12.	My Father made them All.	Ellen J. Smith.

NEW-YORK STATE TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The Annual Meeting of the N. Y. State Temperance Society was held at Syracuse, June 20th and 21st. A memorial was introduced, for presentation to the Legislature at its next session, asking the enactment of a law to prohibit, under adequate penalties, the sale of intoxicating liquors, and that the subject be referred to the people for action in June, 1851. The following resolutions, among others, were presented and discussed :—

Resolved, That to license the sale of intoxicating drinks, is to license, not drunkenness only, but numerous other vices; it is also to license robbery, and arson, and murder, and it is moreover to impose intolerable burdens of expense and pauperism upon the industrious and sober.

Resolved, That it is a gross inconsistency for the friends of Temperance to belong to political parties which do not commit themselves fully, openly and heartily, in their newspapers, and meetings, and nominations, to the doctrine that Civil Government is bound to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks. And,

Resolved, further, That so long as they do belong to such parties, there is little probability that Civil Government will permanently prohibit such sale.

—The foregoing was prepared two weeks ago, but omitted through oversight. Since it was in type, we learn that the resolution in relation to political parties was advocated by Gerrit Smith, Esq., and adopted by the Society. After its adoption, Mr. Smith was called away, and on the following day the resolution was reconsidered and rescinded; whereupon the following letter was addressed to the Treasurer of the Society :—

Mr. Abner Bates, Treasurer of N. Y. State Temperance Society:

Dear Sir—I learn this afternoon, that the Society reconsidered and rescinded, yesterday, the 2d in the series of Resolutions which it had passed. I have no doubt that it will be the gainer thereby on the score of popularity, numbers and friends. Nevertheless, is not the favor of Heaven, at the expense of which it purchases these gains, worth infinitely more than these gains? I cannot avoid the conclusion, that the Society has made a bad bargain, an unprofitable exchange.

When you asked for contributions, day before yesterday, I gave my name for $100. Enclosed is my draft for it. This ends my connection with the Society. I say not this with the least idea that the Society will regret my withdrawal. No Society which studies to keep in the current of the popular favor, covets the membership of one so odious as myself. Resp'y your friend,

Gerrit Smith.

LIBERTY PARTY CONVENTION.

A Liberty Party Convention was held at Syracuse, N. Y., on the 3d and 4th of July. From a sketch of the first day's proceedings, which appears in the N. Y. Tribune, we learn that Wm. L. Chaplin was chosen President, and J. R. Johnson and H. Smith, Secretaries. A Business Committee, of which Gerrit Smith was Chairman, reported an Address, and a series of Resolutions, which led to an interesting and animated discussion.

The first resolution was, "That passing events do but deepen our conviction that a sectarian religion is the greatest hindrance to the deliverance of the slave." This resolution gave occasion for a very general expression of abhorrence of sectarianism—an ism explained by one of the speakers as resulting from the substitution of the merely incidental for the really substantial. Gerrit Smith characterized all sectarian churches as man-made churches. "There is no true Church except that of God, and any individual has the right of self-judgment as to the doctrines of the true Church." The resolution was unanimously adopted.

The following resolution, the second of the series, was adopted, after a labored attempt on the part of Rev. Samuel J. May of Syracuse to prove that the U. S. Constitution is a pro-slavery document, and a reply by Gerrit Smith, designed to show that it is an anti-slavery document :—

"Resolved, That every Slaveholding Government is but a piracy; and that, hence, if pirates invade Cuba or South Carolina, Brazil or Georgia, there is no more reason why Abolitionists and believers in righteous Civil Governments should sympathize with the invaded than the invading pirates."

The following resolution was also adopted, viz :—

Resolved, That the Government is deeply unjust which disfranchises woman; which denies its subjects the right to buy and sell freely what they please; which permits the sale of intoxicating drinks; which consumes the earnings of its subjects in wars; which tolerates or practices Land Monopoly; which refuses to the accused or to any party litigant the right of having his cause tried by judge and jurors who are not members of secret societies; or which sanctions or permits the practice of the matchless crime of Slavery.

A resolution relating to the N. Y. State Temperance Society was discussed at the evening session—Mr. Crozier of New York opposing it, and Gerrit Smith advocating it. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Smith contended, that he who belongs to either of the rum parties gives his influence against Temperance, and must come out before he can be a consistent temperance man. He had no respect for the Christianity of that church whose pulpit would not testify against all men and all parties that directly or indirectly sustain intemperance. He had said that all churches with colored pews were the churches of the devil, and it were better to burn than sustain them. He would say the same thing of those churches whose clergy and laity hold fellowship with any party that sustains the sale and use of intoxicating drinks for any other purpose than medicinal. He declared all the churches which sustain any, or do not protest against all, the great evils of the age, such as Intemperance, Land Monopoly, War and Slavery, to be infamous, and more serviceable to the devil than to God. The resolution reads as follows :—

Whereas, The New York State Temperance Society has, from the first, proclaimed that the suppression by civil government of the sale of intoxicating drinks is the measure most emphatically indispensable to the success of the cause of Temperance; and whereas, at its late annual meeting, it reconsidered and rescinded its resolution that it is grossly inconsistent for the friends of Temperance to be connected with political parties which refuse to favor the aforesaid measure : Resolved, therefore, That a member of the Liberty Party can no more belong to the unprincipled New York State Temperance Society, than he can to one of the rum political parties.

"THE MORNING DEW."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :—

I observe an article in your paper of the 27th ult., entitled "The Morning Dew," copied from the "Child's Companion," which I think contains some errors that ought to be corrected before they are put into the hands of children, as it may save them the trouble of "unlearning what they have learned amiss." The objectionable part is in the following sentence :—

"Some persons have said, that it (the dew) came down from the clouds in the night, and others have supposed that it came out of the earth and plants; but it is now known, that the sun, during the heat of the day, draws up a great quantity of vapor into the air from the earth's surface and its waters, which in the night comes down on the earth again in the form of dew."

I think the writer of this must hold to the opinion, that the sun has the same effect on water that the magnet has on steel or iron, viz., to draw it after him by attraction, till he retires, or becomes obscured, and then it returns back to its original position. If this were the case, I think that we should not be so often troubled with drouth, as what is taken up in the day returns in the night, and thus keeps the supply undiminished. Now, I believe "it is well known," that no vapor is exhaled from the earth until a certain degree of heat is first obtained, either from the sun or some other source, and then the dew appears; and that the exhalation never ceases until the cause is removed, though the appearance of it on the plants, &c., may not always be the same in the morning, owing to the difference of winds and clouds; and that when the vapor is once in the air, it never returns to the earth, except when forced into a more compact body by contrary currents of wind, when it descends in the shape of rain, hail, or snow. One reason for my belief is, that when mowing grass in the afternoon, I have observed that moisture appears at the surface of the ground by six o'clock or before—first visible on the blade of my scythe, and then on my feet—and by eight o'clock, or half an hour after sunset, the lower part of the grass, if thick and heavy, would be nearly as wet as in the morning, while the top was perfectly dry. I have observed the same thing in walking through a meadow in the evening, when the grass was full grown, by finding my feet wet, while to my hand the top of the grass appeared dry. Another reason for my belief is the testimony of more learned men. The editors of the "Domestic Encyclopedia," Drs. Willick and Cooper, thus define dew :

"A light, thin, and transparent vapor, slowly exhaling and ascending from the earth, in spring and summer, mornings, while the sun is below the horizon, and then deposited on vegetable substances in the form of small globules, in proportion as they are cold from their property of radiating or throwing off heat with more or less facility. It is farther remarkable, that plants continually exhale dew or moisture through the orifices of their vessels, and that moisture is not a vapor collected by their leaves, as has often been erroneously believed. Each plant exhales this dew, according to the peculiar structure of its orifices. Even shut up in vessels, and covered under glasses, plants have collected a greater quantity of dew during the night, than those standing in the open air."

I once witnessed an experiment on this point. Several garden plants were removed or transplanted in the morning of a clear, airy day, and slightly watered, as usual, and then covered with a glass vessel nearly as large as a pail. This I thought a strange procedure, and I anticipated a different effect from the influence of the glass to what proved to be the result. I returned at noon, and, to my surprise, the plants were not wilted in the least; and the glass was left standing three or four days, and then removed, and the plants looked as flourishing as those which had never been transplanted, and I have no doubt that they would have continued so a week or ten days longer, and probably to maturity, had there been sufficient room in the glass, notwithstanding they received no benefit from the falling dew in the night.

The Colored Home in New York.—The tenth annual report of this institution has been printed. The whole number of persons under its charge for the last year was 713, of whom 141 died, and 219 still remain in the building. It is quite astonishing to what an age many of those who died during the year had attained; there was one who lived to be 114 years old, three lived 101 years, four 94 years, and four 92 years; the united ages of the twelve amounting to 1,161 years. Ten were over 89, and fifteen over 70. The receipts of the institution for the past year have been $12,152 94.

THE CASE OF PROF. WEBSTER.

On the 24th of April last, a petition for pardon, prepared and signed by Doctor John W. Webster, was transmitted to the Governor and Council of Massachusetts, which remained before them until the 4th of June, when it was withdrawn on the application of Prof. Webster. The following is the opening paragraph of that petition :—

"Having been convicted before the Supreme Judicial Court of the murder of Dr. George Parkman, I would most respectfully and humbly petition your Excellency and the Honorable Council, to be permitted to declare, in the most solemn manner that I am entirely innocent of this awful crime; that I never had any inducement to injure, in any way, him whom I have long numbered among my best friends. To Him who seeth in secret, and before whom I may, ere long, be called to appear, would I appeal for the truth of the solemn declaration, that I had no agency in placing the remains of a human body in or under my rooms in the Medical College in Boston, nor do I know by whom they were so placed. I am the victim of circumstances, or a foul conspiracy, or of the attempt of some individual to cause suspicion to fall upon me—influenced, perhaps, by the prospect of obtaining a large reward."

On the 2d of July, Rev. Dr. Putnam, the spiritual adviser of the prisoner, appeared before the Council, with a confession of Prof. Webster that he killed Dr. Parkman, and a petition for commutation of punishment on the ground, that it was done in the heat of passion and without malice. Dr. Putnam stated, that he had no personal acquaintance with Professor Webster before being called to act in the capacity of his spirial adviser. For the first few weeks of his visit, he sought no acknowledgment from the prisoner. At length, on the 23d May, he visited him in his cell, and demanded of him, for his own well being, that he should tell the truth in regard to the matter; and he acceded to the request, by making the statement which was now submitted for the consideration of the Council, and from which we copy :—

"I sent the note to Dr. Parkman, which it appears was carried by the boy Maxwell. I handed it to Littlefield unsealed. It was to ask Dr. Parkman to call at my rooms on Friday the 23d, after my lecture. He had become of late very importunate for his pay. He had threatened me with a suit, to put an officer into my house, and to drive me from my professorship, if I did not pay him. The purport of my note was simply to ask the conference. I did not tell him in it what I could do or what I had to say about the payment. I wished to gain for those few days a release from his solicitations, to which I was liable every day, on occasions and in a manner very disagreeable, and also to avert for so long a time at least the fulfillment of recent threats of severe measures. I did not expect to be able to pay him when Friday should arrive. My purpose was, if he should accede to the proposed interview, to state to him my embarrassments, and utter inability to pay him at present, to apologize for those things in my conduct which had offended him, to throw myself upon his mercy, and to beg for further time and indulgence, for the sake of my family, if not for my own, and to make as good promises to him as I could have any hope of keeping. I did not hear from him on that day, nor the next, (Wednesday,) but I found on Thursday he had been abroad in pursuit of me without finding me. I imagined he had forgotten the appointment, or else did not mean to wait for it. I feared he would come in upon me at my lecture-room, or while I was preparing my experiments for it—therefore I called at his house on that morning, (Friday,) between 8 and 9 o'clock, to remind him of my wish to see him at the College at 1¼ o'clock. I did not stop to talk with him, for I expected the conversation would be a long one, and I had my lecture to prepare, for it was necessary for me to have my time, and also to keep my mind free from other exciting matters.

"Dr. Parkman agreed to call on me as I proposed. He came accordingly between 1½ and 2 o'clock, entering at the lecture-room door. I was engaged in removing some glasses from my lecture-room table into the room in the rear called the upper laboratory; he came rapidly down the step and followed me into the laboratory; he immediately addressed me with great energy, "Are you ready for me, Sir—have you got the money?" I replied, "No, Dr. Parkman," and was then beginning to state my condition and my appeal to him, but he would not listen to me, and interrupted me with much vehemence; he called me scoundrel and liar, and went on heaping on me the most bitter taunts and opprobrious epithets; while he was speaking he drew a handful of papers from his pocket and took from among them my two notes and also an old letter from Dr. Hosack, written many years ago, and congratulating him on his success in getting me appointed Professor of Chemistry. 'You see,' he said, 'I got you into your office, and now I will get you out of it.' He put back into his pocket all the papers except the letter and the notes; I cannot tell how long the torrent of threats and invectives continued, and I cannot recall to memory but a small portion of what he said.

"At first I kept interposing, trying to pacify him, so that I might obtain the object for which I sought the interview, but I could not stop him, and soon my own temper was up; I forgot everything, and felt nothing but the sting of his words. I was excited to the highest degree of passion, and while he was speaking and gesticulating in the most violent and menacing manner, thrusting the letter and his fist into my face, in my fury I seized whatever thing was handiest, (it was a stick of wood,) and dealt him an instantaneous blow with all the force that passion could give it. I did not know, or think, or care, where I should hit him, nor how hard, nor what the effect would be; it was on the side of the head, and there was nothing to break the force of the blow; he fell instantly upon the pavement; there was no second blow; he did not move; I stooped down over him, and he seemed to be lifeless; blood flowed from his mouth, and I got a sponge and wiped it away; I got some ammonia and applied it to his nose, but without effect; perhaps I spent 10 minutes in attempts to resuscitate him, but I found he was absolutely dead. In my horror and consternation I ran instinctively to the doors and bolted them—the doors of the lecture-room and of the laboratory below; and then what was I to do? It never occurred to me to go out and declare what had been done, and obtain assistance; I saw nothing but the alternative of a successful movement and concealment of the body on the one hand, or of infamy and destruction on the other. The first thing I did, as soon as I could do anything, was to draw the body into a private room adjoining, where I took off the clothes and began putting them into the fire, which was burning in the upper laboratory; they were all consumed there that afternoon, with papers, pocket-book, and whatever they contained. I did not examine the pockets nor remove anything except the watch. I saw that, or the chain of it, hanging out. I took it and threw it over the bridge as I went to Cambridge. My next move was to get the body into the sink which stands in the small private room; by setting the body partially erect against the corner, and by getting up into the sink myself, I succeeded in drawing it up there; it was entirely dismembered; it was quickly done, as a work of terrible and desperate necessity. * * * The head and viscera were put into the furnace that day, and fuel heaped on; did not examine at night to see to what degree they were consumed; some of the extremities were put in there, I believe, on that day. The pelvis and some of the limbs, perhaps, were put under the lid of the lecture room table, in what is called the well, a deep sink lined with lead; a stream of Cochituate was turned into it and kept running through it all Friday night; the thorax was put into a similar well in the lower laboratory, which I filled with water and threw in a quantity of potash which I found there. This disposition of the remains was not changed till after the visit of the officers on Monday. When the body had been thus all disposed of I cleared away all traces of what had been done."

The remainder of the document is mostly taken up with an attempt to explain the circumstances which weighed against Prof. Webster on his trial. We do not think it worth while to copy farther, except the closing part, which gives a clew to the whole affair, and suggests the most solemn reflections. Dr. Putnam, at the conclusion of the confession, asked Prof. Webster if he had never thought, before the fatal meeting, that the death of Dr. Parkman would be an advantage to him; and charged him, as a dying man, to answer truly and exactly, or else be silent. The reply was :—

"No, never! As I live, and as God is my witness, never! I was no more capable of such a thought than one of my innocent children; I never had the remotest idea of injuring Dr. P. until the moment the blow was struck. Dr. P. was extremely severe and sharp, the most provoking of men, and I am irritable and passionate. A quick-handed and brisk violence of temper has been a besetting sin of my life. I was an only child, much indulged, and have never acquired the control over my passions that I ought to have acquired early, and the consequence is all this."

The effect of Prof. Webster's confession remains to be seen. His numerous conflicting statements, in circumstances of awful solemnity, will probably lead the Council to decide without much reference to his testimony. The prevaling opinion seems to be, that his punishment will not be commuted.

"The American Baptist."—Under this title, the American Baptist Free Mission Society has issued from Utica, N. Y., the first number of a paper intended to supply the place of the Christian Contributor and the Western Christian. Geo. G. Ritchie is at present the editor and publisher, but it is expected that Warham Walker, the former editor of the Western Christian, will soon assume the responsibilities of that station. The number before us is industriously edited and tastefully printed.

Accidents Last Sabbath.—Two fatal railroad accidents occurred in the vicinity of New York last Sabbath. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon, while the train from New Haven was going at the rate of 25 miles an hour, near Fordham, John Holden jumped from the cars, and was fearfully mangled. A little later in the day the Harlem Railroad down train ran over a boy, at Thirty-second street, and instantly killed him.

Sustaining the "Christian Sabbath."—In one of the police-courts of London, it was recently decided, that a Jew cannot force his apprentice, although a Jew, to work on what is called the Christian Sabbath, although his own Sabbath has been observed. The parties implicated were extensive cigar manufacturers, who were ordered to pay the complainant his wages, notwithstanding he refused to work on Sunday.

Associational Minutes.—The Minutes of the Eastern and Central Associations are out of press and ready for distribution. Those of the Western Association will be ready next week.

Notice of the Friendship Church.—At a meeting of the members of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church of Friendship, Allegany Co., N. Y., held June 9th, 1850, it was unanimously Resolved, That all non-resident members of said church, who do not report themselves to the church, by letter or otherwise, within one year from the above date, shall be considered as gone out from among us, and their names stricken from the church records.

By order of the Church,

R. W. Utter, Clerk.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, July 1.

After disposing of unimportant morning business, the Senate took up the Compromise Bill. Mr. Cooper made a speech in its favor, and Mr. Upham spoke against it.

A message was received from the President in relation to New Mexico, in which he says he has nothing farther to communicate, having received no official communication of Col. Monroe's Proclamation.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House spent all day upon the Galphin business, in respect to which plenty of speeches were made, but no action was taken.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, July 2.

Mr. Yulee made an attempt to get passed his resolution fixing the 1st of August for the adjournment of Congress. Mr. Clay opposed it, and hoped Congress would not think of adjourning until the questions at present in agitation were settled. Action upon the resolution was postponed.

The Compromise Bill was taken up, and Mr. Upham concluded his speech against it, and in favor of a separate consideration of California's claim for admission. Mr. Seward then obtained the floor, and made a powerful speech against the bill. The gist of Gov. Seward's argument is, that the Compromise is unnecessary, not fair and equal in its terms, humiliating to all the parties, and, if adopted, will of necessity be utterly ineffectual.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The consideration of the Report of the Galphin Committee was resumed. The conduct of Mr. Crawford, the Secretary of War, in prosecuting the claim while holding office as head of a Department, was severely commented upon by several speakers, and defended by others. Several amendments were proposed to the pending resolution, but no action was taken.

IN SENATE. FOURTH-DAY, July 3.

Mr. Wales presented resolutions adopted by a meeting of citizens of Wilmington, Delaware, against the Compromise Bill. Mr. Clay said he had received a letter stating that the resolutions were adopted only by a small majority; he thought the citizens of Delaware, as well as of the whole country, would be found almost unanimous in favor of the bill.

The resolution prohibiting the exercise of civil authority by military officers of the United States, and providing punishment for such crimes, was taken up, and Mr. Houston concluded his remarks in denunciation of Col. Monroe's action in New Mexico.

The resolution was temporarily laid on the table, and the Compromise Bill taken up, upon which Messrs. Bell, Clay, and Jefferson Davis, spoke; after which the Senate adjourned to Sixth-day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Holmes asked leave to submit a resolution that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into and report as to the expediency of placing at the disposal of the President such naval forces as may be necessary to enforce our just claims against Hayti. Objected to.

The Galphin business was taken up, and the House was enlightened and amused by the speeches of Messrs. McKissock and King of N. Y., Thompson of Pa., Cartter of Ohio, Burt of S. C., and Houston of Del. Adjourned to Sixth-day.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, July 5.

After the morning hour, during which nothing important transpired, the Compromise Bill was taken up, and Mr. Bell occupied most of the session with a speech, which he had not finished when the adjournment took place. He prefers the President's plan to the Compromise, but will vote for the latter.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House was engaged most of the day with a charge made on Mr. Giddings, by the Boston Atlas, to the effect that he has surreptitiously obtained certain papers from the Post Office Department and circulated them in Ohio, which he totally denies. This done, the House took up the Galphin business, and Messrs. King of N. J. and Conrad of La. vindicated the Secretary of War.

IN SENATE. SABBATH, July 6.

Nothing worth naming was done in the Senate, except to listen to the conclusion of Mr. Bell's speech on the Compromise Bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

In the House, the subject of the Boston Atlas letter, charging Mr. Giddings with having abstracted certain papers from the Post Office Department, was brought up again; and from a statement of Mr. Matteson, on behalf of Col. Warren, Second Assistant P. M. General, it seems there is a question of veracity to be settled between Mr. Giddings and Col. Warren. Mr. G. asked for an investigation, and the Speaker was authorized to appoint a Select Committee of five to inquire into the facts and report to the House.

The report of the Galphin Committee was taken up and discussed at some length. The subject was not finally disposed of, but from the votes taken on amendments, &c., it is plain that the members of the House of Representatives have not a very exalted opinion of Mr. Crawford's course in the matter.

THE CASE OF SMITH O'BRIEN.—The Irish papers contain an account of a great meeting held in the city of Limerick, on the 19th ult., which had for his immediate object an expression of sympathy for Mr. Smith O'Brien, who is at present a close state prisoner, at Maria Island, Van Dieman's Land. It was previously known, that Mr. O'Brien had incurred the displeasure of the colonial authorities by declining to accept what his fellow prisoners had not refused—a ticket of leave during his stay in the colonies. For this he has paid a severe, and, as it would seem, a penalty superfluously harsh. His brother, Sir Lucius O'Brien, directed the attention of the Government to this circumstance, and stated that the health of the ex-member from Limerick was sinking under the treatment to which he was exposed. The letters read at the meeting from the unfortunate and misguided prisoner himself, develop a series of annoyances to which the blackest criminal in this colony is not subjected. He was placed eight weeks in solitary confinement, and made to perform every menial office himself.

TWO WEEKS LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

By the steamers Philadelphia and Ohio, which arrived at New York on the 8th inst., we have news from California to June 1st, two week later. The Philadelphia brought $2,000,000 in gold dust on freight, and about $500,000 in the hands of passengers.

The great news by this arrival relates to Indian difficulties, and consequent bloodshed. In the Sacramento country, the Indians having committed numerous depradations, and killed ten or eleven whites in a battle, the U. S. troops took the field against them, and killed large numbers, which induced them to send in their chiefs and make a treaty of peace. In the vicinity of Clear Lake, also, a large number of Indians have been slaughtered by a detachment of troops from the U. S. garrisons at Sonoma and Benicia. "Alta California" gives the following account of the battle:—

"The troops arrived in the vicinity of the Lake, and came unexpectedly upon a body of Indians numbering between two and three hundred. They immediately surrounded them, and as the Indians raised a shout of defiance and attempted to escape, poured in a destructive fire indiscriminately upon men, women and children. 'They fell,' says our informant, 'as grass before the sweep of the scythe.' Little or no resistance was encountered, and the work of butchery was of short duration. The shrieks of the slaughtered victims died away, the roar of muskets ceased, and stretched lifeless upon the sod of their native valley were the bleeding bodies of these Indians—nor sex, nor age, was spared; it was the order of extermination fearfully obeyed. The troops returned to the stations, and quiet is for the present restored."

The tax on foreign miners is likely to make considerable trouble. Twenty dollars each per month, is a large sum to demand from the 10,000 foreigners engaged in mining operations, and they seem determined to resist the collectors—a determination in which they have the sympathy of many Americans.

The accounts from the placers are not so lively as usual. The continued high water of the rivers has in some degree checked the operations of the miners. Business in the cities, however, goes on as brisk as ever, and California does not seem to be wanting money when she can send two and a half millions in gold dust by one steamer.

The new settlements of Trinity and Humboldt fulfil their first flattering promises, and they will soon create a flourishing agricultural district, midway between San Francisco and Oregon City.

The steamship Sarah Sands, Capt. Thompson, was about 90 miles below Monterey on her passage up, taking in coal. A number of her passengers had left her and gone to San Francisco by land; those who remained on board of her were all in good health.

A block of California gold bearing quartz has been procured, at the expense of the State, to be contributed in the erection of the proposed monument to the memory of Washington, at the seat of our General Government. The block of gold bearing quartz is from the Mariposa diggings, near Fremont's mines, and weighs about 125 pounds. In shape it is irregular, approaching a square, its sides varying from 18 to 20 inches in length. It averages in thickness nine inches—across its surface diagonally it is 21 inches by measurement. Very little gold is perceptible to the naked eye, but it is estimated to contain about $80 worth.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By the steamer Europe, Liverpool dates to June 22d have been received. The substance of the advices will be found below.

England.

The British Ministry will not resign. As long as the Commons support them, they say they can do without the confidence of the Lords, whom they declare to be a quite useless appendage to the machine of State. This is applauded in the Commons as sound English doctrine.

The steamer Orion was recently run on a rock between Glasgow and Liverpool, by which about fifty persons lost their lives.

The General Post-Office has issued an order, that, after the 22d June, the delivery of all letters on Sunday will cease. The measure meets with strong opposition.

Public meetings are being organized in different parts of Ireland to denounce the Government for its persecution of Smith O'Brien.

Prince Jung Bahadoor, the Ambassador from Nepaul, newly arrived in England, has presented his credentials. At the drawing-room presentation, on the 10th ult., says the Times, "the Envoy from the Sovereign of Nepaul, and also the officers of the Mission, appeared in magnificent Eastern costumes, nearly covered with the richest gold embroidery, the costume of the Envoy being of green velvet. The turban of his Excellency, and also those of his two brothers, were adorned with a profusion of diamonds, pearls and emeralds, and the Envoy also wore a collar of emeralds of large size."

France.

Several more editors and printers have recently been arrested and imprisoned, in various parts of France, for seditious and libelous publications.

The Duke de Broglie, M. Thiers, M. M. Guizot, Duchattel and Durno, have visited the ex-King Louis Philippe, whose state of health is alarming.

M. Lamartine has been obliged to stop at Macon, on his journey to the East, by an attack of illness, which confines him to his bed.

The private fortune of Louis Philippe is said to be £160,000 per annum, which he has divided, by his will, equally between his children and grand-children.

Miscellaneous.

The unpopularity of the Pope appears to be on the increase. It is said that nearly all the Roman youth have either emigrated, been imprisoned, or are under suspicion, and are not allowed to be abroad after sunset. All the letters of the English Consul, except official ones, are intercepted and examined. The finances are in a melancholy state, their paper being at 14 per cent. discount. The Jesuits have been established at Modena, and all their property has been restored.

At Tabriz, Persia, a conspiracy has recently been detected. Five of the conspirators were decapitated on the 21st of May, and their bodies exposed, each with the head under the left arm, over the gates of the town. Nine were executed previously. Salar, the chief of the rebellion in Khorassan, and uncle to the Shah, has been taken prisoner and put to a cruel death, both his eyes having been torn from his head before decapitation.

A serious outrage occurred in the prison at Agra in April last, arising out of a personal quarrel between a Sepoy and a Seikh; the other convict inmates, to the number of 300, joined either one or the other, and thereby increased the disturbance. The tumult became so great that the guard fired, and from 70 to 80 of the rioters were killed or wounded.

SEVERE STORM.—Albany, N. Y., and the region westward, was visited by a terrible storm on Sixth-day evening last, which continued three hours, and did much damage. Two vessels lying in Albany harbor were struck by lightning, as were several buildings in the vicinity. The large quantity of water which fell so suddenly occasioned several breaks in the Erie Canal, one of which, near Port Jackson, is quite extensive. A bridge on the Utica and Schenectady Railroad was so much injured that it gave way when the express train from Albany was crossing it. The engine was precipitated into the stream; the tender, a freight car, and the baggage car, lodged on top of the engine. The three passenger cars did not go into the stream, but were badly broken. In the freight car there were eight persons, a horse, and a corpse. They were laborers on the road, with the exception of one woman. Only four of the eight are to be found. One dead body has been recovered. The others (including the woman) are supposed to have been carried off by the rushing torrent. A western train was precipitated into a branch of the East Canada Creek, the culvert having been swept away. One passenger was killed: Four or five other passengers were badly hurt, and fourteen or fifteen slightly. The locomotive was badly broken, as were also the baggage and two of the passenger cars.

TITLES BY WHOLESALE.—The commencement exercises of the College of New Jersey took place at Princeton, June 26th, when honorary titles were conferred on only one hundred and thirty-five persons. The degree of A.B. was conferred upon the eighty members of the graduating class. The degree of A.M. was conferred in course upon forty of the graduates of 1847. The honorary degree of D.D. was conferred on Rev. Alexander Beith of Stirling, Scotland; Rev. Shepard K. Kollock, Rev. John Hall of Trenton, Rev. Jonathan F. Stearns of Newark, Rev. Thomas L. Janeway of Philadelphia, and Rev. James S. Woods of Lewiston, Pa. The honorary degree of L.L.D. was conferred on Hon. James Buchanan, Hon. P. D. Vroom, and Chief Justice Henry W. Green. The degree of A.M. was conferred on Daniel E. Philips of N. J.; Benj. Mathias of Philadelphia; Samuel Miller Breckenridge of Missouri; Lorenzo A. Sykes of N. J. The degree of Bachelor of Laws was conferred upon Joseph E. Kearney of Newark, and Peter I. Voorhees of Blauvenburg, graduates of the Law School.

THE HUNGARIANS IN THE WEST.—Gov. Ujhazy and his companions have, as we learn, fixed on a tract of land in Iowa, on Grand River, some hundred and forty miles south-west of Burlington, and there propose to establish themselves. The place they propose to call Buda, after the capital city of their native country. Gov. U. and several of his associates have recently been in St. Louis to procure farming implements, with which to commence operations. While there a large public meeting was held, at which a committee of two from each ward of the city was appointed to obtain contributions to aid them in founding their colony. It is designed that this colony shall serve as a place of refuge for such of their countrymen as may resort to it. A large number are expected to emigrate to this country during the present season, and probably many will wish to settle at Buda. The citizens of St Louis also resolved to petition Congress in favor of an adequate grant of land in Iowa for the Hungarian patriots now here, as well as for those yet to come.

RAILROAD FROM CORNING TO BUFFALO.—A meeting was held in Buffalo, recently, to consider the project of a Railroad from Corning to Buffalo, through the Cohocton Valley, by way of Blood's Corners, Caledonia, Le Roy and Batavia. The distance is 130 miles. Steuben County stands ready to build the road to Blood's Corners, 45 miles. The people of Livingston were also warmly in favor of the enterprise; so were those of Genesee. The friends of the Attica and Hornellsville road, to construct which $750,000 had been subscribed, were willing to abandon their enterprise and unite with the Corning project. A Committee was appointed to adopt measures for the organization of the Company. A Committee of Buffalonians was also authorized to solicit subscriptions. It is said that this road will bring Buffalo 30 miles nearer New York than any other route. [Tribune.

CHOLERA.—The Cholera seems to be increasing, though not in a way to create alarm! In Cincinnati there were 187 deaths during the week ending July 6, of which 118 were from Cholera. During the 24 hours ending Sunday afternoon, July 7th, there were 65 deaths from Cholera. In St. Louis, during the week ending June 24, there were 42 deaths from Cholera. One man died in Boston last week, whose disease the Doctors called Cholera.

The Hudson River Railroad, on Thursday last, brought down a train of twenty-three large cars, having 1,750 passengers. The train was half a mile in length—the heaviest train, probably, ever drawn in this country by a single locomotive.

SUMMARY.

Count Dembinski, one of the Hungarians, says that Kossuth intends coming to this country, with his family, as soon as he shall be permitted to leave Turkey. Count Dembinski also says that of the one hundred Polish Refugees, who reached Southampton in company with himself, forty are now on their way to seek a home and subsistence in this country, the remaining sixty having obtained employment in England.

In New York, on the 4th of July, a young man named Robert Addison Beilby, 21 years of age, a machinist, was walking through Chatham-st., near the Park, when a cannon on the opposite side of the street was discharged, and a steel bolt, which had been used as a ramrod, was blown from the piece across the street, striking him in the chest, and passing through his left lung. He was taken to the City Hospital, where he died.

The Monday Article of the N. Y. Tribune for July 8, says "There is more firmness in Land Warrants, and the demand for location has increased. The market, however, is still unsettled, and the large operators are not anxious to buy until some decision is had at Washington on the subject of donations of public lands. The quotations range from $110 to $125.

The Chicago Democrat, of June 25th, says that only nine deaths by Cholera had occurred in that city for five days previous; one of these was brought in a state of collapse from the Illinois River, and the others were recent emigrants. No alarm is felt on account of the disease being in the city, as it has not assumed an epidemic form.

In Baltimore, on the 2d of July, Charles Spilker, of the firm of Spilker & Alburti, German importers, was sentenced, in the United States Court, to pay a fine of $1,000 and the costs of Court, as the penalty for the recent smuggling of which he was convicted.

Died in Boston on Thursday (says the Traveler) widow Sarah Welsh, at the advanced age of one hundred and one years. She was a native of Gloucester, daughter of Jonathan Coates, and is to be interred at Newburyport. She was probably the oldest person in Boston, and is said to have enjoyed good health nearly up to the period of her death.

On the 4th of July, at New Haven, Ct., a young girl about 14 years of age was instantly killed by the discharge of a cannon. She ran before the cannon, and the top of her head was entirely blown away. A boy, also about 14 years of age, was badly wounded in the knee by the accidental discharge of a gun. He was not expected to survive.

The steamer Washington arrived at New York last week from Bremen, bringing an immense cargo of most valuable goods from Germany and France, consisting of over 500 tons measurement of silks, laces, satins, gloves, shawls, millinery, jewelry, watches, and rich dresses, to the value of more than a million of dollars.

A Committee of scientific men, who went to Worcester at the suggestion of the Gas Companies of New York and Boston to examine Mr. Paine's pretended discovery of a mode of making gas directly from water, have reported, that an examination does not satisfy them that the discovery is what it pretends to be.

A gentleman who has just taken a trip through the interior of Wisconsin and Michigan, says that the wheat in both those States is uncommonly fine, and the crop exceedingly large. It is beyond the reach of any ordinary contingency.

KAH-GE-GAH-BOWH (George Copway,) sailed on Wednesday for Europe, in the Cambria. He goes out as Delegate to the Peace Convention, to be holden at Frankfort-on-the-Main. He will probably be the first aboriginal American that has ever been seen in Germany.

A gentleman named Teman, connected with Georgetown College, was drowned while bathing in the Potomac, July 4th. Deceased was an expert swimmer, and supposed to have been seized with cramp.

In New York, on Friday last, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the thermometer stood at 90 degrees in the shade, and at 9 o'clock in the evening it showed a temperature of 92 degrees.

The bill to exempt the Homestead of families from attachment and levy or sale on Execution, has passed the New Hampshire House of Representatives by a vote of 188 to 77.

The Constitutional Convention in Michigan has refused to grant the Elective Franchise to men of color.

The market for Land Warrants continues to be unsettled. The large buyers offer but $100, but there appears to be no sellers below $120. There are few or no transactions taking place.

The London Chrono-Thermalist for June announces the discovery of a substitute for the sulphate of quinine, which is represented as being even a better medicine and can be bought for one tenth the price.

Dr. George W. Bethune, recently elected Chancellor of the University of the City of New York, has declined the tendered office. Engagements elsewhere rendered its acceptance impossible.

Severel lumbermen from the lumber regions of the Penobscot River are fitting out for removal to the Falls of St. Anthony, where they intend to settle.

Hon. SAMUEL S. PHELPS, U. S. Senator from Vermont, has consented to deliver the Anniversary Address before the American Institute in October next.

Three persons, Francis M. Shaw, L. M. Crutchin, and Thomas Boyce, have been convicted of mail robbery at Springfield, Ill. Shaw is only 14 years of age.

Mrs. Isabella Withrow and Miss Sarah Jane Withrow, wife and daughter of Oliver Withrow, were killed by lightning in Washington, Ohio, on the 27th ult. Several other persons in the vicinity were severely injured.

W. L. Crandall of Syracuse has issued a prospectus for the "Free School Clarion," to discuss the question of Free Schools to be tried at the Polls next Fall. Terms $1 for a single copy—a reduction for a larger number.

The Centerville (Md.) Sentinel of Tuesday last says: "The citizens of Kent Island were greatly alarmed during last week, in consequence of a rumor which was current, to the effect that an insurrection of the negroes was about to take place. They patrolled the Island four nights in succession, but nothing was discovered to increase their fears. We suspect that the rumor had its origin in some wag of a fellow who wished to play off a joke."

During four days 172,000 baskets of Strawberries—making an aggregate weight of twenty-one and a half tons—arrived in this City by the Erie Railroad. They were mostly grown in Rockland County. Taking 4 cents a basket as the average price, their value amounts to $6,880. Taking into the calculation the Strawberries received from other sources, our City probably spent about $3,000 per day for this fruit—and probably about $40,000 during the Strawberry season.

The Cherokee Advocate publishas a call from the directors of the Tahlequah public school for a convention of the teachers, parents, and friends of education in the Cherokee Nation, at Tahlequah, or some other convenient place, to take into consideration the best means of promoting the great and noble cause of education, and of elevating the standard of common schools in the Nation.

Mr. Williams, of Phelps, Ontario County, about two weeks since, quarreled with his wife, on account of some irregularities, and struck her over the head with a hammer. He undoubtedly thought he had killed her and fled and was neither seen nor heard of until his body was found upon the bank of Flint Creek. He had evidently hanged himself with a leather strap, and the head was completely severed from the body.

Facts have come to light that render it pretty certain the fire on the Griffith caught from the oiling of the engine. The engineer states that he had just oiled the engine—that his first discovery of the fire was through holes in the deck, and that the flames seemed to be on the under side of the deck. It is also stated the oil was a new kind, a chemical preparation, and highly inflammable.

A tornado of unusual severity passed over the eastern section of Lancaster county, Pa., on Friday of last week. The width of its track was about 200 yards, and it occupied about five minutes in passing, the air being all the time darkened with branches, shingles, and a variety of other objects snatched up in its course.

By the brig Orbet from Puget's Sound, Oregon, we learn that the ship Albion, of London, has been seized by General Dorr, on the part of the American Government, for smuggling and cutting timber on the United States possessions. This vessel, we understand, is under charter by the British Government—the timber being for the use of the Navy.

Joshua P. Scott, a colored convict at the Rhode Island State Prison, made a furious assault upon the officers of the prison the other day, seriously but not dangerously wounding officer Wetherbee and Mr. E. P. Church. The negro was armed with a bar of iron an inch in diameter and sixteen long, which he wielded with desperate energy against the officers.

Bristol Bill and Christian Meadows, the burglars and robbers recently tried at Danville, Vt. and sentenced to ten years imprisonment, were conducted to the prison at Windsor, on the 22d ult., where they will doubtless be obliged to work more honestly for a living.

The Boston Journal of Thursday chronicles the extraordinary success of the light-fingered gentry. An express-man between Burlington and Montreal was relieved of $3,000 in bank bills, and a man named Kimball of $3,600 in drafts and notes.

Mr. Joseph Coggeshall, of New York, was relieved of $1,430 in money and notes by an adroit Boston pickpocket, on Thursday morning last, while in the Old Colony Railroad Depot.

South-Western Association.

THE next session of the Seventh-day Baptist South-Western Association will be held with the Church at Jackson, Shelby Co, Ohio, commencing on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in October, 1850. Eld. Azor Estee is to preach the Introductory Discourse. A full delegation is desirable. It is expected that the churches will bear in mind, that the question of dividing the Association has been referred to that meeting, and that they will be prepared to act in the matter. WM. F. RANDOLPH, Secretary.

Christian Psalmody—Pocket Edition.

IN compliance with requests from various quarters, the publisher of the New Hymn Book—Christian Psalmody—has issued a second edition, on lighter paper and with smaller margins, by which the bulk and weight of the books are reduced about one-third, rendering them much more convenient for carrying in the pocket. The price is also reduced 12½ cents per copy. Those wishing books, of either edition, can now be supplied. Price of the larger edition from 75 cents to $1 50, according to the style of binding. Price of the smaller edition from 62½ cents to $1 00. Orders should be addressed to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Harper's New Monthly Magazine,

No. 1 published June 1, 1850.

PROSPECTUS.—The design of the Publishers in issuing this work, is to place within the reach of the great mass of American people the unbounded treasures of the Periodical Literature of the present day. Periodicals enlist much of the literary talent and creative genius of the age. The best writers in every nation, devote themselves mainly to the Reviews, Magazines, and Newspapers. Through the pages of these, the most powerful historical essays, the most elaborate critical disquisitions, the most exquisite delineations of manners and of Nature, the highest Poetry, and the most brilliant Wit, have, within the last ten years, found their way to the public heart.

The ablest and best productions of Lamartine, Dickens, Alison, Lever, Bulwer, Croly, and Macauley, are found in Reviews, Newspapers, and Magazines. Their productions, however, intermingled with much that is of merely local and transient interest, are scattered through scores of periodicals, so as to make it obviously impossible that, under present circumstances, any considerable number even of the reading public, and much more, that the great mass of the community, should have an opportunity of becoming familiar with them.

The Publishers of the New Monthly Magazine intend to remedy this evil, and to place such of the Periodical Literature of the day, as has commanding interest, in the hands of all who have the slightest desire to become acquainted with it. Each number of their Magazine will contain 144 pages octavo, in double columns. The volume of a single year, therefore, will present nearly 2,000 pages of the choicest of the Miscellaneous Literature of the age. The Magazine will transfer to its pages, as rapidly as they may be issued, the continuous tales of Dickens, Bulwer, Croly, Lever, Warren, and other distinguished contributors to British Periodicals; articles of commanding interest from all the leading Quarterly Reviews of both Great Britain and the United States; critical notices of the publications of the day; speeches and addresses of distinguished men upon topics of universal interest; notices of events in Science, Literature, and Art, in which the people at large have an interest, &c., &c. Special regard will be had to such articles as relate to the economy of social life, or tend to promote in any way the well-being of those who are engaged in any department of productive activity. A carefully prepared Fashion plate, and other pictorial illustrations, will accompany each number.

This Magazine is not intended exclusively for any class of readers. The Publishers have at their command the exhaustless resources of current Periodical Literature in all its departments. They have the aid of editors in whom both they and the public confide. They have no doubt that, by an intelligent use of these appliances, they can present a monthly compendium of the periodical productions of the day which no one would willingly be without; and they intend to publish it at so low a rate that its cost shall not prevent its making its way into the hands and family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States.

TERMS—$3 a year, or 25 cents a number. The work may be obtained of Booksellers and Periodical Agents, and of the Publishers.

Liberal arrangements will be made with the Trade and with Agents for extra efforts in circulating the work, and specimen numbers will be supplied gratuitously for canvassers.

REV. DR. PHELPS ON "THE KNOCKINGS."

To the Editors of the New York Observer:

Public attention has been called of late to certain strange manifestations, which have been denominated "Mysterious Knockings." They first began to attract attention in the City of Rochester, between two to three years ago. Since that time, similar manifestations have been made in the Cities of Auburn, Syracuse, and in other places in Western New York, and recently in several places in Ohio, New Jersey, Connecticut and Massachusetts. For several weeks past, something of the same character has been witnessed at my house, (Stratford, Ct.) It commenced on the 10th of March last, and continued, with slight interruptions, from two or three months. For the first five or six weeks, no communications were made that we could understand; but the phenomena consisted in the moving of furniture in a manner that could not be accounted for. Knives, forks, spoons, nails, blocks of wood, &c., were thrown in different directions about the house. They were seen to move from places and in directions which made it certain that no visible power existed by which the motion could be produced. For days and weeks together, I watched these strange movements with all the care and caution and close attention which I could bestow. I witnessed them hundreds and hundreds of times, and I know that in hundreds of instances they took place when there was no visible power by which the motion could have been produced. Scores of persons, of the first standing in the community, whose education, general intelligence, candor, veracity, and sound judgment, none will question, were requested to witness the phenomena, and, if possible, help us to a solution of the mystery. But as yet no such solution has been obtained. The idea that the whole was a "trick of the children"—an idea which some of the papers have endeavored with great zeal to promulgate, is to every one who is acquainted with the facts as stupid as it is false and injurious. The statement, too, which some of the papers have reiterated so often, that "the mystery was found out," is, I regret to say, untrue. With the most thorough investigation which I have been able to bestow upon it, aided by gentlemen of the best talents, intelligence and sound judgment, in this, and in many neighboring towns, the cause of these strange phenomena remain yet undiscovered.

About the middle of April, a gentleman who was spending the night at my house, proposed to try the method of interrogation which had been adopted in Western New York, and to our utter astonishment, a series of responses were returned, from which the inference was irresistible that they must have been produced by a being which possessed intelligence. For several weeks communications were made in this way relating almost wholly to a matter in which certain members of the family are supposed to have an interest; at the same time the other manifestations continued, and very great annoyance was experienced. The mode of communication was by some persons repeating the alphabet, and the words to be uttered were indicated by a rap from some invisible agent. I tried, by all the methods I could devise, to find what the power was by which the rapping was produced. I have heard it hundreds of times, and have done my best to ascertain the cause; but as yet I have not succeeded. I have been often asked if I believed it was the work of spirits. I have as often replied, that I do not know what it is. I have never seen a spirit, and I do not know what a spirit could do if it would, or what it would do if it could. The facts, however, are of such a nature, and have transpired under such circumstances, as to render the idea of trick or designed deception wholly inadmissible. Still, however, I have become fully satisfied that no reliance whatever is to be be placed on these communications, either as a source of valuable information, or as a means of acquiring truth. I speak of what has transpired at my house, and I have the fullest confidence, that if it is the work of spirits, it is the work of wicked spirits. Indeed, they profess to be wicked persons in a state of torment, seeking a mitigation of their torment, by redressing the wrongs of which they were guilty in life. I have watched the progress of this matter with great care, and have done the best in my power to learn what these strange things mean; and although I have not yet been able to ascertain the cause, I am satisfied that their communications are wholly worthless. They are often contradictory—often prove false—frequently trifling and nonsensical, and more in character with what might be expected of a company of loafers on a spree, than with what might be expected from spirits returned from the world of retribution, to "tell the secrets of their prison-house."

Similar manifestations are now being made in many other parts of the country. According to information which I suppose to be authentic, they are witnessed in from 150 to 200 different places at the present time. In many of these places, they are said to advance ideas on the doctrines of religion, wholly at variance with the teachings of the Bible, and subversive of many essential truths which the Bible reveals. Under an impression that whatever is communicated by a spirit must be true, many persons are receiving these communications as the truth of God—as a new revelation from the spirit-world. But it should be remembered, that there is no proof that what purports to be a revelation from spirits, is the work of spirits at all. The most that can be said is, that we do not yet know how or by whom these communications are made. If they are made by spirits, we have no proof that they are good spirits. The presumption is that they are bad spirits—lying spirits. At my house they often accused each other of lying—contradicted at one time what they affirmed at another—inflicted injury on property in the in the most wanton manner, and have given throughout, conclusive evidence that the discipline of hell which they profess to have experienced for several years, has as yet been wholly ineffectual in improving their characters, and qualifying them for the higher sphere," for which many suppose that the discipline after death is a preparation.

I cannot now say to what conclusions future developments may lead me; but my present impression is, that the whole thing, so far as the transactions in this place are concerned, is to be set down among those devices of Satan, by which he is promoting his work of destroying souls; and my chief object in this communication to the public at this time is, to caution all who would error, against trusting to these pretended revelations. I have had a better opportunity than most men to witness them and to judge of their claims, and I have full confidence that the opinions I have expressed will be found to be correct. I will merely add, that for some weeks past these annoyances at my house have been subsiding, and now, as I hope, have ceased altogether.

Yours respectfully,
ELIAKUM PHELPS.

Stratford, June 20, 1850.

LIVE FREIGHT FROM THE EAST.

The steamer Ripon, which recently brought the East India Embassy from Alexandria to Southampton, had on board a quantity of live freight, which is described as follows by an English paper:—

"The Ripon brought home a collection of birds and beasts from Ethiopia, Abyssinia, and other parts of the world. There were a fine young lion and leopard, a wild hog, a pair of pelicans, three eagles, a gazelle, three lynxes, two musk cats, a Sahara ibex (a goat with magnificent horns), a number of kangaroo rats, smaller than English mice, of a very light brown color, and remarkable for the length of their hind as compared with their fore legs, several Cashmere goats, a wild cat rather larger than a domestic one, marked like a leopard, with a beautiful head. There were also a number of venomous serpents and gigantic lizards; several of the cobra capellas were as big as a man's wrist. The beasts, birds, and reptiles, were attended to by several grim and picturesque-looking Arabs and Abyssinians, many of the former with large grisly beards. Among them were two African serpent charmers; one of the latter was a lad, a strange little shriveled-faced fellow, who caused much amusement by his comic manners, his grotesque dress, and daring handling of the beasts and reptiles. In each of his ears were two brass bed-curtain rings, his trowsers did not reach below his knees, and he wore a pair of large Wellington boots. His legs and boots appeared like two mahogany posts in a pair of leathern buckets. He played with and teased the most savage of the beasts and reptiles, with the most daring intrepidity; but the most extraordinary performances of this youthful charmer were with the venomous serpents, at the request of the Admiralty agent; and for the trifling backsheesh of a silver sixpence, for which he made a profound and slave-like salaam, he exhibited his power over the serpent tribe to the writer of this notice when he went on board the Ripon, in Southampton docks.

He took out the cobra capellas from a box, fondled with them, kissed their heads and mouths, held them in his mouth, irritated them apparently to madness by scratching them on the back, and even suffered them to bite him without experiencing any apparent injury. It was a singular sight to see one of these serpents irritated, standing firmly on a small portion of his tail, while his body was forming graceful curves, and it was preparing to spring upon the boy with its mouth open and its fangs quivering.

The greatest curiosity, however, brought by the Ripon, was the Hippopotamus. The one brought home in the Ripon is a male specimen, in good health, about ten months old, and 500 lbs weight. It fed on milk and rice, about 80 pints daily of the former, and the latter was consumed both boiled and raw. A number of cows and goats were kept on board the Ripon to supply the milk."

UNROLLING A MUMMY.

A London paper says that on Monday afternoon, June 10, a large party of noblemen and gentlemen, consisting for the most part of Fellows of the Society of Antiquaries, assembled at Lord Londesborough's mansion in Picadilly, for the purpose of witnessing the interesting process of unrolling a mummy which had been recently brought from Thebes by M. Arden. The specimen was a very perfect one, and the richness of the case, with its gold embellishments and hieroglyphical characters, led to the belief that the investigation of the body would reveal certain peculiarities not commonly met with in mummies of Egyptain preparation. The inscription on the external surface of the case was read thus: "Anchenhesi," or, "She who lives by Isis," thus at once determining the sex of the individual. Mr. Birch, previous to the ceremony of the denudation of the body, read a short historical sketch, based upon the authority of ancient writers (Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus,) but corrected by modern investigation and research, of the system adopted by the Egyptians in the important but complicated and expensive process of preserving their dead. The dusty labor of stripping off the family rags from this very brittle and bituminous old lady, occupied the anxious antiquaries for nearly an hour, during which time many speculations were hazarded as to the result of the examination; for it happens often, that nothing beyond the materials used in the process are found enrolled with the body. The first discovery, however, was that of the dorsal strap of leather extending in a chevron shape from the cape of the neck to the lower part of the ribs, the lateral extremities being broader, and inscribed with certain characters descriptive of the family or individual rank, &c. of the deceased. These pieces were carefully preserved, but they did not appear to be of sufficient extent to lead to any important result. Presently after, a roll of papyrus was brought to light, inscribed with portions of the Egyptian ritual. The body being exposed, and the planch incision laid bare, the tin plate covering was removed, and some further careful exploration revealed a very unusual feature, namely, a silver plate inscribed with an eye, symbolical of the sun, over the region of the heart. The hands, on removal, proved to have been prepared with great care, all the fingers being encased in silver previous to the application of the coating of bitumen. The figure of Hapi or Apis was also found enveloped in linen bandages between the legs, and some grains of wheat were gathered from the folds of the mummy. The black process had been used, and from the abundant rolls, as well as from the objects above enumerated, it was thought that the lady thus unceremoniously broken up for the delectation of modern antiquaries was one of wealth and rank, who lived from one thousand to twelve hundred years before Christ, or about three thousand years from the present time.

SMUGGLING TEA IN POLAND.

The annual destruction of contraband tea has just taken place in Suwalki, in Russian Poland; 25,000 pounds were burned on this occasion. Of all the articles proscribed by the Russian Customs on the German frontier, tea is the most rigorously excluded. No people consume proportionally more tea than the Russians of all classes. If imported from Germany, it is "sea-borne," and can be sold at less than half the price of the caravan tea, imported overland by Russian merchants. To protect the trade, the introduction of tea from the west of Europe is prohibited; but the profits being large, the contraband trade increased, and the Russian custom-house officers themselves were generally understood to connive at it, taking a share of the proceeds. The practice was for the Government to give a premium of 20 silver gröschen (2s. English) for every pound of the article seized; the tea so confiscated was then sold, under the condition that the purchaser should carry it again to the Prussian side of the frontier for consumption, the transport being made under convoy of Russian soldiers. But it was soon discovered, that the same tea was constantly brought back, to be seized again for the sake of the premium, which was worth so much the more that it was always paid immediately and without deduction. The Government therefore changed its system, and ordered all tea seized on the frontier to be burnt, the premium on the capture remaining as before. This regulation has created another kind of fraud. The Russian officers, if they chance to make a real seizure, know their business far too well to destroy what sells at an enormous profit. A stock of packets sealed and labeled like the genuine parcels is always ready to be substituted for them; they contain dried leaves, or tea of the most worthless kind, and from 20,000 to 40,000 pounds of this trash is burned with due official form every year. The real packets go into the interior for consumption. On the Prussian side of the frontier there are regular establishments for the sale and preparation of tea intended to be seized, and the appearance of a skirmish between the soldiers and smugglers is often gone through, when both parties perfectly understand each other, and share the premium between them. In the same manner, manufactories of cloth have been established in East Prussia, that work exclusively for the contraband trade created by Russian prohibitions.

MANUFACTURES IN PROVIDENCE, R. I.

According to the carefully prepared statistics of a gentleman in Providence, there are in that city four bleaching and calendering establishments, bleaching 18 tons of cotton cloth per day, including printing cloths, and employing 500 hands. There are four cotton mills of 34,000 spindles, which make 58,000 yards of cloth per week, employing 730 hands. Two woolen mills manufacture 375,000 yards of satinets and jeans, consuming 126,000 pounds of wool annually—employing 475 hands. Fourteen furnaces, consuming 5,000 tons of pig iron for machinery, turn out 14,000 parlor, cooking and counting-room stoves, and 550 plows, employing 272 hands. There are three steam-engine establishments, for building steam-engines, employing 240 hands. One rolling-mill employs 275 hands, makes 30 tons railroad iron and three tons of wire per day from pigs and blooms. One edge-tool, nut and washer factory, manufactures annually 31,200 dozen plane-irons, 100 tuns pick-axes and other forges—95 hands. One factory for manufacturing shoe-ties, corset-lacings and braid—employs 37 hands, and consumes 1,200 pounds of cotton per week. Four planing machines plane 10,000,000 feet of lumber annually; make 75,000 boxes for goods, cradles and sofas, and 100,000 sash-lights—employ 400 hands. Eight engraving shops for engraving copper rolls for printing cloths—80 hands. Three butt hinge factories employ 30 hands, and manufacture annually 100,000 dozen hinges. There are in the city five brass foundries, and seventeen tin and sheet iron shops; 16,000 weaver's reeds are manufactured from steel wire; 1,200 men are employed in making cotton and woolen machinery; 500 house carpenters, and 350 stone and brick masons, here find employment. There are 65 steam engines in operation. There is paid annually for labor in the manufacture of jewelry over $100,000. [Salem Gazette.

OPENING OF GOETHE'S PAPERS.

It is known that Goethe kept back from his cotemporaries a certain portion of his papers and letters. He committed these literary treasures to the Government in 1827, with the direction that they should be opened in the year 1850. The time was up on the 17th of May, and the heirs of the Goethe and Schiller families—for the poet had bequeathed them by his will to both—made their appearance at Weimar, in pursuance of an official summons from the Government, to take possession of the bequest. Not without deep emotion did the sons, the daughters, and the grand-children of the two great potentates of German Song take each other by the hand in that consecrated city. The influence of various circumstances had removed both families from the soil of Weimar. On one side were invited the eldest son, the eldest daughter of Schiller, and the widow of Ernst Schiller; on the other, Goethe's daughter-in-law, and the two grand-children, Walter and Wolfgang, who had come from Vienna, their present residence. Karl Schiller is head Forest-Master in Würtemburg. Madame von Gluchen was taken sick on the way, and her husband, who had preceded her, went back. Madame Junot was present, with Madame Goethe, at the opening, besides Karl Schiller and the grand-children of Goethe. The closed box contained the complete correspondence between Goethe and Schiller. According to a codicil to Goethe's will, it is to be published in full. It is entirely prepared for the press. Many of the letters, especially Schiller's, are autographs.

THE OVERLAND EMIGRANTS.—The St. Louis Union says:—A gentleman who arrived in town on Tuesday, from Fort Laramie, estimates the number of wagons that passed over that route to California, at 13,000; pack animals at 3,000; footmen 500; wheelbarrow-men 3—a Scotchman, a German, and an Irishman. The health of the emigrants was good. He counted but six graves by the way-side, while coming in, and of their occupants four had been killed accidentally. If this estimate of wagons is correct, the number of emigrants he met can scarcely fall short of 53,000. There are probably now on the plains, en route for California, between 70,000 and 80,000 persons.'

TREASURE TROVE.

A few days since, (says the Delaware State Journal,) a poor but honest laborer, named William Shaw, while examining an old uninhabited brick building in Appoquinimink Hundred, near Commercial Corner, thrust his handspike into the frame of one of the windows and gave it a wrench, when a perfect shower of gold coin, of English stamp, came pouring down upon him, to his surprise and delight. Upon a further examination he finally succeeded in collecting seven hundred and eighty dollars, when his impatience and eagerness to herald the good news impelled him to hasten to a neighbor and make it known, who hastened to the spot, secured about three hundred dollars for himself, making in all about one thousand dollars. These two kept the secret for a time, but Shaw said he did not feel as though he ought to keep the gold, and therefore made it known to one or two gentlemen in the neighborhood. The owner of the house was informed of the fact, whereupon the matter was left to three referees to determine whether the finder or the owner of the building was entitled to the treasure. In the meantime the gold is deposited in the Smyrna Bank.

The Journal adds, that the house was erected and occupied by Rev. Mr. Reading, Rector of St. Ann's Church, in the above-named district, who adhered to the royal cause during the Revolution, and rendered himself thereby odious to the neighbors, staunch republicans all, who threatened to burn his house and destroy his life. He died very suddenly, and it is supposed that he secreted the treasure in a moment of fear. One cannot but be struck by, and commend, the honorable scruples of good and honest William Shaw.

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE.—On the 4th of June the North American pilot-boat Enterprise, 5½ tons burthen, arrived at San Juan of Nicaragua, commanded by Captain Benjamin Butler, with a Mr. Gregg, as crew. The energy of the Americans cannot better be illustrated than by giving a short account of what has happened to this boat. Constructed by themselves, some forty miles from any river, in the interior of Wisconsin, she was brought on a wagon to Galena, some 1,800 miles up the Mississippi, where the launching took place with all pomp, she having had even a band of music on board. After descending the river, at New Orleans she was furnished with register, bill of health, &c., and was duly cleared on the 24th of February for California, via San Juan, Granada, and Realejo. An accident to the helm, however, obliged them to put into Mantua, a small sea port of Cuba, where she was detained 42 days, on suspicion of being a spy to some secret expedition, and not until the 4th of April was she permitted to leave the Island. They have touched at various places on the coast of Yucatan and Honduras, without having forgotten to make a visit to his Majesty the King of Mosquito at Bluefields! Their intention is to ascend the San Juan River to Lake Nicaragua, make an attempt to push her into Lake Managua, and from thence take her on wheels overland to Realejo on the Pacific, the distance not being more than 18 or 20 miles. Once at this place, all difficulties will be over, and in due time she will arrive at San Francisco. This vanguard is but the beginning (in miniature) of what the contemplated inter-ocean canal will do, and it is believed that such indomitable energy will gain for them the sympathies of the people they may meet during their arduous undertaking.

THE THIRTEENTH YEAR OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—It was yesterday, says the South Australian Gazette of the 29th of December last, thirteen years, since the writer of these lines, in his official capacity as Clerk of the Council, read to about two hundred persons, then nearly the entire popoulation, standing around or in the shade of a gum tree on the plain of Glenelg, still to be seen there—a large crooked arch, remarkable for its appearance—His Majesty's Proclamation establishing South Australia the only free British Province of New Holland. A dozen or so of drunken marines of H. M. S. "Buffalo" discharged several muskets in honor of the occasion; a table manufactured impromptu, out of boards supported on barrels—salt beef, salt pork, and an indifferent ham, a few bottles of porter or ale, and, horosco referens, about the same quantity of port or sherry from crypts of the "Buffalo," completed the official banquet which graced the advent of British rule to the shores of South Australia.

Yesterday thirteen years, there were two hundred Europeans, two horses, two mules, and one cow, in South Australia. Yesterday, there were in the same Province fifty-two thousand British subjects, occupying and cultivating one million of acres of land; raising wheat and all grains and fruits in absolute profusion; exporting produce of grain, wool, copper, silver, lead, gum, oils, etc., of the annual value of upwards of £800,000, and importing in British manufactures nearly an equal amount.

FALLING OF TABLE ROCK.—The Buffalo Courier of July 1st, says: The falling of Table Rock at Niagara Falls, on Saturday last, was an event which has been prognosticated from time immemorial, though the precise period at which the affair was to come off was not designated. The portion that fell was from 150 to 200 feet long and from 30 to 70 feet broad, making an irregular semicircle, the general conformation of which is probably well remembered by those who have been on the spot. It was the favorite point for observation. The noise occasioned by the crash was heard at the distance of 3 miles, though many in the village on the American side heard nothing of it. It is a very fortunate circumstance that the event took place just at dinner time when most of the visitors were at the Hotels. No lives were lost. A carriage from which the horses had been detached stood upon the rock, and a boy was seated inside. He felt the rock giving way, and had barely time to get out and rush to the edge that did not fall before the whole immense mass was precipitated into the chasm below. The only thing therefore which we are called on editorially to deplore, is the loss of the old hack. That can never be recovered.

AN ACT OF HEROISM.—The following incident is recorded of the pilot of the steamer Griffith, who fell a victim to his own heroism:—

Mr. Holly, of Missouri, informed us, that when the flames were making rapidly toward the pilot-house of the Griffith, he heard some one, the mate, he thinks, inquire of the man at the wheel if he would "stand to his post." The man gave a hearty response of "I will!" This directed his attention to the wheelman, and he watched his bearing; when the boat stopped, he stood there unmoved, firmly grasping the wheel, completely enveloped in flames. Mr. Holly supposed he must have been burned up; but, it appears, after the boat ceased to move, he passed through the flames and overboard. His body was found badly burned. This noblest of heroes, who could thus stand by his post and voluntarily throw away his own life, in the hope of saving others from death, was Richard Mann. No tomb deserves a nobler monument than his.

POPULATION OF BOSTON.—The city of Boston has just completed a census on its own hook, in advance of that taken by the Federal Government. Mr. George Adams, who has taken the census, communicates to the Atlas the following results:—

Total population,	138,788	Irish born,	55,000
Native born,	75,459	Other Foreign,	10,359
Total born out of the United States,			63,329

Including the children born of foreigners since their arrival in this country, it can hardly be doubted that the City of Notions is to-day inhabited in greater part by those improperly termed "foreigners"—that is, cherishing the attachments and sympathizing in the convulsions of the Old World. There are 2,112 of the colored or African race in Boston, mainly living in the VIth Ward, where there are comparatively few Irish. The colored race has not quite doubled since 1800. The population of Boston has more than doubled within the last twenty years.

TRIALS FOR AIDING THE ESCAPE OF FUGITIVE SLAVES.—The Burlington (Iowa) Telegraph, of the 11th of June, contains the result of a trial just had in an action brought in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa, by Ruell Daggs, of Clark County, Missouri, plaintiff, against Elihu Frazier and four other defendants, for harboring, concealing, and preventing the arrest of plaintiff's slaves, who had absconded into Iowa. The slaves were two men, one woman, and two small children. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,900.

In the Indiana State Sentinel of the 15th June, received by the same mail, we observe the account of a similar trial had before Judge McLean in the Circuit Court of the United States. The action was brought by John Norris, of Kentucky, against eight residents of Michigan. In this case the number of slaves was four, and the damages given by the jury $3,856. [Republic.

LAYARD'S EXPLORATIONS.—Letters have been received from M. Layard so late as the 10th of April, and dated from Arbarn, on the Khabour. The last accounts from this quarter mentioned Mr. Layard's purpose of penetrating into the Desert, which he has now done, and explored for three weeks, meeting with numerous traces of ancient population, though not so productive of antiquities as was hoped for. His present site, however, is richer in archæological remains, and is important, as these are undoubtedly Assyrian, and thus establish the fact of the extent of that empire. Two winged bulls and other fragments have been discovered among the ruins. The country around is described as beautiful. The meadows rich in herbage, and the banks of the Khabour literally gemmed with flowers. Mr. Layard was desirous to examine this river to its mouth; but the Arabs in that direction were hostile to those whom he ranked among his friends, and amid whose dromedaries, flocks and tents he was located. The Sheikh and his ladies and all the tribe were kind and hospitable.

LEAD IN ARKANSAS.—The Little Rock Democrat mentions an extensive lead mine recently found in Jefferson county, between the Red and Yellow bluffs, about five miles from the river. This discovery confirms the tradition of extensive deposits of lead ore being in the vicinity where this specimen was found. Many years since, it is said, that a settler being out on a hunting excursion, discovered a large bed of mineral exposed in the cavity caused by the uprooting of a large tree. This hunter usually supplied himself with lead from this vein, but dying a few years since without leaving any memorandum of its locality, all trace of it was lost, until the mine was re-discovered by a party of mineral hunters a few days since.

It is too often the case, that familiarity with objects of beauty or grandeur, both in the physical and moral world, weakens the impression they at first produce. A canny Scotch tradesman of Edinburgh visited London while Adam Smith was in the zenith of his fame. He was much surprised to find the plain old gentleman a great man, "It can't be so—don't I see him every day when I am at home?"

Mr. Lawry, superintendent of the Wesleyan Missions in New-Zealand, gives a shocking account of the consumption of human flesh in the Fejee Islands. Mr. Leyth records that Ravatee, one of the principal chiefs of the Rakirajk, showed him, about a mile out of the town, a row of stones by which his father had kept count of all persons eaten by himself and father; they amounted to 872.

By the Texas papers, we learn that a fight took place thirty miles from Corpus Christi, between Captain Ford's rangers and the Camanche Indians; one man belonging to the Rangers was killed, named Wm. Gillespie. He was a cousin of Mr. Gillespie who fell in the attack on Monterey. Two of the Indians were killed, three wounded, and one taken prisoner.

A person who had been confined at the Utica Insane Asylum, and who was released on the ground of supposed recovery, appeared at one of the hotels at Saratoga last week, and had been about but a few hours, when he was discovered in the attempt of cutting his throat. Timely interference preserved him from the full commission of the deed, though he was dangerously injured.

Littell's Living Age.

PROSPECTUS.—This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope, and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contribution to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia, and Africa into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as merchants, travelers, and politicians, with all parts of the world; so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening, through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selections; and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive to their wives and children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste.

TERMS.—The Living Age is published every Saturday; price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

☞ To insure regularity in mailing the work, orders should be addressed to the office of publication.

CLUBS, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:

Four copies for	$20 00
Nine " "	40 00
Twelve " "	50 00

Complete sets, in 24 volumes, to the end of March, 1850, handsomely bound, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principal cities free of expense of freight, are for sale at forty-eight dollars.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Judge Story—Chancellor Kent—President Adams.

I have read the prospectus of "The Living Age" with great pleasure, and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more; it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character. JOSEPH STORY.

CAMBRIDGE, April 24, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of your work, and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit, and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day. JAMES KENT.

NEW YORK, May 7, 1844.

Of all the periodical journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

PRACTICAL TEXTS.

"And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," is the language of dependence addressed to our Heavenly Father. But this language is equally appropriate for a dependent child to address to his earthly parent, who is under imperative obligation to guide and protect his offspring. By a natural, inherited right, the child, if neglected and abandoned, if unprotected from the blighting influence of the miasma of sin, if unshielded from the asper quiver of infidelity and atheism, may cry out and demand of the parent, "Lead me not into temptation, but deliver me from evil!"

Nor is it sufficient, that the parent himself merely abstains from "leading into temptation," or delivers from the snares of evil after the child has been entrapped. No; he is equally obligated always to look to and act for the future as well as the present welfare of his child, and to throw around him such influences and inducements, during all those years when the mind, the sympathies, and the affections, are so "keenly alive" to every impulse, and so susceptible of influence and impression, as shall enable him to resist all temptations to sin, and avoid all evil. This the child may demand as a right, and herein may be seen the highest duty of the parent to his offspring.

That parent or guardian who, though he would not lead his child to the intoxicating cup, though he would not theoretically teach profanity, or other vices, yet neglects to teach morals, virtue and truth, or to engage the affections and sympathies, and direct them towards worthy objects, and thus permits intemperance and error to win and control, is held equally guilty at the bar of Reason and before God.

Society is a family, the children and youth of which demand of the aged and experienced, as their guardians, to recognize this prayer in its most comprehensive application. Here, society being obligated to yield and do all and whatever is for the highest good, is bound to use every necessary means to provide for the useful employment of all, and for the physical, intellectual, and moral education of the youth; to suppress wrong and eradicate vice; to remove any and every thing which has a tendency to corrupt, and thus to "lead not into temptation, but deliver from evil."

The Church is only a particular organization of society, for specific purposes, promising additional advantages and encouragements to the practice of virtue, and protection and watchcare, especially over its younger members. It is a family, the laws of which obligate the fathers, the experienced, the wise and strong, faithfully to watch over all the wants, physical and spiritual, of the youth and "weak," guarding against all the encroachments of vice and avenues to corruption, providing for their intellectual culture and moral development, and thus, by every possible means, care and effort, to animate such sentiments, to inspire such principles; and inculcate such doctrines and truths, as shall most fully and wisely train up and qualify for usefulness and for God. Here, the youth, throughout the whole period of mental, moral, and spiritual awakening, in their aspirations and graspings for something to satisfy the soul, implore that they be not "led into temptation, but delivered from evil." As they awake to the realities of life, to the innumerable avenues to corruption and inducements to apostacy, conscious of their own immaturity and frailty, their earnest invocation to the church is, Throw around us such advantages and influences as shall remove all temptation to apostacy, and instruct us in "wisdom and understanding," in truth and godliness. This, however, they do not ask as a charity offering, but they demand it as an inalienable, God-given right. Is the intoxicating bowl set before them, it is their right to demand its removal, or that they be removed from it. Are there strong inducements to reject truth, and to violate the Divine precepts, the church is obligated to present superior inducements to the reception of truth, and to compliance with the laws of God. A. C. S.

HINTS ABOUT OBITUARY NOTICES.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I have often thought it would be well for correspondents who furnish obituary articles for your paper, to be a little more particular in their preparation, especially such as relate to females and children, or young persons, as it frequently happens, that they are not recognized by their names, apart from the husband and father, and hence we are often left in the dark as to the families to which they belong. I find a case in point in your last paper, in the obituary of SALLY LEE, aged 33 years, without the distinguishing marks of Miss or Mrs. or any other name, though it is afterwards said that she had a husband and two children. Such faults or errors are common, and chargeable to no one but the writers—the editors or printers having no more means of correcting the error than the reader, or any one else who never heard of the family.

Obituary articles, if well written, are always interesting and acceptable; and I have never, to my knowledge, heard a complaint of their being tedious or too lengthy. When our friends depart, we are interested to hear something of their last moments—what their disease, whether painful and distressing or otherwise—and, above all, something of the exercises of their minds at the approach of the solemn and trying hour, whether they were reconciled to the will of their heavenly Father, and enjoyed a well-grounded hope of eternal life beyond the grave. THE IMPORTANCE OF SABBATH SCHOOLS.

The presentation of Divine truth to the minds of the people, is the means ordained of Heaven for the conversion and salvation of souls. Where Sabbath Schools are wisely conducted, and children and youth are faithfully instructed in them, the blessing of God may be expected. Children come into the world ignorant, and need instruction. They have souls of priceless worth. They have interests to be secured that reach far beyond the present life. They are destined, if they continue in the present state of being till mature years, to exert a mighty influence for weal or wo. And if their lives here should be cut short, they most certainly will need the knowledge of salvation. Yes; they ought to be trained for usefulness and heaven. Now is a favorable time to instruct them. Their minds are not yet preoccupied with error to that extent which they may be in after years. Their habits have not become confirmed. The mind is now tender, and susceptible of religious impressions. Truth now lodged in the mind may never be lost. How desirable, then, that children should, from early life, "know the Scriptures, which are able to make them wise unto salvation, through faith in Christ." Parents, especially, ought to teach their children diligently the word of the Lord, and seek their spiritual good. But many parents do not, and will not, attend to these things; and some are poorly qualified to do it. In many instances this is their own fault. Much may be done for the rising generation in Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. Here the Bible is studied and its meaning is explained so as to be understood by children. Here the great truths of Revelation, the sinfulness of our race, the way of life and salvation through Christ, the duty and destiny of mankind, are unfolded to the mind. Here the sense of obligation to God is increased. Here may be expected the convicting and converting influences of the Holy Spirit. Here instruction is imparted that may be very useful in after life to those who receive it. And when we consider how uncertain life is, how indispensible does early religious instruction appear? A good Sabbath School is a nursery of piety—a place where souls may be trained for usefulness and for heaven. While others are actively engaged in giving their youth biblical instruction, why should not Sabbath-keepers engage in the work? Do not our children need instruction as well as others? And will they not need scripture knowledge, in order to prepare them, in after times, to teach others—to oppose error and defend the truth? Truly, it seems to me that those who are ready writers should present their thoughts, through the "Recorder," on this important subject; that ministers should stir up their people to engage in this work; that every Christian, young and old, male and female, should be interested in it; that those who feel unqualified to teach, should begin to study the Scriptures for the purpose of becoming able to teach, and all unitedly come up to the work of the Lord, and thus aid in saving the young from ignorance, error and vice, and in making ready a people for the Lord. C. A. O.

RELIGIOUS CONDITION OF FLORIDA.—The Bible Society's Record says that Florida contains about 60,000 square miles, and has a sea-coast of more than 1,000 miles. Its present population is not far from 80,000. This population is not collected in towns nor in a few counties. It is diffused over more than 20,000 square miles. Only a few of the counties are thickly settled. Many contain but a few hundred inhabitants, and others but a few families. To visit all these widely scattered families is manifestly a laborious work. If the Bible is to be placed in each family, the visitor will frequently be obliged to travel 20, 30, or 40 miles from one habitation to reach the next family. But notwithstanding the toil, self-denial and expense necessary to accomplish this work, it is not to be neglected. These persons have souls to be saved or lost, and it is our duty to give them the Bible. In the most favored portions of the State there is, in the opinion of those who have the best means of forming an opinion, great destitution. In other sections it is feared that from half to three-fourths of the families are living without the Bible.

DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT.

ZACHARY TAYLOR, the Twelfth President of the United States, died at Washington, on the evening of July 9th, at 35 minutes past 10 o'clock, after a painful illness of little more than five days. His disease began with cholera morbus, which passed into a billious remittent fever. His death was calm and peaceful. The Vice President, Cabinet, Mayor, Marshal of the District, the attending physicians, and his family, surrounded the bed. His last words were: "I am prepared—I have endeavored to do my duty." The following sketch of his character and public services, we copy from the New York Tribune of July 10:—

Gen TAYLOR had endeared himself to the American people to a degree which few public men ever attain. The cause of this lay in the great goodness of his heart, the exceeding sincerity of his character, in his transparent common sense, so broad and strong as to amount to wisdom, in a firmness that faced every danger, and shunned no responsibility, and in a patriotism and sense of honor which threw an almost chivalrous halo over the sturdy elements of his nature. Not a statesman by genius or by habit, he brought to the Presidency a sound practical judgment, which often proved more reliable than the opinions of those long versed in political affairs. A Southern man and a slaveholder, his mind was above the narrow prejudices of district and class, and steadily aimed at the good of the nation as a whole. He felt as the President of the American people, and instinctively apprehended the destiny of the Republic. Not endowed with uncommon powers of reflection, he penetrated the questions brought before him as by a spontaneous faculty of insight, and having once made up his mind, did not abandon his determination. Though bred in camps and accustomed to the ranks and distinctions of military life, he never lost the readiness of his sympathies, nor experienced a diminution of that genuine sentiment of democratic equality which related him to every citizen. He was eminently a man of the People, and that from the exhaustless promptings of his own heart. He took them by the hand, he shared in their joys and their sorrows, not for any ulterior purpose, not as one descending for the moment from an eminent position, but because he felt himself foreign to no human interest or emotion. A triumphant General, counting among his battles some of the most difficult and successful of military history; elected to the Presidency without effort on his part, he never forgot that admirable native modesty which forbade him to exaggerate the value of his own services and talents, or to claim any gift or capacity which he was not fully conscious of possessing. With manners of great plainness, destitute of polish, he always conveyed the impression of a true gentleman. No man ever lived more free from vanity or littleness of every kind. He was constituted liberal, generous, manly, noble, and his life was an illustration of these characteristics. Perhaps his military achievements will be longest remembered in history, but his private character has ever seemed to us more remarkable for its loveliness, and his short civic career for its perfect uprightness, enlarged patriotism, and clear native good sense, than his exploits in the field for any of the qualities, however brilliant, which may be attributed to them. But in every respect Gen. Taylor was an American. He was a son of this Republic; whatever he was, was the product of his country and her institutions; and of the names of her great and good men, few will longer be preserved than his.

ZACHARY TAYLOR, the son of a father honorably distinguished in the Revolutionary war, was born in Orange Co., Virginia, Nov. 2, 1784. Till the age of 21, he worked on the farm of his father, but early developed a taste for military life. He was appointed 1st Lieutenant in the Seventh Infantry on May 3, 1808. In 1810 he married Miss Margaret Smith of Maryland. In 1812 he served as Captain under Gen. Harrison in the Indian war of the North-west, where in September he gained great credit for bravery and coolness in defending Fort Harrison against the savages, and received the rank of Brevet-Major in consequence. In the course of the war he further distinguished himself. When it ended, being reduced to the rank of Captain on account of the general reduction of the army, he resigned, and went back to his farm. He was reinstated as Major in 1817, and commanded for two years at Green Bay on Lake Michigan. Afterward he served mostly in the South, being scarcely ever absent from active duty. On April 19, 1819, he received the commission of Lieut. Colonel. After 1826 he was again sent to the Northwest, where he remained five years. In 1832 he was made Colonel, and served in the Black Hawk War. Afterward he was stationed at Prairie du Chien till 1836, when he was ordered to Florida, where on Dec. 25, 1836, he fought the battle of Okechobee, one of the most memorable in the annals of our Indian hostilities, which virtually put an end to the war; for this he received the brevet rank of Brigadier General. He remained in Florida till 1840, when he took command of the first department of the Army in the South-west, his headquarters being at Fort Gibson, in Arkansas. In 1845 he was ordered to the Texan frontier, in anticipation of the Mexican War, and at the beginning of August had taken up his position at Corpus Christi. On March 8, 1846, in compliance with the orders of President Polk, he began to march on the Rio Grande. The events which followed this step are too well known to require recapitulation here. The battle of Palo Alto was fought May 8, 1846, that of Resaca de la Palma the next day. Matamoros was taken May 18; on the 30th he was made Major General by brevet, and on June 29, was promoted to full rank. The attack on Monterey began Sept. 21, and was closed by the capitulation on the 24th. His great and final battle of Buena Vista was fought on Feb. 22, 1847. In all these affairs he manifested great soundness of judgment, readiness of mind, fertility of resources, mastery of the art of war, power of inspiring his subordinates not only with affection for his person, but with confidence in his skill and fortunes, as well as constant humanity toward the vanquished, and a frank dignity which won the regard of the hostile people among whom he had to command an invading army, somewhat incongruous in its elements, and difficult to be controlled.

In November, 1847, Gen. Taylor returned to the United States. He was received with the congratulatory rejoicings of the people wherever he appeared. The year before he had been nominated for the Presidency. In June, 1848, he received the nomination of the Whig Convention at Philadelphia, and in November was elected, receiving 163 electoral votes to 127 for Gen. Cass. He was inaugurated on March 5, 1849, and at his death had discharged the office of President one year, four months, and four days. Had he lived to the 24th of next November he would have been sixty-six years old.

In person, Gen. Taylor was about five feet eight inches high, with a slight tendency to corpulency. His complexion was dark, his forehead high, his features plain, but full of courage, intelligence, benevolence and good humor. His dress was always simple, and his manners made all who approached him perfectly at home.

Mrs. Taylor, the wife of his youth, still lives, though, from taste, she has not appeared in general society since her husband's elevation to the Presidency. They have had four children, one son and three daughters; one of the latter married Dr. Wood of the Army, who has been in attendance on the President during his last illness; another (now also deceased) married Senator Davis of Miss.; and the third is Mrs. Bliss, who has done the honors of the Presidential Mansion. The son is still a young man.

In this hour of universal sorrow at this great loss of the whole country and the entire people, let our prayer be that the public and the private virtues of the man whom all mourn may still lend their influence to our national councils and character, and that his noble and manly qualities may never want examples in the Republic!

MILLARD FILLMORE.

In consequence of the death of Gen. Taylor, MILLARD FILLMORE, the Vice President, becomes, of course, President of the United States. He took the oath of office on the 10th inst.—administered by Judge Cranch, in the presence of both branches of Congress. The following sketch of Mr. Fillmore's life, abridged from the Tribune, will be interesting at this time:—

Mr. Fillmore was born at Summer Hill, Cayuga Co., New York, on Jan 7, 1800, and is accordingly now a little over 50 years old. His father was a farmer in very limited circumstances. The family removed to Aurora, Erie Co., in 1819, where the father still carries on a farm of moderate dimensions. The narrow means of the father did not permit the bestowal on the son of any other than a limited common school education. When 15 years old, he was set to learn the trade of a clothier, at which he worked for four years, improving all his spare time in reading books from a little library in the village where he lived. At the age of 19 he made the acquaintance of Judge Wood, of Cayuga Co., who detected the latent talents of the young man, and induced him to study law, for which he generously furnished the means. Mr. Fillmore remained in Judge Wood's office above two years, studying with that industry and perseverance which have distinguished him through life. During this time he also taught school in the Winter months in order himself to provide for his expenses as far as possible. In 1822 he entered a law office at Buffalo, and passed a year studying and teaching, when he was admitted to the bar, and removed to Aurora to commence the practice of his profession. In 1826 he married Abigail, the daughter of Rev. Lemuel Powers; who will, no doubt, hereafter preside at the White House. Several years were now mainly employed by Mr. Fillmore in diligent judicial studies, and in the limited legal practice of a country town. In 1829 he was elected to the Assembly of New York, and for three years (during which time he removed his residence to Buffalo) held a seat in that body. Here he was remarkable for constant devotion to and unwearied industry in his duties. He took a prominent and influential part in the enactment of the law abolishing imprisonment for debt. In 1822 he was elected to the XXIIId Congress, and served creditably. In the fall of 1836 he was again returned for the same office, and acted as a Member of the Committee on Elections in the famous New Jersey 'Broad-Seal' case, and in that capacity established his reputation in the House. He was reëlected to the next Congress, and now assumed the responsible position of Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. In the duties of this post, at a trying crisis, he manifested the industry, dignity of bearing, efficient practical talent, and ability to secure the confidence of his colleagues which, had before distinguished him. His public reputation perhaps rests more upon the manner in which he filled this post in the XXVIIth Congress, than on any other portion of his career. After this, Mr. Fillmore returned to Buffalo to the practice of his profession. In 1844 he was run by the Whigs of New York for Governor, and was beaten by Silas Wright. In 1847 he was elected Controller of the State, and removed to Albany to discharge the duties of that office, which he held till February, 1849, when he resigned it, prior to his induction into the Vice Presidency, to which post he had been elevated by the Presidential election of 1849.

PEACE AS A RIVER.

Isaiah 48: 18.

BY GEORGIANA M. SYKES

Not like the cloud, whose misty fold
 Gathers around some mountain hight;
Its graceful wreaths are thin and cold,
 Ever most dim to nearest sight.
Its golden haze decks sunlight skies,
 Or glows beneath the setting day,—
But night shall dim its glorious dyes,
 The wind shall drive it far away.

Not like the shower, whose freshening drops
 Wake to new life the sun-parched day,
Whose rustle in the tall tree-tops
 Sends heart-thrills to each quivering spray:—
Though rainbows rise to span the scene,
 Though grateful songs its welcome speak,
Sinking from sight that crystal sheen
 To-morrow thou in vain may'st seek.

Not like the brook, whose onward rush,
 So full of sparkling, noisy glee,
Awoke from emulous birds a gush
 Of ringing, wild-wood estacy;—
Alas for flowers, that, on its bank,
 Hang their bright heads, and, drooping die!
The summer's sun its waters drank,
 And now its pebbly bed is dry.

Not like the wave, whose measured swell
 Breaks gently on the silver sand,
Or, gathering might beneath the wing
 Of tempests, smites the echoing strand;
Wave after wave may seek the shore,
 And on their wealth of waters urge;
A few brief hours—then turns the tide,
 And backward rolls the inconstant surge.

But like a river, calm and clear,
 A stately river, full and free,
Whose broad expanse, serenely spread,
 The blue sky's mirror well may be,
Yet with a steady current's force
 Is ever hastening to the sea:—
No vexing wind, no ebbing tide,
 No shallow sources quickly dried,
Have power to stay its onward course:
 Such is the peace thine heritage shall be,
 Peace like a RIVER gives thy God to thee.

THE WIFE OF KOSSUTH.

At the time when all was lost to the Hungarians, and each had to seek his own safety in flight, Governor Kossuth and his lady, who had accompanied her husband throughout the war, thought it best to separate, in order that one of them, if possible, might save their life, for the sake of their children, who had been left under the protection of their grandmother. The Governor determined to remain with his brave officers, still with him, and to share their fate. Madame K. informed her husband and a female friend, the wife of an officer, where she would endeavor to seek safety; and as every moment was precious, this delicate lady quickly disguised herself as a beggar; her husband gave her his signet ring, and the seal of the Government of Hungary, that these might be a passport for her in the event of her meeting with those who were friendly to their cause. Without any clothes except those on her back, she commenced her sad and fatiguing journey on foot. She traveled long, experiencing all kinds of hardships, privations and dangers. When stopped by the Austrian or Russian guards, she feigned extreme old age, and said she was in search of a little grandson who had got lost in the war; so they let her pass, little knowing the value of the prize they had in their bloody hands!

Thus she continued on, until she reached an extensive pasture country, uninhabited except by herdsmen, almost as void of intellect as the herds they guarded. Here she sought and found a resting-place. These poor serfs made her a fresh bed of straw, covered her with their cleanest sheepskins, and fed her with their brown bread; and here she remained three months, during which time the winter cold came on, and having but little covering, you may easily conceive how intensely she must have suffered. Gov. Kossuth had sent for his children, that he might take leave of them, and give them his last blessing; they were brought to him by his mother, and again taken to their home. The Austrian executioner (Haynau) had long since commenced his bloody work. Kossuth, and those with him, fled toward the Turkish frontier, to the fortress of Widden.

We cannot enumerate all the sufferings, losses, and anguish experienced by these unfortunate men during their flight; most of them, however, reached Widden. They were no sooner there, than their first thoughts were of Madame Kossuth, and her friend, the wife of the officer to whom she had communicated the place of her intended concealment, determined to seek and find her if she were still alive. She set out on her weary journey, habited in a similar guise to that of Madame Kossuth—as a beggar—and thus she passed the soldiers and guards of the enemy, until she reached the hiding-place of her friend, who had been the companion of her youth and happier days; and now they were to encounter new dangers.

The herdsmen built them a little cart, and gave them a horse, as Madame Kossuth, worn out by anxiety, privations and sufferings, was no longer able to walk; the roads had now become almost impassable, narrow and slippery on the sides of the mountains; one false step would have plunged them down into an almost bottomless abyss; but with the gallows in their rear, and their husbands before them, hope gave them courage, and onward they went. We know not what length of time they occupied in their journey; but, as it was in winter, and they had often to conceal themselves in clefts of rocks and overhanging mountains from the scouts of the enemy, it must have been a long and weary one, and when discovered, they passed for beggars, and asked for bread from their blood-thirsty foes.

They ultimately reached the town of Belgrade, where they expected to find their husbands, and a termination of their sufferings. Imagine, then, their feelings of disappointment, when they learned that not a Hungarian was there—all had been removed to Shumla. What was now to be done? They were worn out, and could proceed no further. Hope even had forsaken them. No husbands to embrace, no friends to welcome them. They decided to throw themselves upon the humanity of the Sardinian consul; they knocked at his door, which was opened by the consul himself. Two beggar women stood before him, the picture of misery and wo. He asked them what they wanted. They answered, "Food and shelter." He requested them to come in. Then the officer's lady introduced him to Madame Kossuth, wife of the President of Hungary. He could not believe it until she took from her bosom the signet ring and seal of the Government of Hungary. What followed can easily be conjectured; they were received and treated according to their rank by the kind-hearted consul; and after they were sufficiently rested, he made known their case to the Prince of Servia, who sent them his carraige-and-four, with an escort, to take them to Shumla. The weather was terribly cold, and the roads as bad as they could be; but they ultimately arrived in safety.

NEVER GRUMBLE.

It is of no use to grumble. It clears away no clouds; enlightens no darkened and questioning mind; inspires no noble purpose. Many a man has been restrained from bad deeds or impelled to good ones, by a cheerful and strong appeal out of an earnest heart; by an indignant and stout-hearted remonstrance, even, against wrong-doing. There is something in these that stirs the sensibilities, and starts the blood, and carries a man to action. Blessings on the strong word honestly spoken; rapping out like a bell stroke from the free heart, and striking upon others with an impulse that is felt! It may seem harsh, even, for the moment. But it carries with it all the feeling that lay behind it, and when it has been spoken the heart is clear, and the reaction of it on others will be but momentary. If it makes them throb, it is because it has quickened suddenly the sluggish circulation. But the steady grumble—like the dull trip down the water spout on a heavy day, that has not the liveliness to rain; like the grinding of a hearse over unbroken gravel stones; like the grating and gnarring of a machine that wants oil;—it never benefited a human spirit! It never roused one man to generous action. It never made one pulse leap livelier than before. It is positively a bad and hurtful thing to grumble. It hurts the man himself, whose habit it is; not only making him continually uncomfortable in a world which, bad as it is, gives abundant occasion for gratitude and praise, but impairing gradually the freshness and healthfulness of his mind; inducing morbidness of thought; making him gloomy, nervous, and mentally rheumatic and neuralgic; leading him to look upon society and the Church, not with the open soul that catches the sunshine as well as the cloud, and rejoices in the manifold melodies that mingle with the too frequent discords—but with the shut, glooming, self-centering soul that looks out only through glasses of green, and is forever alive to preception of discords. It hurts the man's influence, as well as his character. It repulses others from him, and prevents him from doing them the good which he might. It gives argument to the irreligious, if he be a religious man, against Christianity; and makes children associate it with querulousness and gloom. Attracting nobody, silently but really repelling all, it gradually undermines one's total influences; and leaves him an isolated, inefficient unit, in the community of men whom he might greatly benefit, perhaps, but who love warm-heartedness and life, largeness of view, fullness of spmpathy, and self-reliance. Never grumble, then! If others act against your wishes either bear it manfully and in silence, and accommodate yourself to it—like one whose principle of strength is inward and real and not factitious; or, if the inconvenience becomes oppressive, remonstrate heartily, with generous warmth. Rebuke sin, strive against it; but never GRUMBLE, at that. It will benefit nobody. It will itself be a sin. Think freely, like a man and a Christian. The warmest word will have life in it; the most energetic may be good natured. But sunshine will come from friction of pebble stones, sooner than any thing good to one's self or to others will begin to be developed from the habit of GRUMBLING. [Independent.

CANE SUGAR.

Originally the plant was found in Asia, and it was introduced into the West Indies by Columbus and his followers. In appearance it is a jointed reed of from six to twelve, or even fifteen feet high, and of various thicknesses, of which an average may be said to be two inches. From the expressed juice of this reed is the sugar derived, the canes being passed through rollers, placed sometimes perpendicularly, but more frequently horizontally, and driven either by steam, water, horse, or mule power, but much more frequently, in the West Indies, by a wind mill. The expressed juice being run down into the boiling house, it is there, undergoing a certain process to temper and cleanse it, subjected to processes of skimming in copper, or pans, the successive pans, until it reaches the boiling point in the last pan, or boiler, called in the English colonies, "the teache." By these operations the juice is cleansed, and the water evaporated; and when the granulation has proceeded to a sufficient length, it is poured into coolers, whence it is removed into hogsheads, in which it is allowed to stand for at least fourteen days, or three weeks, to allow the molasses to run out of it; after which it is ready for shipment and sale.

NEW ENGLAND INFLUENCE.—Rev. Mr. Hamlin, missionary to Turkey, writes that the influence of New England on Western Asia is exerted mainly through her missionaries. "The words 'Boston Rum' have passed into the languages of this part of the Oriental world, and the only idea which multitudes have of the city of the Puritans, is that of a vast collection of rum manufactories, capable of supplying the most distant parts of the world." He mentions facts to show the deplorable progress that intemperance is making. The Mahometans, being forbidden to drink wine, have taken to the use of rum.

The Sabbath Recorder.

DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT.

Since our last issue, the Chief Magistrate of our nation has been laid in death. The sad tidings have spread, upon wings of lightning, from Maine to Mexico; and every part of the country is now striving to do honor to the memory of the illustrious departed. The various political journals are speculating upon the probable consequences of the event; some deploring it as a great national calamity—others, probably, regarding it as a favorable opening for the accomplishment of fondly cherished schemes. The Christian, however, reflects that God rules; and, watching the signs of the times, awaits the developments of His providence, endeavoring, in the mean time, to do his duty as an advocate of that which is just and right. Perhaps there never was a time in our country's career, when it was so necessary to have a man of stern integrity, loving righteousness and hating iniquity, at the head of affairs, as at present. Never was there a time when the doctrine, that all men have unalienable rights; that, in respect thereof, all men are created equal; and that the very end of government is to give every man an opportunity for the enjoyment of those unalienable rights—was so near to being exploded in the councils of our nation. Never before did the antagonistic idea of slavery lift up such a haughty front. Never before was human slavery advocated with such unblushing impudence, as "a great moral, social, political, and religious blessing—a blessing to the slave, and a blessing to the master." These two great antagonistic principles, Freedom and Slavery—principles as wide apart as heaven and hell—are now clenched in desperate combat. Shall slavery have any more territory to riot and fatten upon?—is the great question which convulses the country. In the midst of this agitation, our President is taken away, and what direction will be given to it by his successor and cabinet advisers, is yet to be seen.

Feeling, as we do, that the great question of the day is that of Human Rights—man's right to liberty, versus the right of some other man to enslave him—we look with anxious solicitude for the developments which shall be made under the administration of President Fillmore. We have no expectation that he will take the bold and uncompromising stand which, we think, every lover of right ought to take. We do not expect to see, in his Messages, the fearless advocacy of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and of the suppression of the horrid traffic as carried on between the States. We look for no recommendations to amend those parts of the Constitution which are supposed to belie, with most infamous contradiction, the Declaration of Independence. These things we cannot look for. But may we not hope, that he will, at least, take as favorable ground as did his predecessor? May we not hope to find him true to the sentiment, that slavery cannot rightfully be extended to new realms? Heaven grant that such may be the case. The new President may not have attained the same convictions of the sin of slavery that some others have; still he cannot be altogether blind to it. Should he prove faithful to his convictions, the friends of human rights may have reason to thank God and take courage. Should he prove *un*faithful, let them not be discouraged, but implore the interposition of Him whose every attribute is a pledge that "the oppressed shall not return ashamed," and gird themselves for new contests.

We believe that General Taylor possessed as much of what is commonly called patriotism, as any other man. That he desired the welfare of his country, we have no reason to doubt. That he did not lend himself to the support of some measures which we deem inseparable from the country's best interests, may have been owing to the manner in which he was educated. If he felt not for the suffering slave, nor laid himself out with giant might to redress his wrongs, it was, probably, because his judgment had never been properly enlightened on this point. If his notions of patriotism constrained him, before his elevation to the Presidency, to lend himself as principal actor in an unrighteous, wicked, and diabolical war, simply because his superiors in authority required it, when the alternative of resigning his commission was before him, we must deplore it—we must lament that such false notions of patriotism inspired him. But when we reflect that his whole training was in that school, whose motto is, 'Our country, right or wrong'—a school, in which devotion to one's country is considered as the highest standard of moral excellence—a school, consequently, in which martial heroism and virtue can hardly fail to be viewed as synonymous terms, according to the heathenish morality of the old Greeks and Romans; when we reflect that the gospel of the Son of God has not yet sufficiently leavened this falsely called Christian country, to neutralize the poison of such heathenish morality; when, with such reflections, we estimate the character of the departed, we feel inclined to ascribe his errors to the head rather than to the heart. He was, unquestionably, a fearless, independent, straight-forward man—too proud to stoop to those contemptible tricks, by which ambitious demagogues seek to obtain popularity; at the same time, commending himself, by this very independence, to the admiration of the honest-hearted yeomanry, so that popularity, which the cunning aspirant seeks in vain to buy, was his by the free gift of the people. On the whole, he was a good President; quite as good as we could have expected from either of the great political parties which control the nation. God grant that we may never have a worse one, but as much better as the progress of our race and the cause of human rights may demand.

Upon the manner of his death, we, as conductors of a religious journal, have a word to say. In the account given to the public, we look in vain for any expression of reliance on the Lord Jesus Christ as the only Savior of lost sinners. No sense of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, no consciousness of the plague of his own heart, no conviction of his need of atoning blood, appears in his dying language. He seems rather to depart as one who rests upon his own merits. "I am prepared; I have always endeavored to do my duty"—is the only index we have of the exercises of his soul in nature's last apathy. And, from all we can gather, he seems to have referred to the discharge of his official duties. How was it with the poor old hero? Poor, we say; for, notwithstanding the weight of earthly glory that covered him as he sank in death, he was poor—poorer than a begging Lazarus—if no union was effected between his soul and the Redeemer of lost men. How was it with him whom the world delighted to honor? Did he really consider that official righteousness—patriotism—devotion to his country—was all the preparation that he needed to appear before God? Can it be possible, that no correct notions of the plan of salvation ever penetrated his mind? It is true, the ethics which are not inconsistent with war and all the routine of military life, are necessarily heathenish; and he who has, all his life, been schooled in the camp, must be expected to have experienced their contaminating influence. Still, we are wont to expect that some rays of gospel light will pierce the dark night that broods over the soldier's tent, and wake up some sense of the necessity of being born again. We expect that, in spite of the unfavorable influences by which he is surrounded, so much of divine truth will reach his heart, that there shall at least be a struggle in his dying hours—a laboring conflict of opposing principles, if not the absolute and strongly marked triumph of that which is right. Surely, surely, our revered President could not have gone down to the grave in utter ignorance of the way of life. We trust not. We cling to the hope that, in his mind, more was covered by his dying language than the bare expressions, and the connection in which they are given, would seem to imply. Perhaps, in the outgoings of his departing soul, he had some faith's view of Him, whose prerogative it was to say, "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." But we feel bound to say, that the manner of his death gives no one any good reason to say, "Let my last end be like his." O that our great men could learn to live for something besides this world.

The hero of many battles has gone down to his grave, mantled with all the glory which he could receive from men. He who "never surrendered," has yielded to the last conqueror. The nation shouted his praises; enthusiastic multitudes cheered his earthly career; the developments of eternity will show whether he stood approved before God.

WHERE ARE THE SHEPHERDS?

It appears to be the practice of some churches, when their members remove beyond the bounds of their pastor's visiting circuit, to give notice through a public paper, that unless they report themselves to the church, their names shall be dropped from the records. Is it right? Can a church, without employing other means to find out the residence or condition of the stray members of the flock, excommunicate them in this manner? Perhaps a little labor might be the means of restoring them to fellowship, even if they had become indifferent to their duty as members. Perhaps they have not been informed, properly, of the evil of non-residence, and so are not aware of the danger they incur of excommunication. Other reasons may exist why the church should not shake off its non-resident members. They are under the watch-care of the church; and, if they go astray, should be searched out, and an eye kept upon them for good. Should not the pastor visit them, or take measures to have them visited by some one else, so that their condition might be known to the church, and they included in its prayers. "How think ye? If a man have an hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth into the mountains, and seeketh that which is gone astray?" Matt. 18: 12. Otherwise, it might be said, "My sheep wandered through all the mountains, and upon every high hill; yea, my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth, and none did search or seek after them." Ezek. 34: 6. "Ye have scattered my flock, and driven them away, and have not visited them; I will visit upon you the evil of your doings, saith the Lord." Jer. 23: 2. But the case of the member, after proper dealing had by the church, will be most fearful if he be not restored; for, "if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto you as an heathen man and a publican." "Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." Matt. 18: 17, 18.

This subject is of too much importance to allow of any trifling or indifference in the administration of the law of Christ, the great Head of the Church. LUTHER.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 5.

GLASGOW, June 28th, 1850.

Loss of the Steamer Orion.

The melancholy event of the loss of the Orion, (for full accounts of which I last week sent you a "Scottish Guardian" newspaper,) excites still a painful interest here. She was one of the best of a class of vessels of high repute even in the Clyde, and which have met with no important mishap for many years. The owners are, we believe, partners in the successful transatlantic steamers bearing Cunard's name, and are regarded as attentive, prudent men of business. There seems, however, to have been great want of care in this case; the night having been fine, and no satisfactory reason having been rendered for their running at all so near to the shore, or upon rocks the existence of which was well known. Apprehension of consequences, in the numerous cases likely to arise of claims for damages, is probably influencing owners, captain, and crew, to suppress information which the public would desire to possess, and which the impending judicial investigation may extract, as the procurator fiscal is stated to have arrested the captain and the second mate, to whom, immediately, the disaster is attributed. Both are to be tried for manslaughter. Divers continue to be employed upon the wreck, and bodies are still being found of persons who, overwhelmed by the sudden rush of water, never gained the deck. The Board of Admiralty are to afford facilities in attempting to raise the vessel. The actual loss has not been ascertained, the steward's list not having been found, although he bore to land the money received on board, which he secured upon his person, but died shortly after he reached the beach. You will have observed, that a number of the passengers on board the Orion had arrived from America by the Europa, the preceding day; but I have not seen allusion to any of the lost as having belonged to the States. Among the saved is Mr. Joseph Counah, of New York, and his companion, Mr. C. Jujuot, a French gentleman, who had come from the United States; both have lost sums of money. In the lists, both of "saved" and of "lost," occur the names of persons belonging to this country, who had been visiting America, from which they had just returned. For a few days the sad event, carrying bereavement into many families, and loss otherwise into many more, spread consternation and dismay through our city. Much blame was expressed generally of the human instrumentality; but there is reason to fear that God's voice has been little heard, and His hand but little seen in the catastrophe. And oh! how uninstructive the most terrible of His providences, and how cheerless the gloom they occasion, when unaccompanied by this heavenly Interpreter's commentary!

Sunday Post-Office Movements.

The compliance of the Government with the request contained in the Address of the House of Commons to Her Majesty, has created no small stir. As the success of Lord Ashley's motion took the Government by surprise, so also has their promptness in giving that motion effect, contrary to their avowed convictions of its propriety, taken the country by surprise. Thin House though it was, when the Commons passed the resolution—500 of the members having been absent when the Address was voted—Lord John Russell says that, on such an occasion, he could only advise compliance; but he at the same time intimates it to be desirable, that the House should render it indispensable that any Address to Her Majesty be twice brought before them, for discussion, before it be carried. Hitherto this has not been the practice. But, under great profession of high obligation to respect the vote of the House, there is much appearance of a desire, on the part of the Ministry, to let the country, and the members themselves, feel the smart of what is declared to be an unwise decision, effected by a small part of their number, when, as Lord John says, so many of them voluntarily absented themselves from their duty, while they knew the question would be discussed. So, also, the Chancellor of the Exchequer "thought it quite right that the public should know what it was that they subjected themselves to." This expression of opinions and feelings was elicited by Mr. Forster, member for Berwick, having moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal so much of the Act of Parliament now in force, as prohibits the transmission of letters on the Sunday otherwise than through the Post Office. The Ministry, for the reasons assigned, and the danger to the revenue, opposed the motion, and it was not pressed to a division. But Mr. Locke has since given notice "that, on the 9th July, he should call the attention of the House to the recent resolution respecting the non-delivery of letters on Sunday, with a view to the reversal of that resolution."

In the House of Lords, also, on the 21st instant, Lord Brougham said, that as certain sums of money were annually voted, and taxation incurred, for the purpose of procuring the delivery of letters by means of the Post Office, he had grave doubts of the legality of this being discontinued on any one day of the week by Her Majesty, though requested by the Commons to do so. He trusted that this would receive the attention of the Government. The Marquis of Lansdowne, for the Ministry, avowed that he was not aware of any opinion having as yet been taken on the subject, but, he added, "the point would be taken into serious consideration." The statements seem as if imperfectly reported in the journals, but the question of legality, so mooted, probably has reference to the laws by which a jealous watchfulness is maintained against the Crown's interference, without full Parliamentary sanction, with any matter involving pecuniary expenditure. The great majority of the newspaper press is crying out lustily against the new regulation, (which was enforced last Sunday for the first time,) and, on the 20th inst., a meeting was held of the proprietors of those papers in the metropolis whose interests are most materially affected, to adopt measures to induce Parliament "to retrace their steps." With all these various appliances, and considering that restriction of Sunday labor has no countenance in the Word of God which even religious legislators can honestly with intelligence cite, there is some reason to believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be found right in the statement, when, (sustained by the "cheers" of the House,) he said, "he had no doubt that in the course of a short time many honorable members would receive such representations from their constituents as would induce them to rescind the vote." And should this be the result, Sunday sanctification will probably suffer more from the temporary success of its promoters, than from the more direct efforts of its opponents previously. Even if not rescinded, the votaries of pleasure and profit will combine to establish their private post offices, at whatever expense of Sunday labor, and taking all the risks of illegality. The church herself has destroyed the foundation of right faith in the Sabbath, and in vain hopes to stem the tide of ungodliness within the limits she has allowed and enjoined, of "one day in seven," in defiance of the authority of Him who has said, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." The Church of Rome, by her perversions of divine truth, prepared the way for a flood of infidelity, at which, when it came, she stood aghast; and the Protestant Church, by her undermining the authority for the true Sabbath, has fully prepared men to mock at her false Sabbath also. Having been taught to reject Heaven's restraints, they need not be expected to submit readily to human bonds. Accordingly, it is announced, that the proprietors of London weekly newspapers, chiefly got up for Sunday reading, are already far advanced with preparations for a Sunday delivery in a large number of rural districts, and other places, by means of private messengers; and the English Railway Companies are urged to establish a Sunday Parcels' Delivery. Previous even to this solicitation, the London and South-Western Railway Company had volunteered, "pending more complete arrangements," as their intimation expresses it, to receive and forward newspapers, on payment of a penny, between any of the stations on their line. A Mr. Hegwood, of Manchester, likewise announces, that he is prepared with a staff of boys, equal in number to the men employed by the Post Office, to deliver on Sunday morning the whole of the orders the public may require—giving to his staff a badge by which they may be distinguished. And an Edinburgh tavern-keeper intimates, through the Edinburgh newspapers, his having made arrangements for the reception of Sunday London papers, by parcel—receiving not only supplies for his own house, but is ready even to accommodate others. Loud complaints are made by many who hitherto seemed favorable to the call for shutting the Post, as well as others who have taken no part in the movements on either side; and already the Leith Chamber of Commerce have agreed, by a majority of 27 to 6, to petition the House of Commons to rescind the resolution; while a petition to the same effect, laid down at the bar of the Exchange in Liverpool, has been numerously subscribed. In fact, even the Scottish Guardian of to-day says, that the cause of Sunday observance "was never, perhaps, actually in greater danger than at the present moment." Renewed agitation is therefore urged by its patrons. The London Record calls for meetings; and the Glasgow "Guardian" reiterates, "Petition, petition, petition."

Baptismal Regeneration, &c.

But I must not allow the interest or number of references to this question, interesting as it at present is, and more peculiarly calling for notice at the hands of a correspondent of the Sabbath Recorder, to exclude notice of everything else. The Archbishop of Canterbury, on Sabbath last, (I know not why the Sabbath was preferred to Sunday,) sprinkled with water the face of the Infant Prince—the Duke of Wellington and the Prince of Prussia standing "sponsors," as they call it, for the royal infant. Great complaint was made by one of the organs of the party who believe in this easy mode of regenerating, that the ceremony had not been performed long ago, and especially that the child should previously have been exposed to the dangers of the sea, when the Queen, his mother, went to the Isle of Wight, after her recovery a month ago.

At Dorchester, a child of eleven months was lately interred "in consecrated ground," although unbaptized. A penalty was, however, inflicted by the clergyman—a penalty which indeed can hardly be regarded as severe, by those who believe in the guilt of its being therefore "unregenerated." The interment, it was stipulated, should be at 10 o'clock at night, and unattended by mourners. The parents consented to the imposed restrictions; but we can scarcely think that baptismal regeneration would appear either the more lovely or the more reasonable in their eyes.

London Sewage.

I formerly referred to a proposal of Prince Albert of a plan for filtering the sewage of London. The plan has since been claimed as the property of a patentee, whose specification was published some years ago. The suggestion itself may not be the worse; and some idea may be formed of the magnitude and importance of London sewage, from the fact that the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers last month granted £4,600 for works for drainage of a single street (Victoria-st., Westminster.) The proposed filter is upon the hydrostatic principle that water will find its level. It is proposed that the solid parts alone are designed to be retained. A tank is therefore to be formed, with a perforated false bottom, upon which filtering materials shall be laid, these materials being themselves suitable for manure, and which will absorb most of the salts from the liquids. Charcoal, gypsum, and burnt clay, have been used in the experiments; but some soils are likely to be found well adapted, as most of them possess the power of retaining the valuable portions of manure either passing through them or evolved by decomposition. The sewage would be admitted at one end into the tank below the false bottom, and filtering upward through the filtering bed to its original level, pass off at the other end of the tank, leaving the solid contents below, to be removed at convenience. J. A. BEGG.

A LIBERIAN PURCHASE.—A statement was made some time ago, that Samuel Gurney, of London, had offered to contribute ten thousand dollars for the purchase of the Gallinas territory, on the West Coast of Africa. A letter received at the Colonization Rooms in Washington, on the 6th inst., contains the intelligence that Mr. Roberts, the President of Liberia, has recently purchased the noted slave factory, known as the Gallinas, the last point at which the slave-trade has been carried on for about twelve hundred miles along the coast. The purchase was made for $9,500; in addition to which the President has obligated himself to appoint Commissioners immediately to settle the wars in the country, and open the trade in camwood, ivory, and palm oil, with the interior tribes; and also settle among them, as soon as convenient, persons capable of instructing them in the arts of husbandry.

PRESBYTERIAN HOME MISSIONS.—A neat pamphlet, containing the annual report of the Board of Missions connected with the Old School General Assembly, has just appeared, giving intelligence of an interesting and encouraging nature, and exhibiting a commendable activity in this branch of the Presbyterian Church in sustaining the work of home evangelization. The whole number of ministers sustained and aided by the Board, during the past year, has been 570; the number of feeble churches and congregations aided or supplied, 1461; 2189 members have been added on examination; 60 new churches organized, and 140 houses of worship erected. The contributions to the treasury, during the year, have been over $80,000, besides $8,000 given to the specific object of church extension.

FATE OF A MISSIONARY.—News has recently been received of the death of Rev. Hervey Goodall, one of the missionaries who left this country last autumn, under the auspices of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Southern Baptist Convention, to explore Central Africa, and to establish mission stations in the kingdom of Soudan. He had, in company with the Messrs. Hill and Bowers, his associates, progressed some distance into the interior, and commenced operations, when he was attacked by the African fever, and soon died. His companions returned to Monrovia. This is the second missionary the same Board has lost this year.

LIBERTY PARTY MOVEMENTS.—The Liberty Party Convention recently held at Syracuse, made the following nominations for the ensuing New York State Election:—

For Governor,	WM. L. CHAPLIN of Albany.
For Lieut. Governor,	JOSEPH PLUMB of Erie Co.
For Canal Commis'r,	JOHN C. HARRINGTON Oswego.
For Prison Inspector,	DAVID PLUMB of Troy.

The Convention also adopted a resolution inviting the friends of righteous civil government to meet in National Convention in the City of Oswego, on the first Wednesday of October next (2d) for the purpose of nominating candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency of the United States.

BIBLES FOR CHINA.—At a meeting of the officers of the American Bible Society, held on the 4th inst., a letter was read from Bishop Boone, in China, stating that portions of the Bible are ready for publication, and asking for the $10,000 conditionally promised three years since. He states the need of the Acts and the Evangelists, in the conversational language of China, which is quite different from the ordinary book dialect, adapted to the more ignorant classes. The Board ordered $500 to publish this small work.

DR. ACHILLI COMING TO AMERICA.—The Independent publishes a letter from Dr. Achilli, who recently escaped from the Inquisition at Rome, dated at London, May 31, 1850. The Doctor is now endeavoring to establish in London a church for such Italians as desire to renounce popery. When this enterprise is so far accomplished that he can leave it in the hands of another, he proposes, if not recalled to Rome, to visit the United States, and become personally acquainted with the people.

FAREWELL MISSIONARY MEETING.—A farewell meeting was held in the Stanton street Baptist Church, in New York, one evening last week, on the occasion of the sailing of Rev. E. Kincaid and Dr. Dawson, for Burmah. The first-named gentleman has been twenty years in the missionary field. Miss Jane McBain and Miss Cornelia Kincaid also go out as teachers. Their destination is the golden city of Ava, the capital of Burmah. Rev. Dr. Cone addressed the meeting.

ILLNESS AND DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT.

The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin gives the following particulars of the last sickness and death of President Taylor. It is the most complete and consistent account we have seen.

His indisposition began in the evening of the Fourth. On the morning of that day he was, to all appearances, sound in health and in excellent spirits. In company with his family, and several of the Heads of Departments, he attended at the National Monument to hear Mr. Foote's independence oration, and even up to five o'clock exhibited no signs of illness. However, while upon the ground, he partook freely of water; and then, after considerable exercise in walking, and exposure to the sun, he drove home. Arrived at the mansion, he "felt," as he expressed himself to Dr. Weatherspoon, "very hungry;" and without reflecting that he was in an unfit condition to indulge freely in fruits, &c., he called for some refreshments, and ate heartily of cherries and wild berries, which he washed down with copious draughts of iced milk and water. At dinner he applied himself again to the cherries, against the remonstrances of Dr. Weatherspoon, and in an hour was seized by cramps, which soon took the form of violent cholera morbus. His physician prescribed the usual remedies, but for a time he resisted, deeming the attack only temporary, and that it would yield finally to his naturally strong constitution. Toward midnight, instead of relief, the attack increased in violence, and threatened desperate results, if not speedily arrested. He continued in this condition, without much change, until the evening of the 6th. It was then deemed advisable to call in other physicians. Accordingly, Messrs. Hall and Coolidge were invited, and promptly responded; but they thought it further advisable to send for the assistance of Dr. Wood of Baltimore. That gentleman attended immediately, and in the same cars came Colonel Taylor, the brother of the General, and his family, who had likewise been telegraphed for. By this time (the morning of the 8th) the disease had made rapid encroachments on his frame; but by the united skill of these eminent practitioners the visible stages of the cholera morbus were soon after checked. However, fever ensued, and from a remittent character, it took the form of typhoid. Anxiety now began to manifest itself, not only among the exalted patient's family, but among the physicians themselves. His chances of life hung upon a thread.

Toward the evening of the 8th, the chronic type of dysentery, which had set in, disappeared, and vomiting ensued. The condition of the patient was now at its critical point. The sick chamber was restored to solemn silence, attendance placed on the outside, and none permitted to enter except the physicians. The family of the President, with Col. Bliss and other relatives of the deceased, occupied a room adjoining, where they remained, overwhelmed with grief, and refusing even the indulgences of necessary repose. Bulletins were hourly sent out, to inform the masses of the changes observable in the patient; but these so slightly varied for the better that all hope of his safety was dispelled at 11 o'clock. From that period the utmost anxiety prevailed.

The ninth dawned, but gloom still surrounded the Executive Mansion. Thousands began to flood the avenues leading thither, and throughout the day a messenger was kept posted at the main door to answer the interrogatories that were incessantly poured upon him. At 10 o'clock A. M. a report circulated that the President had rallied—at 1 P. M. that he was dead. The consternation created by the latter rumor was happily relieved by an official bulletin at 3½, that the crisis had been passed, and that he was then beyond immediate danger. Bells rang for joy, and even the boys in the street lit bonfires, and shouted in childish gratulation. The stream now to the White House was greater than ever, but about 7 in the evening the pall of gloom again shrouded all faces, for it was announced that the illustrious hero was dying.

I will not attempt to describe the commotion that ensued. Mrs. Taylor thrice fainted from excess of apprehension, and Colonel Bliss, who had never shed a tear perhaps upon the battle plain, wept like an infant. At 5—two hours previous—the physicians refused to administer any more medicine, considering his case hopeless, and in the hands of God. The Heads of Departments, corporate authorities of the city, diplomatic body, and officers of the army and navy, paid their respects often during the day, and seemed to entertain lively feelings of solicitude for his safety. Everything that could contribute to the comfort of the sick, thenceforward, was extended; but the sands of life had run out, and his hours were numbered.

At nine the vomiting partially ceased, as all pain had disappeared about four in the afternoon. But the system had wasted under the shock and gradually sunk beyond recovery. Green matter was thrown from his stomach at intervals until twenty minutes past 10—that peculiar coloration of bile that indicates the dissolution of patients thus seized. At 35 minutes past 10 his wife, and other members of his family, were called to his bed side, to receive his last earthly adieu—a farewell that the stoutest could not gaze upon without a tear.

At a few minutes past ten, it became apparent that the soul of the hero and conqueror was about taking its rest. The medical yielded to the spiritual agent, whose office it was to prepare for the approach of the King of Terrors. But there was nothing in the conduct of the sufferer to indicate that he feared the mortal leap. In the secret communion of his heart with Heaven, who can say that he died not a Christian? After prayer he seemed refreshed, and called for a glass of water. It was given him and he drank sparingly. He then inquired of Dr. Weatherspoon, how long he thought he would live, to which the latter replied, "I hope, General, for many years;" but, thinking this a useless deception, he added, "I fear not many hours." "I know it," was the response; then, after musing a moment, he asked for his family. They were sent for and soon entered. The interview was indescribably affecting—Mrs. Taylor prostrating herself at the bedside, and her children clinging around her with sobs and groans expressive of their agony. The pain, which had afflicted the patient in the side of his chest, ceased; and attended by other symptoms of ease, it was thought he might endure till morning. But he himself knew better, and so declared in a quite audible voice. He was asked whether he was comfortable. "Very," he replied, "but the storm, in passing, has swept away the trunk." Finally, he adverted to the subject of his previous broodings—the Slavery question—and observed, "I am about to die—I expect the summons soon—I have endeavored to discharge all my official duties faithfully—I regret nothing, but am sorry that I am about to leave my friends." These were his last audible words. He essayed to speak to his wife a few moments before his demise, but his voice failed him. Dr. Weatherspoon administered a stimulus, but it was powerless in reviving the functions. The soul of the hero had fled.

"The lightnings may flash, and the thunder may rattle;
He heeds not, he hears not; he's free from all pain;
He sleeps his last sleep, he has fought his last battle,
No sound can awake him to glory again."

THE FREE SCHOOL CONVENTION.

A Convention to consider what should be done to sustain the Free School Law of the State of New York, was held at Syracuse on the 10th and 11th insts. The delegation was very large, embracing representatives of nearly every section of the State. Christopher Morgan, of Albany, was chosen President; W. L. Crandall, H. K. Viele, D. C. Bloomer, and Wm. F. Phelps, served as Secretaries. The principal speakers in favor of Free Schools were S. S. Randall of Albany, Rev. Samuel J. May of Syracuse, Mr. Starr of Rochester, Henry Mandeville of Albany, and Horace Greeley of New York. The opponents of Free Schools were represented by Mr. Thompson of Erie Co., Mr. Bascom of Seneca Co., and J. A. McMasters, editor of a Catholic paper in New York. With the exception of some random discussion of Catholicism, Protestantism, Socialism, &c., the speeches were candid, able, and effective. We give below the resolutions adopted by the Convention. An Address, prepared by a Committee of Seven, was also adopted, for which we shall endeavor to find room next week.

The Resolutions.

1. Resolved, That the proposition before the Convention and this State is not, that our present Common School Law, in all of its provisions and details, is perfect, but that this Law should be maintained in so far as it provides that our Common Schools shall be free to all the children in the State.

2. Resolved, That the principle upheld by this Convention, the principle which should be fixed and established in the political economy of this State, is, that "the property of the State should educate the children of the State;" or, in the words of the 1st section of the Act, that "Common Schools, in the several School Districts in this State, SHALL BE FREE TO ALL PERSONS residing in the District, over five and under twenty-one years of age."

3. Resolved, That the true welfare of a State is to be attained, not wholly by highways and canals, by asylums and penitentiaries, by police and standing army, but by the development of the physical, intellectual and moral energies of the people—therefore, if the former should be sustained at the public expense, much more should the thorough education of the whole people be amply provided for from the same source.

4. Resolved, That the emphatic vote of the people, at the last election, in favor of the Act establishing Free Schools throughout the State, was clearly indicative of the deliberate sanction and approval of the principle which dictated the enactment of that law, and that no defect in the subordinate details of the provision thus made for the universal education of the children of the State, can warrant or justify the abandonment of that principle, or the total repeal of the law.

5. Resolved, That we pledge ourselves to use every proper means of influence in our power, individually and collectively, to procure the renewed sanction of the people to the great principle of Free Schools, as the only sure and effectual palladium of their freedom, happiness and prosperity; as the best safeguard of their rights, and the surest preservation of those noble institutions handed down to us by the fathers and framers of our Republic.

6. Resolved, That we are opposed to the old School Law, because its operation was contrary to the principles of Democratic Government; while it professed to be liberal, it gave the avaricious parent an excuse for keeping his children from the schools; while it should have have furnished intellectual aliment free to all the children of the State, it virtually drove thousands from the school houses, by wounding their pride and branding them as paupers; while it should have discriminated between the right of the child to public beneficence, and that of the parent, it often treated unkindly and blasted the hopes of the former on account of the improvidence or misfortune of the latter; while it was far better than no system of Public Education, it did not supply the wants of the rising generation who were calling for "light, more light still."

7. Resolved, That we will most cordially unite with the people of this State, and recommend to the next Legislature, such an amendment of the act of 1849, establishing Free Schools, as shall make the expense of supporting such schools, over and above the revenue of the Common School Fund, a charge upon the real and personal property in the State, county or town, equitably assessed according to a just and fair valuation of such property, and make such other amendments of the law of 1849 as they in their wisdom shall see to be best, and we recommend that a memorial be circulated in each district of the State, embodying such alterations as the inhabitants of such district may deem desirable.

8. Resolved, That it be recommended to the friends of Free Schools in each County to hold a convention at their county seats, on the 1st Thursday in October next, or some more convenient day, for the purpose of organizing and preparing for the election.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, July 8.

After the morning hour, in which nothing worth naming was done, the Compromise Bill was taken up, and Truman Smith addressed the Senate at length against the Bill, and in defense of the President's policy relative to the Territories.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Messrs. Baker, Otis, Robinson, Allen, and Trueman, were appointed the committee on Giddings' case.

Mr. Conger asked leave to offer a resolution, instructing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to report immediately a bill to abolish the franking privilege—to reduce postage to a uniform rate of two cents for a half ounce, when prepaid, and five cents when not; and the circulation of newspapers free within thirty miles of the place of publication. Objection made.

Mr. Daniel, of N. C., wished to introduce an amendment to the Constitution, declaring that hereafter, no amendment shall be made to abolish or in any way affect the institution of slavery in the States, without the concurrence of all the States in which the institution exists. Objection made.

The Galphin case then came up, and the amendment offered by Mr. Thompson, of Miss., censuring the Attorney-General and the Secretary of the Treasury, was carried, 119 to 66. The original claim was censured, 112 to 50. The payment of interest was censured, 118 to 71. Pending a motion to reconsider, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, July 9.

Mr. Walker introduced a bill changing the time of the annual meeting of Congress to the first Monday in October.

The Compromise Bill was taken up, and Mr. Butler commenced a speech against the Bill. Before his remarks were finished, Mr. Webster called attention to the critical condition of the President, and moved that the Senate adjourn, which was unanimously agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The Committee for the District of Columbia was instructed to inquire whether the condition of the canal, the workmen being engaged in cleaning it, does not affect the health of the city, and if so, to consider and report means to remedy the evil.

The vote on the Galphin case was reconsidered, 115 to 73. After debate on a proposed amendment, Mr. Bayly, of Va., rose at half past one o'clock, and said that authentic information was received that the President of the United States was not likely to live an hour, and he therefore moved that the House adjourn. Carried, 150 to 17.

FOURTH-DAY, July 10.

In SENATE, after prayer by the Chaplain, the Secretary read a communication from the State Department, announcing the death of the President, at half past 10 o'clock, in the midst of his family and friends, calmly, and in possession of all his faculties. Also a communication from Mr. Fillmore, announcing the termination of his duties as President of the Senate, and proposing 12 o'clock this day as the hour at which he would take the oath of office as the President of the United States, in presence of the two Houses of Congress. Mr. Webster offered a resolution that the Senate meet in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, at 12 o'clock, to proceed to the inauguration of Mr. Fillmore; which was adopted.

In the HOUSE, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with. A communication was received and read, similar to that read in the Senate; after which a committee was appointed to inform the President that the House were ready to receive him.

At 12 o'clock, both branches of Congress assembled in the Hall of Representatives, when the oath of office was administered to President Fillmore by Judge Cranch.

After the inauguration, both Houses assembled in their respective Halls, where appropriate eulogies were pronounced upon the deceased President, committees were appointed to make arrangements for the funeral, and they adjourned.

[The remainder of the week was occupied in attending upon business connected with the President's funeral, which took place on Sabbath, July 13.]

WASHINGTON ITEMS.

The funeral of the late President took place last Sabbath. The ceremonies were performed in the East Room of the Presidential Mansion, by Rev. Drs. Butler and Pyne. The military and civic procession was long and imposing; three quarters of an hour was occupied in passing any given spot. Nearly all public officers residing in the District of Columbia, and large numbers from abroad, took part in the pageant. "Old Whitey," Gen. Taylor's favorite war-horse, was led by a gentleman who served in the Seminole war.

The corpse looked almost as natural as in health. The features were full and firm, with no signs of decomposition whatever. Its preservation was no doubt referable to the refrigeratory process to which it had been subjected. It may be said to have been literally frozen.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that the "coffin cannot have cost less than five hundred dollars; and the expenditure on the East Room alone, must have cost at least a thousand dollars. From a hurried estimate, I do not hesitate to venture over one hundred thousand dollars as the cost, direct and collateral, of this pageant.

No cast of Gen. Taylor's head was taken, because the family were unwilling that the skin should be disfigured. An Italian artist, however, took a drawing of the face, which retained the appearance of life to the last.

It is said that the remains of Gen. Taylor will be taken to Kentucky for final interment.

Mrs. Taylor, the widow of the deceased President, and her bereaved family, have accepted the hospitable invitation of Mrs. Meredith, wife of the Secretary of the Treasury, to become inmates of her house, temporarily, after the obsequies.

President Fillmore will probably take possession of the White House this week.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the steamer Hibernia, Liverpool dates to June 30—one week later—have been received.

The chief feature of the news from England, is the debate in the House of Commons relative to the policy of the Ministry on the Greek question, in which the ministry were sustained, and the committing of a cowardly assault on the Queen, by a man named Plato, formerly an officer in the Tenth Dragoons. The offense against Her Majesty was committed in the following manner:—Shortly after 6 o'clock, on Thursday evening, Her Majesty was leaving Cambridge House in company with Prince Albert, when from among the crowd assembled to witness her departure, a man stepped out with a walking-cane in his hand, and made an assault on the person of Her Majesty. He struck her on the head and face repeatedly, but fortunately his blows took no effect beyond a demolition of her bonnet. The Queen appeared at the Italian Opera the same evening, where she was greeted with the most loyal and enthusiastic reception. The miscreant has been taken into custody, and has undergone an examination, at which he appeared perfectly sane, and it is said that he has been living in good circumstances.

The great news from France is that the Bill to increase the President's salary has become a law. The Government look upon the carrying of this bill as a great victory, and the friends of order are congratulating themselves on the feeling which has been displayed. Another secret society has been discovered in Paris; twenty-seven persons have been arrested, and all of them have proved to be discharged June insurgents. The conspiracy discovered at Oran, in Algeirs, is said to have had extensive ramifications. Great numbers of persons belonging to secret societies in Paris and the provinces have been arrested.

From Spain, we learn that Gen. Narvaez has had a warm discussion with the Ambassador of the United States, in which he expressed the astonishment and regret of the Spanish Government that the United States had not prevented the expedition of Lopez from being prepared in the States, but had allowed it to depart with the object of attacking Cuba. It is also reported, that the Spanish Minister has addressed a warm remonstrance to Washington, embodying the views of the Spanish Government, and that this note is not written in a very amicable spirit.

In Italy, things are going from bad to worse. A Congress of Cardinals has been named to discuss the affairs of the country, and we are told that the Police have been placed under the Austrian military authority. At Naples a frightful accident occurred on the 18th of June. A part of the Grenalis, an immense edifice, used as a barrack for troops, gave way and fell, overwhelming 400 or 500 persons in the ruins.

Letters from Belgrade, Turkey, state that a revolution against the Turks had broken out in Bulgaria. The three Districts within Gurgysoba and Belgrade are stated to be in open insurrection. The insurgents were marching against the Fort of Belgradcieza, which contains but a small garrison, but an immense quantity of munitions of war. Another statement is that the Fort is already in their hands.

The overland mail from the East, received at London July 29, gives intelligence of an awful disaster at Benares. Upwards of 1,000 persons lost their lives by the explosion of a magazine boat, loaded with 3,000 barrels of gunpowder. A whole fleet of boats were destroyed, and immense damage was also done to the town, near which the explosion took place.

The American steamship Atlantic arrived at Liverpool at 4 o'clock Wednesday morning, June 27, having made the passage in 10 days and 16 hours. She took the whole town by surprise. Her log is published, from which it appears that, during the six last days of her voyage, she accomplished a greater distance than any other steamer afloat has ever done. On the 24th, with a head wind, she ran 319 miles in 24 hours. She was advertised to leave on the 10th inst., and will contest the race with the Asia, which leaves for Boston on the 13th.

PROFESSOR WEBSTER'S CASE.—In Boston, on the 8th inst., a hearing was had before the Committee on Pardons in Prof. Webster's case. A petition for clemency, signed by 984 persons of New York City, two from Franklin County, N. Y., and one from Michigan, were presented. The Lieutenant Governor stated that a large number of petitions for commutation had been received, one from Mr. Green, a juryman in the case, two or three others from persons who said they themselves committed the murder and not Prof. Webster. Several medical men showed that blows on the head, such as that which Professor Webster said he gave Dr. Parkman, often caused death in a short period. Mr. Edwin Jarvis cited two instances to show the ungovernable temper of Prof. Webster, and how soon it was over. In one case, Dr. Webster, when a student, commenced the play of knocking off hats with another student, in which Webster was rather the worst off; finally, Webster got enraged, seized a stick, and would have given a deadly blow had he not been prevented. The next day he showed no resentment. At another time, in London, Webster was being shaved, when Dr. B. Latchford playfully remarked, "Did you ever see a barber shave a monkey?" Webster was so much enraged that he seized a knife and would have struck Dr. L. had he not been prevented. A petition was presented by Prof. Bowen, signed by President Sparks and nearly all the Professors of Harvard, praying for a commutation; not on the ground of his late confession, he (as they say) having forfeited all claim to be believed, but on the great probability that exists that the act was not premeditated. Prof. Bowen urged delay to obtain more direct petitions, and a final decision in the case was posponed till Thursday, the 18th inst.

The Bristol County Coal Company, in digging a well recently on the northerly edge of their coal basin at Mansfield, Mass., came in contact with a rich vein of lead ore, samples of which, on being subjected to analysis by Dr. Jackson, prove to be highly impregnated with silver. Farther researches are being made.

Great Fire in Philadelphia.

Philadelphia was visited by a most destructive and fatal fire on the 8th inst. It originated in the storehouse of a grocery and commission merchant, on Water-st., below Vine. When it was well under way, and firemen and spectators were crowded around, a terrible explosion occurred, from saltpetre stored in the building, which produced such consternation, and spread the fire to such an extent, that it was not checked until about three hundred and sixty buildings, and property valued at one million dollars, were destroyed. But the most melancholy result of the explosion was the great loss of life it occasioned. Bricks and timbers in great quantities were thrown into the air, which fell upon the men, women, and children assembled, killing some outright, and wounding others. A report made out three days after the fire, states the result of the explosion as follows:—Killed, 30; Wounded, 100; Drowned, 9; Missing, 17. Total, 156. Farther researches have changed these figures somewhat, but have not greatly reduced them. Many sad and thrilling incidents connected with the fire are reported.

RUMORS OF CHANGES.—There is no end to rumors relative to changes which President Fillmore will make in the Cabinet and other offices. Nothing was done by him previous to the funeral of his predecessor, nor was it then certain that he would do anything for several days to come. It was reported that a Cabinet favorable to the Compromise Scheme, would be chosen, and that Mr. Clay would be a prominent actor in future, but this is only a rumor. It is considered pretty certain that the Secretaryship of State will be tendered to Mr Webster, but of his accepting it there is some doubt.

SUMMARY.

Intelligence was received by the last mail from California, of the death of Rev. T. D. Sturtevant, formerly minister of the New Jerusalem Society in Providence, R I., which event occurred at the mines. Mr. Sturtevant and his wife sailed from Providence in the bark Perseverance, about a year ago, and previous to their arrival out, Mrs S. gave birth to a child. She and her child are now left in that distant land without friends and without means.

The Glasgow (Mo.) Banner has a letter from Mr. G. S. Feazel, dated on the 6th June, eighteen miles beyond Fort Kearney, which represents that the cholera had broken out among the emigrants and was making terrible ravages. In the short distance between Fort Kearney and the place where the letter was dated, he passed many companies encamped to take care of the sick. The letter was brought to St. Joseph by an emigrant whose company of four persons had died.

Thompson's Bank Note Reporter says:—"We are as yet in the fog on Land Warrants. The bills for giving away the Public Lands, which are before Congress, may or may not pass. Our prices for the time being are $110 for buying, and 125 for selling—subject to a change at any moment. We have a few 40 acre Warrants at $44 each. It is our opinion that no bill changing the aspect of Land or Land Warrants will become a law this season."

An accomplished and beautiful young lady, aged only seventeen, who had shone as a private theatrical in her circle of friends at St. Louis, lately committed suicide by taking arsenic, under depression from the refusal of her father to permit her to adopt the stage as a profession. One of her requests was characteristic of her devotion; it was, that a copy of Shakspeare might be placed upon her bosom in her coffin.

The Newfoundland Ledger states that a terrible onslaught upon the deer near the Bay of Exploits has lately been made by the Indians, who are stated to have killed no less then 300 of them in their passage to and across a river which they had taken in pursuance of their migratory habits. Thirty-four are said to have been shot by one young man, resident at Exploits, within 24 hours.

A model of an ærial machine is exhibiting at Rochester, and so elated are the citizens with its success, that a formal meeting was held, at which Professor Dewey presided, which adopted resolutions expressing brief in the practicability of navigating the air with steamships.

Mr. A. Farrer, of Buckfield, Me., has a horse with an appendage growing from the side of one ear, like a horn. It is about three inches in length, and at its base has muscular attachments, by which the animal is able to raise it at a right angle with the ear.

The St. Louis Union publishes a long catalogue of the steamers to which serious accident has happened in the Western Waters during the half year ending July 1, 1850. The aggregate is 67; and some others probably overlooked. The loss of life by those accidents was nearly Five Hundred and Fifty; 542 are positively accounted for, and others believed to have been lost whose names and residences remain unascertained.

Sante Fe dates to 12th June, received at St. Louis, leave no doubt that the State Government is organized before this time. The Election for the State took place on the 20th May. Lieut. Mason was drowned on the 12th of May in the Rio Grande. The Utah Indians have forwarded Mrs. White's child, alive, to the Apache Indians, in whose hands it now is.

The Hempstead (Long Island) Inquirer publishes a list of the members of the congregation of Rev. Z. Green, in Suffolk county, who are over 70 years old. It includes the names of five persons over 100; eighteen over 60; fifty-one over 80, and forty-five over 70 years of age.

Miss Jane Porter, auther of the Scottish Chiefs, expired at the residence of her brother, in Bristol, England, on the 24tn of May, from the second attack of pulmonary apoplexy, aged 74 years.

The ladies of Napierville, Illinois, raised money enough in a year by a sewing society to make plank side walks for the streets.

The amount of money coined in the New Orleans Branch of the U. S. Mint during the last month is $1,205,000; of this $193,000 was coined into half dollars, $7,000 in dimes, $100,000 in eagles, and $705,000 in double eagles. The receipt of gold bullion during the same time amounted to 20,000 ounces.

The Receivers of the New Hope Delaware Bridge Company give notice to the creditors of that Bank, to present their claims before the 24th day of December next. If they are not presented by that time, they will be debarred from dividends that may be declared.

On Wednesday night of last week the steamboat New-Haven ran over a small boat at the foot of Troy-st. N. R. There were six persons in the small boat; two of them, David and Jacob Banta, were drowned, and one Daniel Demarest had an arm broken.

The Ontario Repository says that Gerrit Smith, of Peterboro, has recently distributed $30,000 in cash and 500 farms to 1000 poor landless and temperate white persons in this State. $480 and eight farms of the above have been given to individuals in the county of Ontario.

On Wednesday morning, June 26th, a drove of some fifty-three negroes passed through Shelbyville, Indiana, on their way to the northern part of the State. They were manumitted slaves from North Carolina, and looked hard enough, in all conscience.

Executive Board of the Missionary Society.

A Quarterly Meeting of the Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society will be held at the house of Eld. W. B. Gillett, New Market, N. J., on Fifth-day, August 1st, at 1 o'clock P. M.

GEO. B. UTTER, Rec. Sec.

South-Western Association.

THE next session of the Seventh-day Baptist South-Western Association will be held with the Church at Jackson, Shelby Co, Ohio, commencing on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in October, 1850. Eld. Azor Estee is to preach the Introductory Discourse. A full delegation is desirable. It is expected that the churches will bear in mind, that the question of dividing the Association has been referred to that meeting, and that they will be prepared to act in the matter. WM. F. RANDOLPH, Secretary.

Central Railroad of New Jersey.

Summer Arrangement, commencing April 1, 1850.

PASSENGER TRAIN UP.—Passengers will leave New York by steamboat from pier 1 North River, or by the New Jersey Railroad, foot of Cortland-st., at 9 A. M. and 5 P. M.; leave Elizabethtown at 10 A. M. and 6 P. M.

PASSENGER TRAIN DOWN.—Leave White House at 5.45 A. M. and 1.45 P. M.; North Branch at 5.55 A. M. and 1.55 P. M.; Somerville at 6.10 A. M. and 2.10 P. M.; Bound Brook at 6.20 A. M. and 2.20 P. M.; Plainfield at 6.40 A. M. and 2.40 P. M.; Westfield at 6.55 A. M. and 3 P. M.; Elizabethtown at 7.15 and 10.30 A. M. and 3.20 P. M.

The freight train (with passenger cars attached) will leave White House at 3.30 A. M., Somerville at 4.30, Plainfield at 5.15, and Elizabethport, by steamboat, at 7.30 A. M. Returning, leave New York, by steamboat Red Jacket, from pier 1 North River, at 1 P. M.

New York and Boston Steamboats.

REGULAR MAIL LINE BETWEEN NEW YORK AND BOSTON, via Stonington and Providence. Inland route, without ferry, change of cars or baggage! The steamers C. VANDERBILT, Capt. Joel Stone, and COMMODORE, Capt. William H. Frazee, in connection with the Stonington and Providence, and Boston and Providence Railroads, leaving New York daily, (Sundays excepted,) from pier 2 North River, first wharf above Battery Place, at 5 o'clock P. M., and Stonington at 8 o'clock P. M., or upon the arrival of the mail train from Boston. The C. Vanderbilt will leave New York Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Leave Stonington Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The Commodore will leave New York Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Leave Stonington Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Physiology will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry and Astronomy during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

DERUYTER, July 8th, 1850.

Harper's New Monthly Magazine,

No. 1 published June 1, 1850.

PROSPECTUS.—The design of the Publishers in issuing this work, is to place within the reach of the great mass of American people the unbounded treasures of the Periodical Literature of the present day. Periodicals enlist much of the literary talent and creative genius of the age. The best writers in every nation, devote themselves mainly to the Reviews, Magazines, and Newspapers. Through the pages of these, the most powerful historical essays, the most elaborate critical disquisitions, the most exquisite delineations of manners and of Nature, the highest Poetry, and the most brilliant Wit, have, within the last ten years, found their way to the public heart.

The ablest and best productions of Lamartine, Dickens, Alison, Lever, Bulwer, Croly, and Macauley, are found in Reviews, Newspapers, and Magazines. Their productions, however, intermingled with much that is of merely local and transient interest, are scattered through scores of periodicals, so as to make it obviously impossible that, under present circumstances, any considerable number even of the reading public, and much more, that the great mass of the community, should have an opportunity of becoming familiar with them.

The Publishers of the New Monthly Magazine intend to remedy this evil, and to place such of the Periodical Literature of the day, as has commanding interest, in the hands of all who have the slightest desire to become acquainted with it. Each number of their Magazine will contain 144 pages octavo, in double columns. The volume of a single year, therefore, will present nearly 2,000 pages of the choicest of the Miscellaneous Literature of the age. The Magazine will transfer to its pages, as rapidly as they may be issued, the continuous tales of Dickens, Bulwer, Croly, Lever, Warren, and other distinguished contributors to British Periodicals; articles of commanding interest from all the leading Quarterly Reviews of both Great Britain and the United States; critical notices of the publications of the day; speeches and addresses of distinguished men upon topics of universal interest; notices of events in Science, Literature, and Art, in which the people at large have an interest, &c., &c. Special regard will be had to such articles as relate to the economy of social life, or tend to promote in any way the well-being of those who are engaged in any department of productive activity. A carefully prepared Fashion plate, and other pictorial illustrations, will accompany each number.

This Magazine is not intended exclusively for any class of readers. The Publishers have at their command the exhaustless resources of current Periodical Literature in all its departments. They have the aid of editors in whom both they and the public confide. They have no doubt that, by an intelligent use of these appliances, they can present a monthly compendium of the periodical productions of the day which no one would willingly be without; and they intend to publish it at so low a rate that its cost shall not prevent its making its way into the hands and family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States.

TERMS—$3 a year, or 25 cents a number. The work may be obtained of Booksellers and Periodical Agents and of the Publishers.

Liberal arrangements will be made with the Trade and with Agents for extra efforts in circulating the work, and specimen numbers will be supplied gratuitously for canvassers.

THE CHILD'S PLAYHOUSE.

BY ANN PRESTON.

Who has not been a child and made
  A playhouse 'neath the trees?
And who so old but groweth young
  When passing one of these?

I saw one in a cool, green nook,
  Anear a cottage wall,
Built cunningly, with many rooms,
  And stored with playthings small.

Prompt little hands had laid stone walls,
  And swept the mossy floors,
And sticks across the openings laid,
  Were gravely called "the doors."

On showy shelves, which oft would fall,
  Were treasures rare, I ween—
The broken "chinas" glistened there,
  In blue, and red, and green.

The golden light of childhood's morn,
  While gazing, round me stole,
And fragrance, from its far, sweet shores,
  Passed, breeze-like, o'er my soul.

Once more I trod the green mossed bank,
  Where 'neath the school-house tree,
From tiny acorn cups we drank,
  And called it "taking tea."

We held our "meeting" o'er again,
  And I was preacher there,
And with mock gravity we wore
  Our serious Quaker air.

But she who put on matron airs,
  And played the mother then,
The fairest one of all our school,
  Now walketh not with men.

Thou, too, whose dark eyes proudly beamed,
  The stateliest of the band,
Mid summer toils hast gone away
  Unto "the silent land."

Those mosses still their little cheeks
  'Gainst sister mosses lay,
While, of the three who leaned on them,
  But I, the weakest, stay.

Oh! earth would be one funeral pyre,
  And life a dream of pain,
If Beauty did not live for aye,
  And God and Love remain.

From Chambers' Journal.

CUVIER AND THE SWALLOWS.

In his later years, the celebrated Cuvier loved to recount the incident which first turned his attention to the study of natural history. While young and in want, he was engaged as tutor to the children of the Count de Héricy, and with his pupils inhabited an old chateau in the Fays de Caus at Fiquainville. Cuvier's room looked towards the garden, and early each morning he was accustomed to open his window and breathe the fresh air before commencing the instruction of his somewhat undisciplined pupils. One morning he remarked two swallows building a nest in the outer angle of his small casement. The male bird brought moist clay in his beak, which the hen, as it were, kneaded together, and, with the addition of straws and bits of hay, formed their future home. Once the framework was completed, both birds hastened to line the interior with feathers, wool, and dried leaves; and then, taking flight together into an eighboring wood, they did not return to their nest until after the lapse of several days. Meantime some important events had happened. While the two swallows were so busily employed in constructing their home, Cuvier had remarked two sparrows perched on a neighboring chimney, who seemed to watch the progress of affairs with much curiosity. The treacherous object of this surveillance speedily became apparent; for no sooner had the poor swallows left the coast clear, than the pair of sparrows took possession of the nest, and established themselves in it as comfortably as though it had been their own property. Cuvier remarked that they never absented themselves together from the nest; one always remained on the watch, with its sturdy bill protruded through the entrance, prepared to exclude every visitor except its mate.

At the end of the honeymoon the rightful owners returned. What was their surprise to find their nest preöccupied? The cock flew indignantly against his dwelling, to expel the intruders, but was met by the formidable beak of the male sparrow, which quickly repulsed the unlucky proprietor with a bleeding head and ruffled feathers. Trembling with rage and shame, and his bright eye darting fire, he returned to his bride, perched on a green bough, and seemed to hold an anxious colloquy with her. Then they took flight together, and soon disappeared.

Presently the hen-sparrow returned, and her husband began, as Cuvier conjectured, to give an animated account of his adventure, accompanying the recital with certain curious little cries which might well pass for derisive laughter. Be that as it it may, the prudent pair did not waste much time in chattering, but hastened out in turns to collect and store up a quantity of provisions. This accomplished, they both remained within, and now two stout beaks were placed to defend the entrance. Cries resounded in the air; crowds of swallows began to assemble on the roof. Cuvier recognized in the midst of them the expelled householders, making their wrongs known to each fresh arrival.

Ere long, there was assembled in full conclave upwards of two hundred swallows. While they were chattering in a style that fully rivaled the performances of many speakers in more ambitious and celebrated meetings, a cry of distress was heard from one of the window-sills. A young swallow, tired no doubt of the long parliamentary debate, had betaken himself to the pursuit of some flies who were buzzing about the window. Cuvier's pupils had placed a snare on the sill, and the poor little bird found one of his slender legs entangled by the cruel horsehair.

At the cry of the captive, about twenty of his brethren flew towards him, and tried to set him free; but in vain. Each effort only served to tighten his bands, and so increase his pain. Suddenly the swallows, as if with one consent, took flight, and wheeling in the air, came one by one and gave a sharp peck at the snare, which, after repeated pulls snapped in two, and the freed bird flew joyously away with his kind companions. During this scene, which passed within a few yards of Cuvier, and at about the same distance as the usurped nest, the tutor remained motionless, and the two sparrows never once stirred their threatening protruded beaks.

Suddenly, and swift as thought, flew a host of swallows against the nest; each had his bill filled with mud, which he discharged against the entrance, and then gave place to another, who repeated the same manœuvre. This they managed to accomplish while two inches distant from the nest, so as to keep out of reach of the beleaguered sparrows. Indeed the latter were so blinded by the first discharge of mud, that they no longer thought of defending themselves. Meantime the swallows continued to heap mud on the nest until it was completely covered; the opening would have been quite choked up but for the desperate efforts made by the sparrows, who by several convulsive shocks contrived to shake off some of the pellets. But a detachment of the implacable swallows perched on the nest, and with their beaks and claws smoothed and pressed down the tough clay over the opening, and at length succeeded in closing it hermetically. Then were heard from hundreds of little throats cries of vengeance and of victory!

But the swallows did not end their work here. They hastened to bring from all directions materials for a second nest, which they constructed over the blocked-up entrance of the first one; and in two hours after the execution of the sparrows, the new nest was inhabited by the ejected swallows.

The inexorable vengeance was now completed. Not only were the unfortunate sparrows doomed to expiate their crime by a lingering death, but they were forced during their torments to listen to the joyful song of the two swallows, the cause of their execution. During many days the hen rarely quitted the nest; she had laid six eggs, and while she was hatching them, her mate supplied her with insects for food. At the end of a fortnight, Cuvier remarked that the cock was busy all day in bringing an enormous quantity of insects to his household; and looking into the nest, he saw six little yellow bills all gaping wide for food. From that time it became a constant source of pleasure to the tutor to watch the progressive development of the little family. Their yellow beaks became black and shining, their downy bodies were covered with smooth and elegant plumage, and they began to accompany their mother in her short excursions from the nest. The cock taught his children how to seize their prey in the air; how to fly high when the atmosphere was calm, and the flies disported themselves in the upper regions; and how to keep near the ground when a storm was approaching; for then all insects seek a shelter.

Thus passed the summer, and autumn came. Crowds of swallows once more assembled on the roof of the Château de Fiqainville. They held regular conversations, and Cuvier amused himself with trying to interpret their language. The children of the nest were placed in the midst of the troop with the other young swallows; and one morning the whole assembly took flight simultaneously, and directed their course towards the east.

In the following spring two swallows, lean, and with ruffled feathers, came and took possession of the nest. Cuvier immediately recognized them; they were the identical birds whom he had watched with such interest the preceding year. They began to repair their dwelling, and to stop the chinks produced by the winter's frost; they re-lined the interior with soft dried moss and feathers, and then, as in the previous season, set out for an excursion.

The morning after their return, as they were gaily pursuing their prey close to Cuvier's window, for they were now quite tame, and accustomed to his presence, a hawk that was soaring in the air pounced suddenly on the cock. He struck him with his talons, and was bearing him off, when Cuvier fired at him with a fowling-piece, which happened luckily to be at hand. The brigand fell into the garden mortally wounded, and Cuvier hastened to relieve his poor little friend. The swallow was seriously wounded; the hawk's talons had deeply pierced his sides, and a grain or two of shot had grazed his breast, and broken one wing. The kind young man dressed the wounds with all possible care and tenderness, and then, with the assistance of a ladder, replaced him in his nest, while the poor hen fluttered sadly round her mate, uttering piercing cries of distress. During three days she only quitted the nest to seek for insects which she brought to her cock. Cuvier watched his poor little languishing head feebly raised to take the proffered food, but each day his strength visibly declined. At length, early one morning Cuvier was awakened by the cries of the hen, who was beating her wings against the window; he ran to the nest. Alas, it only contained a lifeless body! From that moment the hen drooped and pined away. She never left the nest, refused the food which Cuvier constantly offered her, and, literally broken-hearted, expired five days after the death of her beloved companion.

This little history left a strong impression on the amiable and gifted mind of the young tutor. It led him to devote his leisure hours to the persevering study of natural history; and many months afterwards he related the anecdote to the Abbé Tessier, who was paying a visit at the château. Revolutionary persecution had obliged this distinguished man to take refuge in Normandy, and accept the situation of physician to the hospital of Fécamp. Struck with the evident talent of Cuvier, he engaged him to deliver a course of lectures on natural history to the pupils attending his hospital; and wrote to introduce him to the notice of Jussieu and Geoffrey-Saint-Hilaire. Cuvier entered into correspondence with these and with other scientific men; and, after some time passed in profound study, he was appointed to fill the chair of comparative anatomy at Paris. The remainder of his glorious career is matter of history.

THE SMITH FAMILY.—Some hunter of autographs, says the Tribune, has been looking after this renowned family in Rode's N. Y. Directory. He finds 1,108 Smiths and 28 Smyths. Of these, 71 are simple John Smiths and 46 have John with a middle name; 45 William Smiths and 37 Williams with a middle name; 43 James Smiths and 29 James Smiths with some other prefix; 22 Thomas Smiths and 11 Thomases with an adjunct. There are 23 Samuel Smiths, 17 Philips, 23 Michaels, 20 Josephs, 7 Nicholas Smiths, 10 Peter Smiths, 23 Charles Smiths, and 20 Charles Smiths with an addition; 9 Alexanders, 15 Davids, 18 Edwards, and 19 George Smiths, with 24 George Smiths having a middle name. Only 1 Cato Smith, 1 Barney Smith and 1 Life Smith; 1 Daisy Smith and 1 Rose Smith; only 2 Christian Smiths. There are very many Widow Smiths. Among the latter 8 Widow Anne Smiths, and 8 Widow Catharines; 9 Elizabeth Smiths, including 7 widows. There are also 8 Widow Jane Smiths and 1 Jeannette; 4 Julia Smiths and 25 Widow Mary Smiths. In the entire list there is but 1 Patience Smith; but there are 5 Widow Sarah Smiths.

VIEWS OF CALIFORNIA.

The late arrivals from California have supplied the daily press with an unusual quantity of California matter. Some of the letters are hastily written and entirely worthless; others embody the results of experience and reflection, and will pay for reading. The following paragraph, from a letter of an artist, dated San Francisco, May 8, takes a common-sense view of things:—

"If you were out here now, you might have a fair chance of lining your pockets, by speculations in Humboldt and Trinity, as no doubt the lots will be up and off by daylight. I shall not, however, advise you to come, for that is not California fashion. Most of us have found it too perilous an enterprise to beg our friends to follow us. Even those who have been most successful, cannot, with any show of reason, say 'come,' for most of them are too well aware, that their fortunes were made by some peculiar turn of circumstances rather than by their own sagacity. No an emigrant should consult his own feelings, and be his own adviser. Let him store his mind with every possible intelligence concerning the country to which he contemplates removing, and then reflect if the energies of his mind and body are sufficient to undergo the fatigues and trials consequent upon a residence there. Let him think of the hardships he will be obliged to endure, and above all, let him ask himself the question whether his intellectual and business faculties are well adapted to sudden emergencies, and quick, clear habits of thinking and calculation to a profitable result. All this is important to emigrants going to any country, but to a far greater extent to those who are wending their way hitherward. They must make up their minds not to be too much elevated by success, nor dispirited by reverses. There are many here, perhaps hundreds, who have been rich once, and poor twice, all within the last six months. Of these, some are struggling along, considering what can be the matter with things, where there is so much gold about them—others have returned to their homes, dispirited and soured in soul, with curses loud and deep upon the country and their own folly."

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, writing from Jacksonville, California, says:

"The most extravagant stories go to the States relative to these regions. They are apt to originate in this way: Some boy arrives here, and by luck hits a spot, and for two or three days may get an ounce. He immediately begins to count 300 days 300 ounces per year, and is rich in anticipation, not in one year, but in one week. He may work a month and not get more than enough to pay his board. Those large lumps which I heard of before I left New York, and have heard of here, if of large size, are invariably (I believe) ¾ or ⅞ quartz rock. As for myself, I do not regret coming, and hope and believe I shall do tolerably well; but if I were back, with my present knowledge, I would not come; and of the three or four hundred at this place, three-fourths of whom are from Connecticut, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, I think the majority would tell you the same. There is gold here, but it is thinly scattered over a wide extent of country, and sometimes a lucky man strikes a good spot and does extremely well; but these instances are like drawing a high prize in a lottery—and as we miners all have a chance, it would be strange if some one did not get the high prize. But rest assured there are a great many blanks to the prize. Tempted by such accounts, many a poor fellow will spend his little all to get here, and never realize enough to take him back. I have seen people arrive here who apparently did not dream of anything but walking about, picking up and filling their pockets at pleasure. Some who come to work are for a long time unable to find a spot where they can earn more than sufficient to pay current expenses. Others again, more fortunate, are earning from $5 to $10 per day, and with industry and economy can save something handsome in two or three years, provided the diggings hold out. There has been a great quantity of gold dug in this neighborhood within the two last years, but all the cream has been taken off."

CURIOUS CASES.

We dropped in at the Charity Hospital yesterday, June 28, says the editor of the New Orleans Picayune, for a few minutes, and two curious cases were politely shown to us, by the house physician. The first was that of a stout, hearty Irishman, who has not breathed through his mouth or nostrils for two months. He had suffered from a contraction of the under part of the wind-pipe, and was at times nearly suffocated. An incision was made in the neck, into the wind-pipe, below the diseased part, and a crooked silver tube, about three inches long, with a rim on one end, inserted, through which the patient now breathes. In speaking, this man is obliged to put his finger on the end of the tube in order to articulate. The patient now eats, drinks and smokes with great facility, and says that he is heartier than he ever was before. The disease of which the patient has been cured is very similar to that which proved fatal to Gen. Washington. The operation, which modern science has introduced, had not been thought of in the days of Washington, or the "father of his country" probably might have survived many years longer.

The second case that we noticed, was that of Patrick Markey, a fine-looking laboring man, about 35 years of age. He says that on Monday night last, he was quite drunk, and laid down on the side-walk. After a time he rose and went home to his family, near by, going to bed, and sleeping until morning. On awakening in the morning he told his wife that he had a curious pain and sensation in his right ear. He attempted to walk, but fell down. On an attentive observation, his wife discovered that the cavity of his right ear was filled with lead, which would not come out, as it was fitted to the different curiously shaped cavities, and appeared to be largest beyond the opening of the aperture. The lead must have been poured into the ear in a melted state, in order to have thus shaped itself; besides, the patient's ear and face were badly burned, as if by contact with a heated metallic substance. The patient has not the least recollection or conjecture by whom it could have been done, nor does he remember having felt any pain in the ear until morning. A part of the lead nearest the opening of the ear was abstracted by a physician previous to the patient's going to the Charity Hospital.

FREE SCHOOLS WANTED IN OHIO.

The Secretary of State in Ohio, in his late report on Public Schools, gives the following extract from the returns of the Superintendent of Ashtabula Co. THE HIPPOPOTAMUS IN THE LONDON ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—Professor Owen has just published a report on this valuable acquisition to the Zoological Society, from which it appears that the hippopotamus, now safely housed in his comfortable quarters in the Regent's Park, was captured in August, 1849, about 1,350 miles above Cairo. The hunters having previously wounded its mother, had their attention attracted to the thick bushes on the river's bank, in which the young animal was concealed. When discovered, the calf made a rush to the river, and nearly escaped, owing to the slipperiness of its skin, and was only secured by one of the men striking the boat-hook into its flank. The hippopotamus is now only ten months old, and measures seven feet long, and six and a half in girth at the middle of the barrel-shaped trunk, which is supported clear of the ground on very short and thick legs. When awake, it is very impatient of any absence of its favorite attendant, rises on its hind legs, and threatens to break down the wooden fence by butting and pushing against it in a way strongly significative of its great muscular force. Its appetite has been in no respect diminished by the confinement and inconvenience of the sea voyage, or by change of climate.

FELINE AFFECTION.—A few weeks since, says the Huddersfield Chronicle, a family came from Leeds, and took up their residence in Northumberland street, Huddersfield. Among other favorite animals and treasures brought to their new home, was a cat, which, having been carefully secured in a basket, was safely lodged in her new habitation. Poor puss had, in secresy, a few days before leaving Leeds, given birth to a number of kittens, and to the surprise of all, after being absent from this town a day or two, she made her appearance in Huddersfield with one of the kittens in her mouth, which she had brought a distance of sixteen miles without its sustaining the least injury. Having lodged this pledge of her affections in its new home, puss again took her departure, but was not so successful in the second as in her first attempt. She reached Leeds in safety, and brought away another of her charge, but is supposed to have become quite exhausted by these repeated journeys, for a few days since the old cat and her offspring were found dead, side by side, in Bradley Wood, near Huddersfield, without any marks of violence on either of them, leaving no doubt that death was caused by over-exertion.

"The balloon ascension of Mr. Taggart, yesterday, is represented as having been eminently successful and brilliant. The æronaut was desirous of demonstrating that he could ascend and so guide his machine as to return or move to any given point. For this purpose he constructed an immense balloon of 33 feet in diameter, with a car attached 10 or 12 feet long. To the sides of the latter are attached two cranks, which being turned by the hands operate large fans against the currents of air. It is the first balloon of the kind ever constructed, and this of course was the first ascension. Mr. Taggart has patented his invention or improvement. At 4 o'clock he took his seat in the car, and ascended in beautiful style, bearing off in direction of Salem. He went three miles over the harbor of Salem, and then turned about to return to Lowell, whence he started. He came back as far as Middleton, and was so tired with working his wings or fans, that he thought best to decend at that place, which he did at half past five. His highest point of ascent was five miles. He states that as he passed Bunker Hill Monument it appeared in the distance about the size of a man. He passed over a shower—and while it was raining beneath him, he sat in his car completely encrusted with frost, as if he had just emerged from a snow storm.

RECOVERY OF TREASURE IN CUMBERLAND ISLAND.—The Savannah Georgian understands, that a party who had been excavating on the South end of the Cumberland Island for some time past, succeeded in finding and carrying off a large amount of treasure. The existence of this treasure has long been a matter of speculation, and many persons have hitherto been attracted to the place by reports of its whereabouts, but have been unsuccessful in their attempts to discover it. The present party, it appears, procured their information in regard to its locality, from an old man, long suspected of having been connected with piratical operations, and have thus been successful in securing the long-hidden treasure. A schooner had been lying off and on the south end of the Island several days, whose movements created some surprise. She at length came in, took the party on board, and sailed for parts unknown. The party consisted of fifteen persons.

TOBACCO GROWING IN ONONDAGA CO.—The Syracuse Star says: Robert Fleming and Peter H. Reed have purchased a fifty-acre lot some three miles north-west of this city, near the village of Liverpool, and are planting the whole of it with tobacco. Some twenty men are now employed there. We learn also that they have several other fields in different sections of this country, from all of which their crops will be very heavy. These gentlemen have been very successful for several years past, in growing this article at Manlius. Onondaga, then, it seems, is to become far famed for her tobacco, as well as salt productions.

Variety.

Speaking of the Monument to Washington, R. C. Winthrop says: "Build it to the skies—you cannot outreach the loftiness of his principles! Found it upon the massive and eternal rock—you cannot make it more enduring than his fame! Construct it of the peerless Parian marble—you cannot make it purer than his life! Exhaust upon it the rules and principles of ancient and modern art—you cannot make it more proportionate than his character!"

The cheap postage system continues to work well. The four last years of cheap postage, compared with the last four years of high postage, produced as follows:—

High Postage.		Cheap Postage.
Year 1842	$4,546,000	Year 1846	$3,487,000
1843	4,296,000	1847	3,955,000
1844	4,237,000	1848	4,371,000
1845	3,289,000	1849	4,705,000

A scientific writer in the Journal de Pharmacie recommends pulverized plaster of paris, well dried, and mixed with rather more than one-fifth its weight of powdered charcoal, as a cheap and most effective mixture for removing the noxious effects of decomposing organic matter. This compound combines with the ammonial products which would otherwise escape and forms a most valuable manure.

At a recent meeting of the Royal Institution, in London, Professor Owen exhibited, among other fossils, the arm bone of an extinct species of lizard, which was four and a half feet long and thirty-two inches in circumference. Professor Owen remarked, that the animal to which this belonged must have been ninety feet in length.

M. Garot obtains, by acting upon the root of rhubarb by nitric acid, a substance which he calls erythrose. It combines with the alkalies, forming coloring compounds susceptible of application in the arts. The compounds with potash and with ammonia possess, according to M. Garot, a coloring powder many times greater than that of cochineal.

A San Francisco paper says that it already hears "of enterprising shippers intending the establishment of steamers between this port and Canton, via Honolulu; and not less than six large vessels are expected daily in the harbor, freighted with the rich manufactures of the celestial world."

On Tuesday afternoon of last week, the lady of Rev. Mr. Fay, of New York, threw herself overboard from the "Bay State" steamer, about an hour after she had left the city for Fall River. The cause of the lamentable occurrence is supposed to have been insanity.

Littell's Living Age.

PROSPECTUS.—This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope, and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contribution to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia, and Africa into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as merchants, travelers, and politicians, with all parts of the world; so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening, through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selections; and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive to their wives and children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste.

TERMS.—The Living Age is published every Saturday; price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

☞ To insure regularity in mailing the work, orders should be addressed to the office of publication.

CLUBS, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:

Four copies for	$20 00
Nine " "	40 00
Twelve " "	50 00

Complete sets, in 24 volumes, to the end of March, 1850, handsomely bound, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principal cities free of expense of freight, are for sale at forty-eight dollars.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Judge Story—Chancellor Kent—President Adams.

I have read the prospectus of "The Living Age" with great pleasure, and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more; it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character. JOSEPH STORY.

CAMBRIDGE, April 24, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of your work, and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit, and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day. JAMES KENT.

NEW YORK, May 7, 1844.

Of all the periodical journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

THE NORTH-WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist North-Western Association held its Fourth Anniversary at Milton, Wisconsin, on the fourth, fifth, and seventh days of the seventh month. The session was one of delightful interest and much importance.

Elder Stillman Coon, who is at present supplying the church at Milton, preached the opening sermon, from Nehemiah 6: 3—"I am doing a great work, and I cannot come down." It was a sound, practical discourse, upon the great work which we, as Christian men, have before us in promoting the cause of God and truth in this western land, and the importance of our having a Nehemiah spirit, that the work of the Lord be not hindered.

Bro. Adin Burdick, of Albion, was elected Moderator, and W. H. Redfield and Orlenzo Allen, Clerks. The reading of letters of the churches showed a pleasing progress of the cause of righteousness in this growing vineyard of the Lord. Three new churches were added to the Association the present year, each with a settled pastor as part of its representation—Farmington, Ill.; Berlin, in Marquette Co., and Christiana, Dane Co., Wisconsin. The delegation from most of the churches was quite numerous, so that the representation of the Sabbatarian interest in the West was worthy and effective. The business of the session was transacted with a good deal of eclat and tact. We had the following ministering brethren in attendance; Daniel Babcock, Stillman Coon, Zuriel Campbell, O. P. Hull, Julius M. Todd, Richard C. Bond, Samuel Davison, and Varnum Hull from the Central Association. Eld. Hull, and Bro. Maxson Green from Alfred, N. Y., were invited, and took their seats and acted with the Association. The character and influence of the Association were akin to our Associations at the East, and there is evidently a growing confidence and buoyancy in the defense of our peculiar views of the law and institutions of Jehovah. All the letters of the churches, and all the communications of brethren, breathed the fullest confidence in the success of the cause at the West. After the reading of the letters, the usual Committees were appointed, and the arrangements made for preaching and collections on the subsequent days of the session.

The second day of the session was mostly occupied in the discussion of the resolutions given below. The first, introduced by Dea. J. Potter, elicited a good deal of zeal and warm admonition, chiefly from deacons and lay members of the delegation, which came down upon the ministry like King David's excellent oil. All were glad to see so much concern for family religion, and that ministerial labor was so well appreciated and earnestly coveted for the promotion of piety in families feeling their need of it. The resolution is as follows:—

Resolved, That, under a feeling sense of the worth of souls, we recommend to our ministering brethren the examples of our Savior and his apostles in their manner of preaching—to teach from house to house—to warn the people, as Paul did, with many tears—to go forth weeping, bearing precious seed, filled with the Holy Spirit, assured that they will return rejoicing, in company with a large number of young converts, who have repented of their sins, and had their names written in the Lamb's book of life.

The following Report of the Committee on Resolutions, was received and adopted after interesting and appropriate remarks:

Resolved, That the obligations of Sabbath-keepers to let their light shine, are not only undiminished at the West, but their responsibilities grow with their growth.

This resolution was sustained by Zuriel Campbell and A. W. Coon.

Resolved, That while we teach others the claims of God's Sabbath, we ought to see to it that there be no Sabbath desecration among ourselves.

Advocated by O. P. Hull and A. P. Stillman.

Resolved, That the gospel commission requires of us all the missionary labor in which we, as a denomination, are now engaged, and more; and that the increasing openings for such labor ought to be regarded as so many loud calls upon this Association to come up to the help of the Lord in this work.

Samuel Davison and B. F. Bond spoke upon the above resolution.

Resolved, That the increasing number of converts to the Sabbath observance, and the revolution in public opinion now progressing in society, are so many practical demonstrations that the efforts of the American Sabbath Tract Society are important and effective, and furnish so many loud calls for increasing such efforts.

Sustained by Varnum Hull and Dea. J. Potter.

Resolved, That the Sabbath Recorder has our undivided approval as a denominational organ, and we recommend it to every friend of the Sabbath in the West.

Remarked upon by Stillman Coon and Varnum Hull.

Resolved, That, next to the cultivation of the principles of piety in our own hearts and in our churches, we should cherish a deep interest in the subject of Education, that we, as a denomination may, not only exhibit to the world a consistent and enlightened piety, but exert that moral and social influence in community and the country which shall command the respect of our neighbors, and secure us from religious, social and political degradation; and that we commend to this Association the schools at Milton, Wis., and Farmington, Ill., as worthy of their patronage.

W. H. Redfield and A. W. Coon advocated this resolution.

The preaching on Sabbath and first days was by Elders Varnum Hull and Samuel Davison, alternately. The Milton Church have a commodious meeting-house in progress of building, but not finished; consequently the meetings on the Sabbath day and on the first day of the week were held in a new barn. The congregations were large, and overflowed the place of meeting. I believe a deep religious feeling pervaded these meetings, and I hope to hear of much good following this annual convocation. The collection for the Missionary Society amounts to $41, which, with some other sums, will be forwarded to the Treasurer of the parent Board before the next Anniversary. The collection for the Tract Society was $16 61.

The closing meeting of the Anniversary was held on the afternoon of the first day of the week, in conjunction with the North-Western Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society, which collects for the foreign mission, and disburses its home missionary contributions within its own appropriate field at the West. By this time the missionary feeling glowed with considerable ardor, and the following resolution was passed with a loud and unanimous aye, that told upon every heart:—

Whereas, it has been reported to us that the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society have in contemplation to keep Elder Wm. M. Jones, late missionary of the Baptist Free Mission Society, in his field of labor in Hayti, therefore, Resolved, That we approve the measure, and heartily pledge our full coöperation in sustaining him and their other missions.

Elder Daniel Babcock publicly pledged himself, that if the sum of $5,000 for the proposed mission buildings at Shanghai be likely to be realized, he will pay one hundred dollars to that object.

This Association has a Tract Agency for the western country—Elder Stillman Coon being agent; and by resolution he was instructed to ask for half of the collection taken on behalf of the American Sabbath Tract Society to be returned in Tracts, with another purchase to be made with contributions taken for that object, for distribution in these parts.

The Association ordered their minutes printed in a pamphlet form, and then adjourned to meet in Christiana, Dane Co., Wis., on the fourth day of the week before the first Sabbath in October, 1851; Elder Samuel Davison to preach the opening sermon, and Elder O. P. Hull alternate.

I am delighted with the locations of the Sabbath-keepers in all this country, so far as I have seen them. It can never be said that at the West the Sabbatarians are all in a hard country, and always away in some corner. As a farming population, their situations average with the very best in the West. 'Mine host' (Joseph Goodrich) and some of his neighbors, have a commanding influence in the rising village of Milton, as merchants and mechanics. I am still better pleased to find that our brethren here have not altogether smothered their piety in their teeming wheat fields or other speculations. I believe there is a living stamen here, that is budding, and will blossom and bear fruit an hundred fold. God has surely sent Sabbath-keepers here to stand upon high places of the land; and he will, I doubt not, give power to his witnesses to testify for him in the swelling population that is yet to cover the fertile prairies of the West. I feel confident that the present generation of laborers in God's harvest will see the West return every dollar that the East has done for her, with a hundred per cent interest.

Sons of Temperance.—The National Division of the Sons of Temperance held their annual session this year at Boston, commencing on the 11th of June. The following items, taken from a report, will show the kind of business transacted:—

A very impressive and appropriate funeral ceremony was submitted by Rev. A. L. Stone, and adopted.

A proposition for a new ritual for subordinate Divisions is to be submitted to the several Grand Divisions for an expression of opinion. The matter will be definitely acted upon next session.

The Tract movement was universally popular and efficient. It was reported that over 300,000 of Greeley's, and 150,000 of Cary's Tract, had been distributed—and the work had just begun. M.W.P. Oliver, and P.M.W.P.s White and Cary, were appointed a Committee, with instructions to vigorously follow up the enterprise. They design to bring out one Tract a month if possible.

The obligation was so altered as to remove all doubt about the total abstinence pledge being perpetual. This was declared ever to have been the spirit of the pledge, and it is now made clearly the letter also.

The eighth annual session will be held in Toronto, Canada West, on the third Tuesday in June, 1851.

The whole number of members of the Order in the United States and British Provinces is about 300,000.

THE FOURTH AT ALFRED.

The Annual Exercises at Alfred Academy, for the past few years, have attracted the attention of the public. This year they fell upon the Fourth, and some four or five thousand persons—nearly one quarter of them ladies—assembled to participate and enjoy the exercises of the occasion. The names of some sixty students—male and female—were upon the programme, and the compositions were quite interesting, and adapted to the occasion. The students acquitted themselves with much credit, and reflected honor upon the Institution and the Principals. We forbear criticism or praise where all was so generally acceptable. The officers of the Institution, the officers of the day, and the people of the village, are worthy of praise for the admirable accommodation of the great number of people assembled.

Rev. Mr. Hequembourg, of Dansville, delivered the Annual Oration, which was a highly interesting and able production. The exercises were interspersed with vocal music by the Academic Choir and music by the Andover Band. The Choir and the Band both received commendations from the Assembly.

At the table, in the Academy Hall, after dinner, toasts and speeches, in old-fashioned style, (but without the hurrah and the liquor,) were in order. We insert a few of the sentiments:—

The Pulpits of America.—The originators, sustainers, and perpetuators of this young and glorious Republic. W. C. Kenyon.

Instructors of the Youth of the Nineteenth Century.—Powerful allies to the pulpit. Rev. Joel Wakeman.

The American Press.—Earth's freest and best—long may the Western World be blest with its radiance. Rev. Mr. Rose.

The Educator and the Press.—Adjuncts in human improvement—the one necessary to the other—both, rightly directed, will effect the moral and intellectual renovation of the world.

Alfred Academy—May it continue to rise as a literary institution, till it shall be surpassed by none of any grade, as now it is unsurpassed by any of its own grade. Rev. James Bailey.

Friendship Academy—May the noon of the nineteenth century be but the morning of her glory. Rev. O. B Call

Old-fashioned dinners—old-fashioned days—old-fashioned men, and old-fashioned women, the lever, with the Bible for the fulcrum, to elevate the world. Rev. H. Pattengill.

Southern New York—A hilly and exalted region—an inspirer of quick thought and impassioned eloquence. Rev. T. E. Babcock.

The Students of Alfred Academy—Opening flowers in the wreath of our nation's glory—may they scatter fragrance and beauty through the world. Rev. F. Lilly.

The Patrons of Alfred Academy—May they ever be inspired with that interest in the education of the rising generation, which they have manifested since the founding of this institution. J. M. Allen.

Ladies of our Literary Institutions—May they ever spurn the rule of fashion, and be true and zealous reformers. Rev. Mr. Woodcock.

Colleges—What the sun is to the physical world, Colleges are to the intellectual. W. C. Kenyon.

Academies—Primary satellites, without which the central suns could not exist. J. M. Allen.

Common Schools of America—Little acorns of a future noble forest—give them a goodly culture. D. Ford.

Alfred Academy—A green oasis in the midst of a literary desert—may Heaven's smiles rest upon it, until its refreshing influence renovates this entire region. Rev. Joel Wakeman.

Physicians of Western New York—Eminent in their profession, and always foremost in advaning the educational interests of this country. W. C. Kenyon.

Alfred Academy—In Western New York, like Saul of Israel among his brethren, stands head and shoulders above all her sisters. Dr. B. Babcock of Friendship.

Richburg and Alfred—May FRIENDSHIP ever exist between them. W. C. Kenyon.

All in all, the day and the occasion was a proud one for Alfred. The founders of the Institution and the Principals have much occasion to congratulate themselves upon the success of the Academy, and we are rejoiced to hear that they are reaping the reward of their efforts in substantial patronage. The Institution is an honor to the County and Western New York. May prosperity ever attend it.

THE SOWER TO HIS SEED.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Sink, little seed, in the earth's black mould,
Sink in your grave so wet and so cold—
There must you lie;
Earth I throw over you,
Darkness must cover you,
Light comes not nigh.

What grief you'd tell, if words you could say!
What grief make known for loss of the day;
Sadly you'd speak:
"Lie here must I ever?
Will the sunlight never
My dark grave seek?"

Have faith, little seed; soon yet again
Thou 'lt rise from the grave where thou art lain,
Thou 'lt be so fair,
With thy green shades so light,
And thy flowers so bright,
Waving in air.

So must we sink in the earth's black mould;
Sink in the grave so wet and so cold;
There must we stay,
Till at last we shall see
Time turn to eternity,
Darkness to day.

GOSSIP ABOUT CHILDREN.

BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

I desire now to narrate to you a circumstance which happened in the family of a friend and correspondent of mine in the city of Boston, some ten years ago, the history of which will commend itself to the heart of every father and mother who has any sympathy with or affection for their children. That it is entirely true, you may be well assured. I was convinced of this when I opened the letter from L. H. B——, which announced it, and in the detail of the event which was subsequently furnished me. A few weeks before he wrote he had buried his eldest son, a fine, manly little fellow, of some eight years of age, who had never, he said, known a day's illness until that which finally removed him hence, to be here no more. His death occurred under circumstances which were peculiarly painful to his parents. A younger brother, a delicate, sickly child from its birth, the next in age to him, had been down for nearly a fortnight with an epidemic fever. In consequence of the nature of the disease, every precaution had been adopted that prudence suggested, to guard the other members of the family against it. But of this one, the father's eldest, he said he had little to fear, so rugged was he, and so generally healthy. Still, however, he kept a vigilant eye upon him, and especially forbade his going into pools and docks near his school, which was his custom sometimes to visit; for he was but a boy, and "boys will be boys," and we ought more frequently to think that it is their nature to be. Of all unnatural things, a reproach almost to childish frankness and innocence, save me from a "boy man!" But to the story.

One evening this unhappy father came home, wearied with a day's hard labor, and vexed at some little disappointment which had soured his naturally kind disposition, and rendered him peculiarly susceptible to the smallest annoyance. While he was sitting by the fire in this mood of mind, his wife entered the apartment and said:

"Henry has just come in, and he is a perfect fright; he is covered from head to foot with dock-mud, and is as wet as a drowned rat."

"Where is he," asked the father, sternly.

"He is shivering over the kitchen fire. He was afraid to come up here when the girl told him you had come home."

"Tell Jane to tell him to come here this instant," was the brief reply to this information.

Presently the poor boy entered, half perished with affright and cold. His father glanced at his sad plight, reproached him bitterly with his disobedience, spoke of the punishment which awaited him in the morning as the penalty for his offense; and in a harsh voice concluded with—

"Now, sir; go to your bed!"

"But, father," said the little fellow, "I want to tell you—"

"Not a word, sir; go to bed!"

"I only wanted to say, father, that—"

With a peremptory stamp, an imperative wave of his hand towards the door, and a frown upon his brow, did that father, without other speech, again close the door of explanation or expostulation.

When the boy had gone supperless and sad to his bed, the father sat restless and uneasy while supper was being prepared; and at tea-table he ate but little. His wife saw the real cause or the additional cause of his emotion, and interposed the remark—

"I think, my dear, you ought at least to have heard what Henry had to say. My heart ached for him when he turned away, with his eyes full of tears. Henry is a good boy after all, if he does sometimes do wrong. He is a tender-hearted, affectionate boy. He always was."

And therewithal the water stood in the eyes of that forgiving mother, even as it stood in the eyes of Mercy, in the "house of the interpreter," as recorded by Bunyan.

After tea, the evening paper was taken up; but there was no news and nothing of interest for that father in the journal of that evening. He sat for some time in an evidently painful reverie, and then rose and repaired to his bedchamber. As he passed the bedroom where his little boy slept, he thought he would look in upon him before retiring to rest. He crept to his low cot and bent over him. A big tear had stolen down the boy's cheek, and rested upon it; but he was sleeping camly and sweetly. The father deeply regretted his harshness as he gazed upon his son; he felt also the "sense of duty;" yet in the night, talking the matter over with the lad's mother, he resolved and promised, instead of punishing, as he had threatened, to make amends to the boy's aggrieved spirit in the morning for the manner in which he had repelled all explanation of his offense.

But that morning never came to that poor child in health. He awoke the next morning with a raging fever on his brain, and wild with delirium. In 48 hours he was in his shroud. He knew neither his father nor his mother, when they were first called to his bedside, nor at any moment afterward. Waiting, watching for one smile of recognition, hour after hour, did that unhappy father bend over the couch of his dying son. Once, indeed, he thought he saw a smile of recognition light up his dying eye, and he leaned eagerly forward, for he would have given worlds to have whispered one kind word in his ear, and have been answered; but that gleam of apparent intelligence passed quickly away, and was succeeded by the cold, unmeaning glare, and the wild tossing of the fevered limbs, which lasted until death came to his relief.

Two days after, the undertaker came with the little coffin, and his little son, a playmate of the deceased boy, bringing the low stools on which it was to stand in the entry hall.

"I was with Henry," said the lad, "when he got into the water. We were playing down at the long wharf, Henry, and Charles Munford, and I; and the tide was out very low; and there was a beam run out from the wharf; and Charles got out on it to get a fish-line and hook that hung over where the water was deep, and the first thing we saw, he had slipped off, and was struggling in the water!

"Henry threw off his cap, and jumped clear from the wharf into the water, and after a great deal of hard work got Charles out; and they waded through the mud to where the wharf was not so wet and slippery; and then I helped them climb up the side. Charles told Henry not to say anything about it, for if he did, his father would never let him go near the water again. Henry was very sorry; and, all the way going home, he kept saying—

"'What will father say when he sees me to-night? I wish we had not gone to the wharf!'"

"Dear, brave boy!" exclaimed the bereaved father; "and this was the explanation which I cruelly refused to hear!" and hot and bitter tears rolled down his cheeks.

Yes, that stern father now learned, and for the first time, that what he had treated with unwonted severity as a fault, was but the impulse of a generous nature, which, forgetful of self, had hazarded life for another. It was but the quick prompting of that manly spirit which he himself had always endeavored to graft upon his susceptible mind, and which, young as he was, had already manifested itself on more than one occasion.

Let me close this story in the very words of that father, and let the lesson sink deep into the heart of every parent who shall peruse this sketch:—

"Everything that I now see, that ever belonged to him, reminds me of my lost boy. Yesterday, I found some rude pencil sketches, which it was his delight to make for the amusement of his younger brother. To-day, in rumaging an old closet, I came across his boots, still covered with dock mud, as when he last wore them. (You may think it strange, but that which is usually so unsightly an object, is now 'most precious to me.') And every morning and evening, I pass the ground where my son's voice rang the merriest among the playmates.

"All these things speak to me vividly of his active life; but I cannot—though I have often tried—I cannot recall any other expression of the dear boy's face than that mute, mournful one with which he turned from me on the night I so harshly repulsed him. Then my heart bleeds afresh!

"Oh, how careful should we all be that, in our daily conduct towards those little beings sent us by a kind Providence, we are not laying up for ourselves the sources of many a future bitter tear! How cautious that, neither by inconsiderate nor cruel word or look, we unjustly grieve their generous feeling! And how guardedly ought we to weigh every action against its motive, lest, in a moment of excitement, we be led to mete out to the venial errors of the human heart the punishment due only to willful crime!

"Alas! perhaps few parents suspect how often the fierce rebuke, the sudden blow, is answered in their children by their tears, not of passion, nor of physical or mental pain, but of a loving, yet grieved or outraged nature."

I will add no word to reflections so true, no correlative incident to an experience so touching.

EASTER IN POLAND.

The Fast during Lent is regulated in a great measure by the feelings of the individuals; some reject animal food altogether; others eat milk and butter, to which they add eggs; and some venture to take a little meat or bacon occasionally. In large establishments in the country, the servants generally agree among themselves to what extent they will carry their fasting; and then a deputation waits upon Pan (the master) to know if they may be allowed to fast. The permission is generally granted; and the usual mode of fasting is to reject every kind of animal food except fish. To make amends for this abstinence, they eat oil of rape three times a day with their sauer kraut and other vegetables, and they indulge occasionally in fish and salt herrings.

In this way the working classes, in country places in Poland, pass the whole of Lent; and Good Friday is not distinguished, unless it be as a day of preparation for the delicacies which are to grace the table on Easter Sunday. The farm-servants, who have families, and who are engaged by the year, have an extra allowance of grain. The mill is besieged for days before, every one coming with his bushel to be ground. Their houses are whitewashed within for the occasion, and they generally have something new. They make large flat cakes, called Plaski, nearly of the same materials as our cross-buns, and as much food is prepared on the Friday and Saturday as will last without cooking till Tuesday. A long table is set out in the ordinary dining-room, with all the dishes on it, with a proportionate number of bottles of wine, beer, porter, &c., and a great profusion of hard eggs, and some parts of butter in the form of lambs; but in case the Jews, whose feast of the Passover falls generally at the same time, should be too much flattered, it is absolutely necessary that a roast pig should form one of the dishes. A plate with water, and a brush made of the stalks and heads of rye, are placed on a small table ready for the priest, who comes on Saturday evening, or after service on Sunday morning, to bless the food. Everybody goes to church as early as six o'clock, dressed in their gayest clothes, and they return at nine, when the priest arrives. He merely reads some prayers in Polish from a book, the crucifix resting on his left arm; after which, he sprinkles the table with the water which has been prepared for him, and then retires. No one is allowed to eat till after the priest is gone; but the master takes a dish of eggs, cut in pieces, into the kitchen, and, eating a bit himself, distributes the rest among the servants, who advance according to their age or supposed dignity, the head servant acting as spokesman for the rest in good wishes, &c. After they have all partaken, the master retires, and the cook carries off from the table as much as is wanted for the servants' breakfast, which is no trifle; for, as if to make amends for their abstinence during Lent, the quantity the Polish servants eat during the first three days of Easter is perfectly astonishing.

During the whole of the Easter week, visits are paid and received incessantly; people going from house to house, and eating hard eggs at every place they go to. It is also the custom to present the guests with eggs boiled hard, and their shells painted with various devices. [Ladies' Companion.

"SMALL SWEET COURTESIES OF LIFE."

From a Letter of Wm. Wirt to his Daughter.

I want to tell you a secret. The way to make yourself pleasing to others, is to show that you care for them. The whole world is like the miller at Mansfield, "who cared for nobody—no, not he—because nobody cared for him." And the whole world will serve you so, if you give them the same cause. Let every one, therefore, see that you do care for them, by showing them what Sterne so happily calls "the small sweet courtesies of life," those courtesies in which there is no parade, whose voice is too still to tease, and which manifest themselves by tender and affectionate looks, and little kind acts of attention—giving others the preference in every little enjoyment, at the table, in the field, walking, sitting, or standing. This is the spirit that gives to your time of life, and to your sex, their sweetest charms. It constitutes the sum total of all the witchcraft of woman. Let the world see that your first care is for yourself, and you will spread the solitude of the upas tree around you, in the same way, by the emanation of a poison which kills the juices of affection in its neighborhood. Such a girl may be admired for her understanding and accomplishments, but she will never be beloved.

The seeds of love can never grow but under the warm and genial influence of kind feelings and affectionate manners. Vivacity goes a great way in young persons. It calls attention to her who displays it; and, if it then be found associated with a generous sensibility, its execution is irresistible.

On the contrary, if it be found in alliance with a cold, haughty, selfish heart, it produces no further effect except an adverse one. Attend to this, my daughter. It flows from a heart that feels for you all the anxiety a parent can feel, and not without the hope which constitutes the parent's highest happiness. May God protect and bless you.

DYSPEPTIC PRECEPTS.

1. Eat your bread, especially leavened wheat bread, hot from the oven. Never let it be a day old. Bread two or three days old is a terrible anti-dyspeptic.

2. Take a very little exercise, but let that little be always just after meals, never just before them.

3. Sit up late at night, and be a-bed late in the morning. Early hours and exercise before meals are worse against dyspepsia, if possible, than bread two or three days old.

4. Do not laugh or talk much, nor read aloud, nor sing; but sit moping and thinking about your stomach.

5. Smoke or chew tobacco—I do not say a great deal, because, if you begin, the great deal will be almost sure to follow.

You may heighten the efficacy of the above rules, in various ways—by taking alcoholic drinks, for instance, ever so moderately; or by eating from a variety of dishes at the same meal—the greasier the better; or by taking a snack between every two meals.

But these latter refinements and additions are superfluous. You may rely upon the five precepts to give you, or to keep you, as beautiful a case of dyspepsia as ever baffled a doctor, or worried a patient.

By way of filling up, allow us, if you please, gentle reader, to add:—

1. Let the soles of your shoes be very thin, that dampness may easily penetrate.

2. Seldom if ever ventilate your room, especially your sleeping room. Let the atmosphere be confined and impure as may be.

A Dismal Prospect.—A young lady of eighteen, Miss. B., was engaged to be married to a gentleman of thirty-six. Her mother having noticed her low spirits for some time, inquired the reason. "Oh dear, mamma," replied the young lady, "I was thinking about my husband being twice my age." "That's true, but he's only thirty-six." "He's only thirty-six now, mamma; but—when I'm sixty—" "Well." "Oh dear, why then he'll be a hundred and twenty."

MISSIONS A KINDNESS TO THE POOR.

In view of the amount of money expended in missions among the heathen, the question is sometimes asked, "To what purpose is this waste?" The propounders of this question generally affect a great commiseration of the cases of poverty and wretchedness in our own land; and seem wonderfully distressed, that the money used in sending the gospel to the heathen is not appropriated to the relief of these cases. On the other hand, we think that there is much more reason to deplore the vast sums of money expended in the pursuit of mere pleasure, which, either directly or indirectly, contributes to the very poverty for which such commiseration is affected. It may be remarked, however, that in order to the relief of poverty in its worst forms, and indeed of all the various shades of human wretchedness, no more effectual plan can be adopted than the thorough leavening of society with the principles of the gospel. Where does the greatest amount of misery exist in the world? Authentic testimony shows that it exists in heathen countries. No misery comparable to it is to be found in lands favored with the light of divine revelation. If the systems of religion embraced by idolatrous nations, tended to produce any thing like a fraternal regard for one another's interests; if they inculcated charity, kindness to the sick, justice, mercy, and such virtues as contribute to the well-being of society, one would naturally expect to see some exhibition of them upon occasion of their great festivals. But, on the contray, those festival seasons seem only to render the heart more callous. In the very vicinity of a heathen temple may be found scores and hundreds of human beings, dying of starvation, or gasping in the last stages of disease, and not a soul offers to relieve their wants, or extend to them any sympathy. While half a million of people are sending up their infernal shouts in honor of Juggernaut, and while their offerings are laid with liberal hand upon his altar, the open plain around is covered with the sick and the dying, who have dragged their limbs on weary pilgrimage from the remotest parts of India, and not even near relatives stop to minister to their comfort. The vultures and jackals begin to prey upon them, even before life is extinct in some instances, and for miles around the country is bleached with the bones of those who have perished under neglect, while an atmosphere of pestilence hovers over the whole country. Such is heathenism; such the wretchedness which it creates; such the poverty and wo which it perpetuates; and such, under modified forms, is the aspect of heathenism in all lands. Truly, "their sorrows are multiplied that hasten after another god."

Now, as the best way of showing kindness to the poor is not to give them money—a mere temporary relief—but to dry up, if possible, the sources of their poverty, so the best thing that can be done for the multitudes of impoverished, miserable, distressed souls, that swarm in heathen lands, is to furnish them with the gospel of Christ. For facts show that, wherever the gospel has prevailed, thrift and temporal comfort have followed in its train. Into the philosophy of this we do not propose to enter. But it is a fact, which cannot be denied, that in those parts of Europe and America where the religion of the Bible has obtained prevalence, the people are generally prosperous and comfortable; while in Asia and Africa, and the idolatrous isles of the sea, it is just the reverse. Instances of extreme wretchedness are indeed to be found in what are called Christian countries. But the influence of Christianity, or of Paganism, is not to be measured by extreme cases. The state of community, taken in the mass, is the true index of the ameliorating influence of the one, and of the wasting influence of the other. Besides, it is a notorious fact, that in a Christian land, those classes are the most impoverished and wo-begone, who are farthest removed from the influence of the gospel. In this city, for example, we shall find it true of those who dwell in the region of the Five Points, and those who herd together in wretched cellars and dens—people who, perhaps, never hear a gospel sermon from one year to another. They are, to all intents and purposes, heathen.

But why stretch our charity so far from home? Why not use our money for the benefit of our immediate neighbors? We think it will be found, upon examination, that the supporters of missions among the heathen are quite as charitable at home as those who are so ready to find fault with them—quite as ready to relieve the suffering poor, and much less extravagant in the pursuit of pleasure. But, to answer the question directly, we remark that, "God having made of one blood all nations of men," the Chinese and the Africans are as truly our neighbors as are those who dwell in the same city with us. The law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," contemplates kindness, not merely to those of the same geographical province, as our Saviour beautifully showed in the parable of the good Samaritan, but to any and every one who is in distress, of whatever country. "The field" of love's labor "is the world," and all mankind are our neighbors, nay, our brethren. We frankly confess, that to benefit the temporal condition of the heathen, is not the only nor the principal motive that stimulates our missionary zeal. Yet, if we had no higher motive, we should think it not unworthy of the breast that can feel for the woes of others.

PROF. WEBSTER'S CASE.

On the 18th inst., the Committee on Pardons gave another opportunity for the opponents of the death penalty in general, and Professor Webster's friends in particular, to present any farther reasons they might have for staying the sentence of death. Several brief speeches were made, and a large number of petitions presented, in the Professor's favor. After listening to them very patiently, the Committee made up their report to the Council, the substance of which was, that they could see no good reason for commuting Prof. Webster's punishment, and that they would recommend Friday, the 30th of August, as the day for his execution. This report was adopted by the Council, and is justified in an able and humane address prepared by the Governor. So, on the 30th day of August, John W. Webster will be "hanged by the neck till dead."

The last confession of Prof. Webster was probably an injury rather than a benefit to him. Up to to that period, there existed much doubt, of which the Professor had the benefit. The circumstantial character of the evidence—the possibility that Dr. Parkman might still be alive—the difficulty of believing that Dr. Webster could have participated so freely in the amusements of his family on the evening following Dr. Parkman's disappearance, if he were indeed the murderer—all these things combined to create a suspicion that after all he might be the victim of circumstances or of a foul conspiracy. But his confession dissipated all doubt of his guilt, without producing a conviction of his penitence, or satisfying the public that the deed was committed in the heat of passion. From that time his chance of commutation rested mainly upon the sympathy felt for his heart-broken family. But even that has not sufficed to save him, and he is now to pay the utmost penalty of the law.

Admitting the correctness of all that Prof. Webster has said in his own favor, his case is full of instruction and admonition. If, as he says, the crime is to be referred to his hasty and ungoverned temper, it is an awful warning against the cultivation of such a temper. If his multiplied conflicting statements, which have destroyed all confidence in him and sympathy for him, are, as he says, the necessary consequences of his attempt to conceal the crime, what a lesson do they teach of the self-exposing character of guilt. In whatever light the case be viewed, it is full of instruction and admonition. May its influence not be lost.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 6.

GLASGOW, July 5th, 1850.

Outrage on the Queen—Death of Sir Robert Peel—The Sunday Post Agitation.

Again the nation has been startled by an outrage on our Queen. Seated in her carriage, and surrounded by her guards, she was struck with a small cane on the head, and her bonnet knocked off, by a person with the air and in the garb of a gentleman. Her Majesty was not seriously hurt, and seems to have been but little flurried. She ordered her coachman immediately to drive on; but the guards having laid hold on the assaulter, he was in danger from the crowd that instantly assembled. On the examination, he proved to be the son of a gentleman lately occupying the position of a High Sheriff, and had himself, some years ago, borne a commission in the British army for a brief season. The defense or explanation is, alledged insanity, and the circumstances give probability to the plea; yet it would surely be worthy of inquiry, how we are to account for the fact that insanity, in the present day, has repeatedly assumed this form? Is it a mere love of notoriety, running, through imitation, in the same channel? Or is there any deeper principle involved? There is so much of method in the madness as to lead some of the journalists to consider it right that such subjects should be held so far responsible, and these writers believe that even on such the fear of punishment might tend to prevent repetition of the crime.

Sir Robert Peel's spirit has this week returned to God who gave it. Few names have been so long and so prominently before the world's eye as his has been. Though little above 62 years of age, he had for 41 years been a member of the House of Commons; and, from the first, had no small influence in the counsels of the nation. The son of a wealthy and influential merchant, who was himself 28 years M. P. for Tamworth, and whose wealth was freely employed in qualifying this son for an eminent station in society, and whose influence easily found the means of giving scope and development to the talent he had fondly cherished in his boy, parental ambition had been fully gratified, in having seen him advanced to occupy the station of Secretary of State for the Home Department, ere the grave closed on a father leaving personal property to the amount of £1,200,000. Sir Robert was a man of talent, zeal, and industry, and of commanding sway in the House of Commons. The world gives him credit for having been an eminent statesman. Recalling, however, the high qualifications set forth by Moses' father-in-law, as requisite in the "rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens,"—and believing his estimate to be more in accordance with the mind of God—weighed in the balance, we fear the professedly Christian statesman would be pronounced "wanting." Comprehensive is the enumeration of requirements in the single sentence of Jethro, "Able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness." We question not Sir Robert's ability; we impute not to him unusual covetousness; but his fear of God has not challenged attention, while "expediency," the actuating principle of his public life, as it seems to be that of most in his station, readily sacrificed truth for expected advantages. His moral character (when our relation to God is omitted in the definition of "morals,") has been unimpeached; but the great events by which his public life was distinguished, have upon them the evidence of this sad though prevailing characteristic. His obligations to God and His truth were overbone by a craving for popularity or an undue deference to public opinion. We write not this in the spirit of party, nor from love of detraction, but as demanded by the occasion. Unable to chime with the eulogies of others, it would be more agreeable to be silent, were there not required at our hand some effort at improving the dispensations of Providence. The last public appearance of Sir Robert in Parliament was on the 28th ult., in vigorous opposition to Palmerston's policy; the following evening, when riding, his horse having shied, threw and afterwards fell upon him. He survived three days, but scarcely seems fully to have recovered consciousness, though able apparently to foresee his probable end, as at his request the Lord's Supper was administered to him. In the evening of his death, he recognized the relatives who surrounded his death-bed, and uttered the words, "God bless you," but seemingly nothing more. It might have been instructive to have known what was then the estimate he formed of the aims and events of his life—whether still he regarded, as much as previously he had done, that the voice of the people is the voice of God. But to those who love Moses and the prophets, Peel's dying acquiescence to their value is not necessary; and as for others, they would not believe, even though, for their instruction, he were to rise from the dead.

The Sunday Post Agitation increases. On Tuesday the question will be revived in the House of Commons, by Mr. Locke's motion for the rescinding of the new regulations, under which the delivery of letters on Sunday at the Post Offices has been discontinued. It is therefore felt to be an important juncture, by all interested in the subject. Last week the London Society, which takes the Sunday specially under its charge, at their annual meeting, resolved to petition; and this week they have addressed a circular to every member of the House of Commons, requesting votes for the continuance of the new regulations. Meetings have been held in other places with the same object; and last night one was held in this city. Great efforts had been made, without corresponding success, to make it overwhelming. It was designed to be, as was expressly intimated, "a demonstration;" and besides the usual newspaper advertisements, and intimation from all the pulpits, three several placards were extensively posted, one of which called for "swelling numbers." There was no reference made, on this occasion, to the Fourth Commandment, but they resolved to petition Parliament and address the Queen. Glasgow is called to maintain the foremost place in this cause, and three gentlemen have gone for London, to join others from different parts of the country, to have an interview with Lord John Russell, to ask his continued aid in behalf of Sunday observance. Confessedly, the present time is felt by its friends to be a crisis. A London journal, strenuous in the cause, says that if Mr. Locke's motion be carried, "not only will all the labors of the Sabbath movement be temporarily lost, but it will be in a far more unfavorable position than before the commencement of the struggle." It therefore gives a form of petition to the Commons against the proposed return to the old plan, and urges that the utmost be done.

Not less zealous, however, are those whose pecuniary interests are directly affected by the present arrangement, in their efforts for its overthrow. The proprietors of a number of the London newspapers held a meeting, and appointed a deputation to urge upon the First Lord of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General the rescinding of the new regulations, and two days ago the latter received the deputation. He replied, that all the Ministers were opposed to the change which had been made, and that they had only yielded to the wishes of the Commons; if, however, the House were to reverse its decision, when Mr. Locke's motion came to be discussed, he did not doubt that the Government would comply with the request. The proprietors of the newspapers also resolved to petition Parliament; and nearly the whole of their journals have strongly condemned the new regulations. In our country, the Fourth Estate, as the press has been termed, is powerful; and, through fear of ridicule, (having no principle to enable them to bear up against it,) many will be prevented from joining with "the saints"—as those are in this instance unworthily called who are pleading for a human institute rather than for a divine—and the result may, I think, be anticipated to be adverse to their views. To the press, as it is at present influenced, a pleading for the true Sabbath would not be better received, but its conductors could at least see more consistency in the arguments by which that cause is sustained, and God's Spirit, in their consciences, could witness for His own truth when He refuses to plead for man's error.

Petitions have been presented from a considerable number of towns, and from influential corporations, complaining of the non-delivery of letters, and calling for a return to the old way; while various means have been adopted to lessen the inconvenience arising from departure from it. Messrs. Wilmer & Smith, Liverpool, have announced arrangements for the delivery on Sunday of the whole of their extensive supply of London Daily and Weekly Papers, arriving on that day by train from London. They will be delivered early on Sunday morning.

EXTRACTS FROM A CALIFORNIA LETTER.

SACRAMENTO CITY, May 5th, 1850.

* * * The weather is becoming very warm now, the thermometer being above 90° in the afternoon; but the heat is far less oppressive than the same temperature at home. We have had no rain for a month, and shall have no more till late in autumn; but the plain is well watered, and everything grows luxuriantly. For a long time we have had lettuce, radishes, turnips, &c., grown in the open air, and the finest that I ever saw. All that has been said of the agricultural resources of this country is true. I have seen wild barley, very fine, and already beyond the reach of drought. The river continues brim full, and for a few days has been rising. To all appearances, it will not fall for a month to come. In the mean time, the low places are under water, and no part of the plain can suffer drought.

We have just organized a Medical Association—the first scientific organization that has been formed in the Republic. When fully organized, which will be in a few days, it will consist of fifty members, all regular physicians. Many of them are men of very high standing at home, and advanced in years. Three of our officers have been Presidents of Medical Societies at home. Dr. Morse is to deliver an oration on the 22d inst. Hurrah for the M. D.'s and the new "Republic of the Pacific:" for, before this time, the State may have been rejected, and if so, they will not have to tell us to "stop that knocking." There are many here, who have never entertained the idea of making this country a permanent home, who will make it so should that step be taken—and many from the slave States too. For my single self, I had rather unite my fortunes to that of this "Republic," than be ruled by the power that holds millions of our fellow beings in chains for the crime of having skins not colored like our own. It is not generally thought that, when the test comes to be applied, they will reject the State.

May 12th.—This evening, in company with Dr. Morse, I called on Dr. Birdsal—an old army surgeon, residing here with his family. He has a pretty little cottage, and well furnished with French parlor furniture, very fine indeed. It is perfectly astonishing what rapid strides this place is taking in comforts; but oh! how few women there are—not enough to leaven the dead, heavy mass, of which society here is composed. Quite a number of those vile libels on the sex have found their way here, and they never were so much honored, not even before their fall. What can be said of those men who, having wives at home, or hoping ever to have, lavish their wealth on such degraded creatures? It does not weaken my confidence in human virtue; but I cannot forbear, and never will, to express my utter detestation of the highest crime which can be committed against God or man. Ministers of the gospel, professional men, and merchants, meeting at a bawd's;—at home, passing for pious, upright men, with wives and daughters looking to them with hope and pride. Oh! it is shameful. But it will not always be so. Noble women will banish this moral darkness, and make this country what our own is—one of the most beautiful and happy in the world. * * * * *

May 23d—Restless and dissatisfied I am and must be. Bright suns, soft air, magnificent river, tall forest shades, the converse of men, with every luxury the country affords—all have no power to soothe the spirit separated from the enjoyments of home. I am here, where the extremest verge of the West dies out, and the East—where empire first began, and still holds its untroubled way—meets us. How little was I aware, when we first set our feet on these distant shores, of the trials and dangers that awaited us. We all went forward confidently, and rashly, it is true; we saw our fellows falling around us, "like leaves in wintry weather," but we could not see the end. I am pained to learn of the fall of one who had been my companion in scenes that will never be forgotten. P——, too, of whom I wrote as getting well, died at the Hospital last week.

May 24th. * * I have been attending a trial this afternoon. It is the first slave case that has come up in the country. A man brought a slave to this country to work for hime, but the slave, ascertaining that he was free on this soil, left him to provide for himself. The master claimed him on the ground that he was a sojourner here, and that, under the Constitution, he had the right to pass through the State with his slave. It was argued that he brought the slave here for the purpose of working him as a slave, and he was declared free. Action was then brought against him for violence used in resisting the authorities on his arrest. It was tried before a Justice, and decided that resistance was justifiable under the circumstances, as there was no officer authorized to arrest him. The result is gratifying—for I feared, from the great numbers of Southerners here, that trouble would grow out of the question. There were many who came out with slaves. One of the orators took occasion to eulogize Henry Clay.

The weather still continues delightful. The nights are cool and clear, and the sun has not been obscured, by day, since the first of March. It is, also, very healthy. There is a little fever and ague, but I never saw so few sick among so many. The sickly season will begin in July, and then there will be enough to do.

SHANGHAI CHAPEL.

It will be recollected, that the Executive Board of the Missionary Society, at a meeting held in February last, authorized the Corresponding Secretary to open a subscription to raise $3,500, to purchase a lot and build a Chapel in Shanghai, in sums of fifty dollars each. It may be gratifying to the friends of the cause to be informed of the progress of this subscription. It now reaches the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, all of which, with the exception of one hundred dollars, has been subscribed by members of churches connected with the Eastern Association. The churches of the Central, Western, and other Associations, have not yet been visited; but the Cor. Sec. gives this notice, that he, or some other person duly appointed for the purpose, will, if the Lord permit, call upon them, some time between this and the Annual Meeting of the Society, which takes place in Alfred on the 12th of September. He hopes, that those brethren whom God has prospered, will have their subscriptions ready when he comes, that he may meet with no delay in the prosecution of his mission. As there remains much ground to be gone over, it is suggested, that it might aid the advancement of the work, if the pastors of the several churches would stir up the minds of the members, either by some public remarks from the pulpit, or by what is still better, personally visiting them, and laying their duty before them. Should the subscription not be filled at the time of our Anniversary, the agent will expect to occupy as much time as may be necessary for the purpose after that event. Two hundred pounds sterling of the sum raised, has already been remitted to our missionaries, with which they will at once secure an eligible lot; and it is hoped that the balance will be available at an early day.

THOS. B. BROWN, Cor. Sec.

ANTI-SECTARIAN CONVENTION.

An Anti-Sectarian Convention was held at Oswego last week, of which Lynden King was President, John B. Edwards and Benj. Fish were Vice Presidents, and W. B. Randolph and W. A. Fuller were Secretaries. A Business Committee, consisting of Judge Smith, Rev. Samuel J. May, and A. S. Winge, reported for discussion the following series of resolutions, from which our readers will be able to form some idea of the spirit of the meeting:—

1. Resolved, That the spirit of Jesus Christ is a meek, lowly, obedient, holy, harmless, undefiled, forbearing, forgiving, courageous, self-forgetting, self-sacrificing spirit.

2. Resolved, That while, on the one hand, he who makes however great account of Christ and the Bible, is not a Christian—yet, on the other hand, he who has this spirit is a Christian, even though he may never have heard of Christ or the Bible.

3. Resolved, That in examining evidences of all persons' piety, we begin at the wrong end, if we begin at his head instead of his heart; for while, on the one hand, the spirit of Christ may be in the heart, and much unsound theology in the head, there may be, on the other hand, a sound intellectual faith, when the heart is destitute of the spirit of Christ.

4. Resolved, That to hide a fugitive slave from the pursuit of the Moses Stuarts and Leonard Woods, would be infinitely greater piety than all the books and sermons and prayers of them and the whole brood of inhuman and pro-slavery divines.

5. Resolved, That it is far less useful to be endeavoring to comprehend and explain the nature of Christ, than endeavoring to be like him, and far less useful to be constructing and sustaining theological systems from the Bible, than to be imbibing its spirit and obeying its heavenly precepts.

6. Resolved, That the Gospel of Jesus Christ makes abundant provision for the closer and closer union of his disciples with each other, but makes none at all for their separation; and that the dividing of Christians into parties and sects does no less violence to that ministerial body of which they are all members, than is done to the natural and living body by tearing asunder its constitutional parts.

7. Resolved, That the world is perishing with sin because of the lack of that Christianity which can be supplied only by the abandonment of Sectarianism, and the union of Christians with each other.

8. Resolved, That nothing short of the plain Bible principle, that the Christians of a place are the Church of such a place, can ever be effectually applied to the overthrow of Sectarianism.

9. Resolved, That the Christians who are not prepared to control their Church fellowship by their principles, are not prepared to work for the salvation of the world, either at home or abroad, either in Christendom or Heathendom, and that their first duty is not to labor to multiply the members of Christ, but to acknowledge, love, and honor those who are already His members.

10. Resolved, That for the Churches of a place to construct a Church, instead of simply occupying the Church of such place as God tenders it to them, is to make themselves guilty of rebelliously supplanting the God-made Church with the man-made Church.

UNIVERSAL PEACE.—Mr. Wm. Darby, of Washington, who keeps well posted up in historical and geographical matters, reminds the National Intelligencer, that the last 4th of July brought with it a most important fact in the history of the world, namely, the prevalence of UNIVERSAL PEACE. This, Mr. D. remarks, "cannot be said of another single year since the reign of Augustus Cæsar, or through eighteen hundred and thirty-six years. What seeds of war have been cast into the soil of human passions, and when or where the budding evils may rise and fructify, are beyond human ken; but an event of such importance ought not to pass unnoticed on a day so appropriate for its observance."

ANOTHER FREE MISSION SOCIETY.—The Christian Anti-Slavery Convention recently held at Cincinnati, Ohio, formed a Society, called the Western Home and Foreign Missionary Association, designed to sustain and coöperate with the American Missionary Association in this city, reserving the right to select its own fields of labor, and appoint and sustain its own missionaries, and control its own operations entirely—its surplus funds to be given to the Parent Society.

"Any person of evangelical sentiments, who professes faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, who is not a slaveholder, or in the practice of other immoralities, and who contributes annually to the funds of the Society, may become a member; and any person paying, at one time, the sum of thirty dollars, may become a life member."

"This Society shall not hold or exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction over its missionaries or their churches, but it shall not contribute its funds to missionaries or churches who support, countenance or tolerate slavery, polygamy, caste, or other popular immoralities; and in collecting funds, in appointing officers, agents and missionaries, and in selecting fields of labor, and conducting the missionary work, it will endeavor particularly to discountenance slavery, by refusing to receive the known fruits of unrequited labor, or to welcome to its employment those who hold their fellow-beings as slaves."

FRANKLIN COLLEGE, INDIANA.—This institution, founded by the Baptists, is advertised for sale by the Sheriff, to satisfy an execution of $1,400. The money was advanced by the lamented Hendricks, but after his decease the administrator was obliged to collect the money to settle the estate. The property is estimated at $10,000. An appeal for aid contains this statement:—

"The demand of the Baptist churches in Indiana for an educated ministry, (for such a demand does widely exist,) the wealth of our brethren in this State, the distance of Franklin College from any other Baptist College—two hundred miles from Granville, Ohio, on the east, one hundred and fifty miles from Kalamazoo, Mich., on the north, and two hundred miles from Shurtleff, Ill., on the west—with many other important considerations, which might be enlarged upon, show that this College ought to be immediately disencumbered of all debt, and placed by endowment upon a broad basis."

NEW ENGLAND BAPTIST FREE MISSION SOCIETY.—At a Convention of New England Baptists, held at Lowell, on the 9th, a Missionary Society was formed, bearing the above title. A constitution was adopted and officers chosen. The design of the organization is expressed in the third article of the Constitution: "This Society shall be entirely disconnected from Slavery in all its forms, and shall not receive the known avails of oppression into its Treasury."

RESIGNATION OF DR. BEECHER.—Rev. Lyman Beecher, D. D., has resigned his office as President and Professor of Theology in Lane Seminary, and has been elected Emeritus Professor of Theology. The reasons of his resignation are stated to be his advanced age, (74,) and his desire to prepare his works for the press. It is understood that he will continue to reside on Walnut Hills. His successor is not yet announced

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—The San Francisco Watchman, of May 1st, says that on the 30th of March, the Rev. O. C. Wheeler, Pastor of the First Baptist Society of San Francisco, asked the Trustees of the Society to reduce his salary, from the 1st of April, to the rate of five thousand dollars per annum, being just one-half the sum generously tendered him.

THE WORSHIP OF JUGGERNAUT.—It was announced in the Report of the London Missionary Society, at the recent annual meeting in Exeter Hall, that the East India Directors had sent out positive instructions to withdraw the payment of Juggernaut at an early date, and that they had also instructed the Supreme Government in India to abolish the law forfeiting the property of a native on his change of religion.

TEMPERANCE AND AMUSEMENT.—We dropped in at Barnum's Museum one evening last week, and heard the popular domestic drama of The Drunkard, or The Fallen Saved. It happened to be the evening of a benefit for John Hawkins, the well-known reformed inebriate and temperance lecturer, and we came away very well satisfied, having got the worth of our money in amusement, while adding our mite to the fund for a useful man. Just now Barnum seems to be serving the temperance cause, the public, and himself—killing three birds with one stone.

THE ILLUSTRATED DOMESTIC BIBLE.—Samuel Hueston, of 139 Nassau-st., is now issuing, in parts, "The Illustrated Domestic Bible," by the Rev. Ingram Cobbin, M. A.—a work which we have heretofore commended from an examination of a specimen sheet. The two consecutive numbers now before us fully meet the expectations raised by the specimen. The distinguishing features of this Bible are:—

1. Seven hundred Wood Engravings.
2. Many thousand Marginal References.
3. Three Finely Executed Steel Maps.
4. Numerous Improved Readings.
5. A Corrected Chronological Order.
6. The Poetical Books in the Metrical Form.
7. An Exposition of each chapter, containing the essence of the best Commentators, with much original matter by the Editor.
8. Reflections, drawn from the subjects of the chapter, and giving, in a condensed form, its spiritual import.
9. Questions at the end of each chapter for family examination.
10. Dates affixed to the Chapters for each Morning and Evening's Reading, comprising the whole Bible in a year.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, July 15.

Before disposing of the morning business, a bill was received from the House, conferring the franking privilege upon the widow of President Taylor, which was adopted by the Senate. The Senate also passed resolutions of condolence, and a resolution to print 20,000 copies of the Congressional eulogies on President Taylor, together with the programme of the funeral ceremonies, and the funeral discourse.

The Compromise Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Butler concluded his remarks in opposition to it. Several amendments to the bill were proposed, with a view to engraft upon it the Wilmot Proviso; but without action relative thereto, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The last of the Galphin resolutions was adopted, after a good deal of trying, by a vote of 115 to 63; the resolution says that the Secretary of the Treasury had no business to pay interest on the claim. Mr. Bayly then tried to have the General Appropriation Bill made the special order of the day until disposed of, but failed. Mr. Stephens tried in vain to get in a resolution to adjourn on August 26. Finally, the case of the Delegate from New Mexico was taken up, and Mr. McGaughney made a strong speech in favor of his admission, after which the House adjourned without doing anything.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, July 16.

Mr. Seward presented the proceedings of and resolutions adopted by a meeting of citizens of Utica, N. Y., without distinction of party, upon the subject of Slavery, and against the Compromise Bill, which he read, and moved to have received and laid upon the table. It created a flurry, but was not received.

The Compromise Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Rush spoke in reply to remarks of Mr. Benton on the northern boundary of Texas. Then followed a pass between Messrs. Clay and Benton on the same subject.

Mr. Webster gave notice of a bill for the erection of a monument to Gen. Zachary Taylor in the Congressional Burying Ground.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The only question of importance before the House, was that of admitting Hugh N. Smith, the delegate from New Mexico. It was agreed to close the debate to-morrow. The admission was opposed mainly on the ground that it would affect the rights of Texas to the Territory of New Mexico, and that he is sent by a Convention, instead of a vote of the people.

IN SENATE. FOURTH-DAY, July 17.

Mr. Webster introduced a bill directing the erection, in the Congressional Burying Ground, of a monument to Gen. Z. Taylor, late President, which was considered and passed.

Mr. Webster then delivered his final speech in favor of the Compromise Bill, and Mr. Hale made a brief reply, after which the amendment of Mr. Benton, giving to New Mexico a larger territory than the bill provides, was voted on and rejected. Mr. Foote also brought up some amendments, but nothing was done with them.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

An animated debate took place on the admission of the delegate from New Mexico, the Texan Representatives prophesying blood and thunder from the admission. Mr. Meade of Va. also informed the world, that had President Taylor lived we should have had civil war in sixty days. An amendment was adopted, admitting the delegate for the present Congress, and another declaring that by his admission the House expressed no opinion on the boundary question. One or two propositions for the killing of the bill were rejected.

Mr. Secretary Crawford sent in a letter inviting the House to have him sued in order that the validity of the Galphin claim may be judicially tested.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, July 18.

A resolution to admit the editors of the Southern Press upon the floor, gave rise to a pretty animated discussion, after which it was laid on the table.

Several unimportant resolutions lying on the table were taken up and disposed of.

The Compromise Bill then came up, and Mr. Hunter addressed the Senate in opposition to it, amidst much interruption. He was followed by Mr. King.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

In the House, the admission of the New-Mexican Delegate was farther debated in Committee. Several amendments were rejected, and finally the original resolution of the Committee on Elections, refusing to admit the Delegate, was adopted, by a majority of 6, with 50 members absent or not voting. Then the Committee of the Whole rose, and the final decision came up in the House, but before the question was taken an adjournment prevailed.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, July 19.

The Compromise Bill occupied the attention of the Senate, and led to a very animated discussion. Mr. King left the chair to deliver his views, and defend his motion fixing the boundary of California. He was followed by Messrs. Berrien, Clay, and Foote; and then the vote was taken and lost—a vote which is considered the death knell of the Compromise. Before adjourning, Mr. Clemens proposed to lay the bill on the table, and Mr. Clay proposed to postpone it indefinitely, but neither proposition was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Bissell of Illinois, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial from Miss Dix, praying for an appropriation for the insane, which was referred to a select committee.

Mr. Potter, from the Post Office Committee, made a report to reduce the rates of postage. It proposes that three cents shall be charged on a letter, any distance, prepaid, and five cents if not prepaid. Newspapers, half-cent on each when delivered in the State in which they are printed, and out of it one cent. Pamphlets and Magazines, embracing bound books, two cents for the first ounce, and one cent for each additional ounce. A million and a half of dollars to be appropriated to supply any deficiency which may result in consequence of the modification, and authority is given to coin three-cent pieces.

The subject of admitting Mr. Smith, the delegate from New Mexico, was taken up, and by a vote of yeas 105, nays 94, the House laid on the table the resolution of the Committee of Elections, declaring it inexpedient to admit Mr. Smith as a delegate from New Mexico.

The report of the Committee of Elections, declaring it inexpedient to admit Mr. A. W. Babbitt as a delegate from Deseret, was discussed but not acted upon.

SABBATH, July 20.

The House finally disposed of the New Mexican delegate, excluding him by a vote of 105 to 93.

The resolution declaring it inexpedient to admit A. W. Babbitt as a delegate from Deseret, was taken up, and discussed during the remainder of the day.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the steamer America, arrived since our last, we have one week later news from all parts of Europe.

In England, a great sensation has been produced by the sudden and violent death of Sir Robert Peel, the particulars of which are as follows:—On Sabbath evening, June 29, while proceeding from his residence in Whithall up Constitution Hill, his horse suddenly shied at something passing, kicked up his heels, and threw Sir Robert over his head on his face. Although rendered insensible by the fall. Sir Robert retained hold of the reins, and the animal being thus checked lost his footing and fell heavily upon the top of the Baronet. Several gentlemen passing rendered the necessary assistance, and the ex-Premier was placed in a carriage, and removed to his house in Whitehall in a state of insensibility. All the medical talent of London was soon at his disposal. Their united efforts were unavailing. After lingering till 11 o'clock on Tuesday night, the great statesman expired, in the 63d year of his age. In reply to an offer by Lord John Russell, in the name of her Majesty and of the nation, of a public funeral, the family declined the honor, inasmuch as it was Sir Robert's last wish that he should be buried in Drayton Abbey, with as little parade as possible.

The death of Mr. Browne, M. P. for Mayo, is also announced.

Louis Phillippe is said to be dying of cancer in the stomach, and his relations state that his life can scarcely last a month longer.

The attention of the Government has been called to the treatment which Smith O'Brien has received at Brice Island, but without eliciting anything satisfactory from them. Large public meetings have been held in Dublin, Limerick, and other cities, at which the conduct of Government has been denounced by men of all shades of political opinion.

From France, there is nothing of special importance. The proceedings in the Assembly on Thursday were interrupted by a scene of violence between the members in the lobby. Order was finally restored by the personal interference of the Police. A proposal to suspend all labor on Sunday and all Church Holidays, was among the orders of the day in France! A duel was fought on a recent Sunday, at Versailles, between M. Valentin, a Socialist representative, and a relative, in which M. Valentin was severely wounded. It is said that Louis Napoleon has given 40,000 francs of his late increase of salary to a charitable institution which was languishing for want of funds.

We have dates from Lisbon to the 9th ult. Great excitement prevails there, in consequence of the arrival of an American Squadron in the Tagus, to enforce the claim of £70,000. Twenty-one days were allowed by the American Commander for a final reply. Fears were entertained of a refusal. The Portuguese Government are said to have determined to resist the demand.

The outbreak of an insurrection in Bulgaria is confirmed. The insurgents attacked the Fortress Belgradciezo on the 15th, but were repulsed, with some loss, by the garrison. On a subsequent attack, they appear to have gained possession of the fortress. One account says that 40,000 men are under arms. Late advices state that the Pacha of Widden, having collected a body of troops, attacked the insurgent peasants near that place on the 18th, and after cutting down about 500, dispersed the remainder. It is supposed that this affair will put an end to the rebellion.

FOUR DAYS LATER.—The U. S. Mail Steamship Atlantic arrived at New York on Sunday morning last, having made the passage in ten days and fifteen hours. She brings four days later intelligence, in which, however, we find nothing particularly important. The death of the Duke of Cambridge, on the 8th inst., is announced; but in the general mourning for Sir Robert Peel, this event seems not to attract much attention. A young man has been arrested in Paris for attempting to shoot the President of the Republic. Prussia has made peace with the Dutchies. The Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, have selected Hyde Park. The extent of the various Parks is given in their statement as follows:—

The area of Hyde Park is 387 acres; Kensington Gardens, 200; Regent's Park, 403; St. James' Park, 83; Green Park, 71; Victoria Park, 160; Greenwich Park, 174; making a total of 1,568 acres; while only twenty acres are proposed to be taken for the purposes of this exhibition.

The Steamship Asia, which left Liverpool June 13, arrived at Halifax at noon of June 22d.

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.—The steamer Crescent City, from Chagres, arrived at New York on the 22d inst., bringing California dates to June 18th. There was another extensive fire at San Francisco on the 14th of June, which destroyed over three hundred buildings, and property valued at five million dollars. No other news of importance.

THE NEW CABINET.—President Fillmore has at length completed his Cabinet, which commenced operations with the present week. It is made up as follows:—

Secretary of State—DANIEL WEBSTER, Mass.
Sec'y of the Treasury—THOMAS CORWIN, Ohio.
Sec'y of the Interior—JAMES A. PEARCE, Md.
Sec'y of War—EDWARD BATES, Missouri.
Sec'y of the Navy—WILLIAM A. GRAHAM, N. C.
Attorney General—JOHN J. CRITTENDON, Ky.
Postmaster General—NATHAN K. HALL, N. Y.

The three first on the list were Senators of the United States up to the time of their selection; none were Members of the present House, though all have been Members of Congress, all but Mr. Graham have been Members of the House, and all but Messrs. Bates and Hall have been Senators. Mr. Webster has served eight years in the House and nineteen in the Senate; Mr. Corwin has served nine years in the House and five in the Senate; Mr. Pearce six years in the House and seven in the Senate; Mr. Crittenden fifteen in the Senate; Mr. Graham two years in the Senate, (when he was called home to be Governor;) Messrs. Bates and Hale two years each in the House. Messrs. Corwin and Graham have been Governors of their several States, as Mr. Crittenden now is of Kentucky.

THE LATE STORM.—On Thursday night and Friday morning of last week, the whole of our southern and eastern coast was visited by a genuine hurricane—the severest, say old pilots and sea-faring men, that has occurred at this season during the last thirty years. On the land, its violence was mostly expended in tearing up trees, prostrating crops and fences, and unroofing houses. On the water, it disabled a good many vessels and occasioned considerable loss of life. We see notices of four men and a boy drowned in the Schuylkill near Manayunk, of four men drowned at Conshohocken, of two boys drowned at Phenixville, Pa., and of seven men who are supposed to have perished in the schooner Two Sisters, wrecked twelve miles below Philadelphia.

THE SPIRIT IN NEW MEXICO.—While we hear of threatening movements in Texes, in popular assemblies and by the authorities themselves, to enforce by military aid the jurisdiction of that State over New Mexico, intelligence of as determined a spirit of resistance comes to us from the latter. Our advices from Santa Fe are as late as June 12th. In the election for State officers and members of Congress, under the State Constitution, to take place on the 20th, the candidates had found it necessary to take strong and decided ground against the Texan claim, and to pledge themselves to resist it. Such was the force of public opinion, that no one could have any hope of success who refused to take these grounds. The liberal course of the military officers had rendered them very popular, and an attempt by a few Texan emigrants to foment discontent against Col. Monroe, on the ground of the Indian incursions, proved abortive. The citizens of New Mexico were generally preparing to resist, by force of arms, any military force which might be sent by Texas to take possession of their territory. Information, on which reliance was placed, had been received there, that Gov. Bell and Major Neighbours would be in New-Mexico, with a military force, by the last of August or the first of September, to enforce the Texan claim, and it was this which had aroused the people. So we gather from our St. Louis exchanges. [Tribune

TEXAS AND NEW MEXICO.—Galveston papers of July 10th say that a large meeting, to consider the recent action ot the people of New-Mexico, has been held on the Battle Ground of San Jacinto, Ashbel Smith, President. Resolutions were passed to support the Governor of Texas and enforce jurisdiction over the rebellious territory. A letter from Austin states that the Legislature is convened for August—thus early to give the troops the advantage of the summer months for marching. Steps are also being taken to organize a company of volunteers for Santa Fe.

BOY DESTROYED BY A BEAR.—A most singular and unfortunate event occured in the rear of the Catholic Chapel, in Portland, (N. B.) recently. It appears that two young lads went about a mile into the woods for the purpose of picking berries, when a bear deliberately walked from the thicket and carried one of them off. The ill-fated lad was between 11 and 12 years of age, the son of a laboring man named Coyle, who thus, without a moment's notice, was deprived of a promising boy. Search was afterward made, and the mutilated remains were discovered. The bear was accompanied by a cub, and was evidently its dam.

POSTMASTER SENTENCED.—On Tuesday, in the District Court at Boston, Joab C. Bartlett, late Postmaster at Grout's Corner, Montague, plead guilty to the indictment against him for stealing letters from the mail, and was sentenced to ten years confinement in the jail in that town, instead of the State Prison. The Boston Traveler says that Mr. Bartlett, "soon after his incarceration in Leverett street jail, sent for a friend of his younger days, his Sunday-school teacher. To this true friend he related the situation into which he had been brought by his sin. This friend advised him to plead guilty and throw himself upon the mercy of the court. To this course he assented. The Court could not lessen his sentence, but in consequence of the state of his health and other circumstances, named his place of imprisonment as near his former place of residence as possible."

A TEMPERANCE ARGUMENT.—The Angelica (Allegany Co., N. Y.) Advocate contains the following powerful clerical temperance argument:—

A Catholic priest passed up the line of the railroad, through Alfred, the other day, visiting the Catholic Irish, and finding one of them in a grocery selling liquor, ordered him to abandon the traffic. A few days after, the priest came along again, and finding the man still selling liquor, took an ax, and knocked in the heads and let the liquor out of every barrel in the shop. The Irishman showed some resistance to the priest's movements, for which the priest gave him a smart horse-whipping, telling him, during the flogging, to keep cool—keep perfectly cool.

SINGULAR COINCIDENCE.—Some years ago, says the Tribune, we noticed a paragraph pointing out the singular fact that a majority of our Presidents had left the Chair of State during their 66th year. On reference to authentic documents, we find this true, and now we may add General Taylor to the list. The elected Presidents, and their ages on retiring, were as follows:

Washington retired in his 66th year.

John Adams	66	Jackson	70
Jefferson	66	Van Buren	59
Madison	66	Harrison	68
Monroe	66	Polk	54
J. Q. Adams (one term)	62	Taylor	66

Had the second Adams been elected for a second term, he also would have been 66 on retiring.

CHOLERA AT THE WEST AND SOUTHWEST.—The Cholera continues to rage in Cincinnati. At Nashville it is on the increase. On the 2d inst. there were 18 interments; 14 of Cholera. On the 3d there were 28 deaths from Cholera. At the penitentiary there had been 5 deaths; the other cases, 50 in number, were convalescent, On the north side of the river, in the Edgefield neighborhood, there were 30 odd deaths from the 30th of June to the 3d of July; 16 to 18 being negroes. In St. Louis, during the week ending July 3, there were 68 deaths of Cholera. The reports of the Cholera in Chicago are contradicted by the Chicago Journal of the 6th inst., which says the health of the city never was better, and there were no cases of cholera. The Pittsburgh Gazette of the 9th states that several fatal cases of Cholera had occurred in that city—all strangers who had just arrived in town.

SUMMARY.

At Albany, on Friday evening, a gentleman was robbed of $200 and a gold watch on board of one of the Hudson River boats. The watch was taken from his pillow. At the Albany and Schenectady Railroad Depot, on Saturday morning, a gentleman had his pocket picked of $500 in bills and several thousand dollars in drafts. A lady also was robbed at the depot of her purse, containing a large amount of money.

Rev. Edward L. Parker of Derry, N. H., for many years pastor of the Presbyterian Church there, died on Sunday evening, 14th, on his return from preaching a third or evening sermon in a school-house in an outskirt of the town. His horse fell in going down hill, but did not throw him from his wagon; he ran to a neighbor's for help, and ran back to his horse, beside which he instantly fell dead.

The Delta of New Orleans, July 3, contains a statement received by a merchant in that city from his correspondent in Cuba, mentioning the arrival of two ships with at least 750 slaves each from the cost of Africa. By treaty between Spain and England, these slaves are all free. The Captain-General connives at the practice, however, for a bribe of about $50 on each slave.

The Exeter News Letter states that the Swamscot House, which with another tavern was recently consumed by being struck by lightning, was built by two industrious, enterprising, and money-making milliners of that town, at the cost of $14,000. The expense exceeded their expectations and means, and, becoming embarrassed, they lost all.

The Express Train on the Erie Railroad, recently made the trip from Piermont to Jefferson, at the foot of Seneca Lake, a distance of 281 miles, in eight hours and twenty-six minutes. The speed, during a great portion of the time, must have been at the rate of 40 miles per hour.

Mrs. Holmes and her sister, the latter aged sixteen years, were burned to death at Chatham Four Corners, Columbia Co., on the 8th of July, by the bursting of a camphene lamp. The sufferings of the young lady were awful in the extreme. She died about two hours after the accident.

At Barryville, Sullivan Co, N. Y., a mail carrier, by the name of Alonzo Guire, has been arrested for abstracting letters from the mails entrusted to his care. Quite a number of the mutilated letters were subsequently found secreted in an outbuilding, and others in a pile of wood near the railroad depot. Some of these letters were addressed to firms and citizens of New York, and when mailed contained money.

An unlucky culprit in Boston has been sentenced to twenty-eight years' imprisonment on seven indictments for burglary—four years for each. He was recently serving out a term of two years in State Prison, but was pardoned out.

Eld. Swan, the celebrated revival preacher, is insane. He has been taken to the Asylum at Brattleborough, Vt. When last heard from, he gave indications of returning reason, and hopes are entertained of his recovery.

A man named Henry Eckford was arrested at Utica, Monday, July 15th, for passing counterfeit bills on the Phœnix Bank, New-Haven, and the Duchess County Bank. A large amount was found with him, and he was committed for trial.

Mrs. Henry A. Homes, connected with the mission of the American Board at Constantinople, arrived in this city in the steamer Washington on the 4th inst. with her little son. Her husband remains at his post.

Large quantities of ship-timber, consisting of oak-knees, plank, &c., now lie in our ship yards, and are being worked up into elegant ships, after having performed a journey of eight or ten hundred miles, from the forests of Michigan and Wisconsin.

The Regents of the Smithsonian Institution have elected Prof. S. F. Beard, of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., Assistant Secretary to that institution. He will have charge of the department of Natural History, in which he is an eminent adept.

There has been received at the Philadelphia Mint from California, from the first deposit in December, 1848, to the 29th June, 1850, inclusive, $15,750,000.

Three slaves from Calloway Co., Mo., were recently arrested near Springfield, Ill., and taken back to bondage.

The mackerel fishery this year is said to be unusually prosperous, both in regard to quantity and quality.

Capt. Cutts, of the brig Hayti, from Port-au-Prince, July 5th, says that nothing of any importance has occured in the Haytien Empire. When he sailed it was generally believed that the difficulties between the Haytien and Dominican Government had been finally settled by a treaty between the two powers. The port was very healthy. The new Coffee crop was promising well.

President Taylor was taken ill on Thursday. On Friday, being somewhat easier, he signed the Nicaragua Treaty, and wrote a letter to E. P. Prentice, Esq., of Albany, President of the State Agricultural Society. It is probable this was the last letter which he wrote, as on Friday evening he was further indisposed, and continued to sink until the melancholy hour of his death.

It has been determined that the body of the late President of the United States, Gen. Zachary Taylor, will remain in the Congressional Burying Ground, he having expressed a wish to be buried where he died. Mrs. Taylor will, in a few days, take up her permanent residence in Baltimore.

Dr. Dick, the celebrated religious author, has addressed a note of thanks to the Treasurer of of the Philadelphia Fund for his relief, acknowledging the receipt of a handsome sum, and declining further assistance—having now sufficient to satisfy his moderate desires.

John Cutts, a farmer in Greenwich township, Warren Co., committed suicide by placing the muzzle of a gun to his mouth, and pulling the trigger with his foot. He had been in a dejected state of mind for several days concerning the uncertainty of life, &c.

Wm. B. Astor has been fined $25 for not removing the filth from the rear of one of the houses in Spring St., of which he is owner—having been notified by the City Inspector to have the same cleansed.

Rev. Henry M. Denison, of Brooklyn, L. I., was, on the 16th inst., married to Alice, daughter of Ex-President Tyler. The ceremony took place at the residence of the lady in Charles County, Virginia.

The Post Office receipts at Hartford for the year ending June 30, 1849, were nearly $20,000, or an increase of some $3,200 over the preceding year. Cheap postage is working well.

Hon. Josiah Quincy, Jr., has accepted the invitation extended to him by the city authorities to pronounce the eulogy upon the late President, before the citizens of Boston.

During the recent gale, the ship Elizabeth, of Philadelphia, went ashore near Fire Island Light, and almost immediately went to pieces. Eight passengers were drowned.

MARRIED.

In Hopkinton, R. I., July 11, by Eld. Daniel Coon, GEORGE G. AUSTIN to MARY ANN CRANDALL, both of Charlestown, R. I.

DIED.

In Loraine, N. Y., May 31st, of consumption, Mrs. POLLY STILLMAN, wife of Benjamin Stillman, in the 68th year of her age. She experienced religion in early life, and united with the Baptist Church in Petersburg, but after she removed to Loraine, she joined the Presbyterian Church, of which she remained a member until her death. She was also a believer in the Seventh-day Sabbath, which she had kept for several years. She ever felt interested in the cause of Christ, and rejoiced in the prosperity of Zion. During the last six years, her sufferings were very great, but she bore them all with Christian patience and submission, and was often heard to say, that although weak in body, she felt strong in the Lord. A large circle of relatives and friends have been called to mourn her loss, yet she has left behind the blessed assurance, that she will be one of that number who come up through great tribulations, having their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. She breathed her last without a struggle, like one falling asleep, and in the morning of the resurrection will awake to newness of life. COMM.

In Pleasant Valley, Marquette Co., Wis., May 3d, 1850, of billious fever, after an illness of six days, HEZEKIAH BENTLEY, aged 65 years and 6 days. He was formerly a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, N. Y., but since moving to the West has never joined any church. We trust he has gone to join the church of the redeemed in heaven. He left a wife and six children to mourn his death.

ADDRESS

Of the New York State Free School Convention.

Fellow Citizens of New York:

At the instance of your chosen law-makers, you voted last November on the question of opening your Common Schools without charge or distinction to all the children of fit age residing within your State; and your majority in favor of such opening was overwhelming. In thus voting, you did not imply that the details of the Free School Act of 1849 were perfect, nor were you understood as so deciding. You left the Act open to amendment by each successive Legislature, whenever amendment, not inconsistent with its vital principle, should be deemed advisable. Your last Legislature, in full view of these facts, instead of correcting any errors which in the first reduction of a great principle to practice are well nigh unavoidable, decided to resubmit the law, with all its alledged imperfections on its head, for your approval or rejection this Fall. In other words, the Legislature, while it left its own work undone, required you to do yours a second time. And now the enemies of Free Schools seek to profit by this neglect, coupled with the unfair manner in which the question is resubmitted, and to secure your suffrages in opposition to the Free principle, by harping on and magnifying the defects and inequalities in the details of the law. They would have you believe, that in voting with us you vote against any amendment of the present law.

Against this statement we most emphatically protest. The issue ought to have been fairly and truly presented by the act of last session, 'For Free Schools,' or 'Against' them; for that and that only is the question to be decided. A vote on our side simply affirms the principle that our Common Schools shall be free; a vote against us is, in effect, a vote for a return to rate-bills and trustee exonerations—a vote to reëstablish distinctions of caste in our Common Schools, and subject a portion of our children to the bitter humiliation of being pointed out as district paupers. To revive this distinction is to banish thousands of children from the Schools altogether, and doom them to lifelong ignorance, through the mistaken but natural pride of their parents and kindred. A vote against us in the approaching election is a vote to recede from the educational platform of Massachusetts, in the direction of Virginia, Italy, and Turkey. A vote against the law, as the question is now most unfairly presented, is a step toward popular ignorance, barbarism and moral night. We are confident that no such step will be taken by New York in 1850.

Whoever among you has had patience to follow an opponent of the law through his devious course of reasoning, well knows that his citadel is the assumption that it is wrong to tax one man to educate another's children, unless it be the children of absolute paupers. This assumption, if conceded, is fatal, not to Free Schools merely, but to any Commno Schools whatever. If elementary education be properly and only a parental duty, then the State should leave it wholly to the voluntary and unobserved efforts and combinations of parents. Then the taxation of a district to build a school-house, is usurpation and extortion. Then all the laws which have been passed, making compulsory provision for Common Schools, or intended to increase their efficiency, are impertinent, agrarian, and confiscating. Yet few of our opponents will venture to take this or any other ground of radical hostility to the Free School principle. The difference between their position and ours is mainly one of degree. We abide consistently by the principles on which only can any public provision for education be justified; they stop half way, and, in so doing, condemn their own course in coming so far.

To the assertion that it is wrong to tax A to provide instruction for the children of B, we reply, that we would tax both A and B, for school purposes, each in proportion to his ability, not as parents, but as possessors of Property, and because Property is deeply interested in the Education of All. There is no farm, no bank, no mill, no shop, (unless it be a grog-shop,) which is not more valuable and more profitable to its owner if located among a well educated, than if surrounded by an ignorant population. Simply as a matter of interest, we hold it the duty of Property itself to provide Education for All. Not, therefore, as the children of A, or of B, but as children of New York, her future cultivators, artisans, instructors, citizens, electors and rulers, we plead for the Education of All, at the cost and for the benefit of All. In a community where a single vote cast in ignorance may involve the country in war, in aggression, and untold calamities, Property cannot afford that there be any considerable proportion of ignorant mothers of voters. To whomsoever shall urge the duty of B to educate his children in spite of his relative poverty, we say, Urge upon him that duty to the extent of your powers of persuasion, and we will second you as well as we may.

After the State has done all in its power, there will still remain enough for every father to do in the way of educating and disciplining his children. But this rudimentary intellectual culture of the Common School, is an undertaking, not of individual parents, but of the community—the State, and the State alone, should provide therefor, as it provides for other institutions. It has very wisely declined the care of Public Worship, which in other countries forms a very important portion of its duties and the public burdens, and has nobly assumed the charge of Popular Education, which other Governments too generally repudiate. Having thus resolved that B.'s children shall be educated, not for his sake, but in furtherance of its own policy, and in deference to its own safety, the State would do wrong to tax his poverty to defray the cost of this safe-guard to property. The Common Schools of New York are to her what their respective standing armies are to Russia and Austria; and it would be as fair to support the latter by a head-tax as the former. The child of Indigence who attends the District School is discharging a public duty, and should be as welcome there as the heir of affluence and social distinction. He should be made to feel that his due training and development are the subject of general solicitude. Property can better afford to educate four children in the school house than one in the street. The teacher, when fairly remunerated, is a far less expensive functionary than the Sheriff, the District Attorney, or the Judge. One burglar or thief costs more to the community than all the teachers of an average township. The statistics of our State Prisons prove that at least three-fourths of our criminals are drawn from that one-fourth of our population which has enjoyed the least educational advantages—mainly no such advantages at all. Let our Common Schools be abolished to-morrow, and Property would soon be taxed many times their annual cost in the shape of robberies, riots, and depredations. For every teacher dismissed, a new Deputy Sheriff, Constable or Policeman, would be required. And the dismissal from our Schools of those children of poor but not abject parents whom the Free School law has called into them, would be identical in principle with the destruction of the schools altogether. A large portion of our children would be educated if there were no Common Schools, but these we know would not be.

But we are asked why a citizen who has worked, and saved, and thrived, should pay for schooling the children of his neighbor, who has drank, and frolicked, and squandered, till he has little or nothing left. We answer, he should do it in order that these needy and disgraced children may not become what their father is, and so, very probably, in time, a public burden as criminals or paupers. The children of the drunkard and reprobate have a hard enough lot, without being surrendered to his judgment and self-denial for the measure of his education. If they are to have no more instruction than he shall see fit and feel able to pay for, a kind Heaven must regard them with sad compassion, and Man ought not utterly to leave them uncared for, and subjected to such moral and intellectual influences only as their desolate homes must afford. To stake the education of our State's future rulers and mothers on such parents' ideas of their own ability and their children's moral needs, is madness—is treason to the common weal. They will be quite enough detained even from the Common Schools by supposed inability to clothe or to spare them; but to cast into the wrong scale a dead weight of paternal appetite and avarice, in the form of rate-bills, is to consign them hopelessly to intellectual darkness and moral perdition.

And in truth the argument for taxing in equal amounts the improvidently destitute and the frugally affluent father of a family for school purposes, is precisely as strong for taxing them in equal amounts to build court-houses, support paupers, diffuse justice, or any other purpose whatever. Nay, it is even stronger; for the drinking, thriftless, idle parent, is far more likely to bring expense on the community, in the shape of crime to be punished, or pauperism to be supported, than his thrifty and temperate neighbor, and, according to our adversaries' logic, he should pay more taxes on his log cabin and patch of weedy garden, than that neighbor on his spacious mansion and bounteous farm. The former will probably turn off two paupers to one from the latter, and should be assessed, in a pauper rate-bill, accordingly! And his argument from parental misconduct against the justice of Free Schools is of a piece with the rest.

It is with unfeigned regret that we approach the argument against Free Schools, and indeed against Common Schools generally, which is based on Religion. In the eyes of the true statesman, convictions of religious duty are of inestimable worth, and, even when mistaken, should be treated with all possible deference. Yet, when we see the priesthoods by law established, and not these alone, in one country after another of Europe, resisting the establishment of any system of popular education which is not based on the recognition of their respective dogmas as the undoubted truth of God, we are constrained to recognize and resist an assumption fatal to that universal diffusion of knowledge which is the chief pillar of Republican Freedom. Our State neither affirms nor condemns the dogmas of any church or sect, but commends each citizen, in matters of faith and worship, to the guidance of his own conscience and of such spiritual instructors as his parents in infancy and his own convictions in riper years shall designate. The Common School is not above nor adverse to this, but simply aside from it. It does not pretend to give religious (that is, dogmatic) instruction, far less to supersede it. It simply requires the attention of every child for thirty hours per week to intellectual culture, leaving the entire Sabbath, with Saturday, and the greater portion of the residue, for such purely religious nurture as parents may choose for their children. When the doors of the Church and the Sabbath School are opened, the Common School is closed, and its inmates are clearly qualified by its teachings for profiting by the Sabbath's appropriate lessons. Why, then, should any Church grudge the Common School those thirty hours for secular instruction? What is it to gain by dividing and sub-dividing school districts in such a manner as to render any system of universal education impossible? We entreat you, fellow citizens, to resist the appeal which is made to some of you on religious grounds to vote against Free Schools. To vote us down will not really accomplish the ends of our dogmatic adversaries, for Common Schools will still remain. The religious objection, even if valid, is not relevant to the present issue, and ought not to be interposed to affect it.

We will not, fellow-citizens, urge upon you the priceless worth of Education as an individual possession. Our opponents complain that we harp on the blessings of education, as if they had denied or belittled them. They, too, they assure us, prize knowledge as highly as we do, and feel affronted when we intimate the contrary. Let us, in closing, therefore, exhort you to remember that Fortune is capricious, and Riches have wings, so that no man now in active life can possibly secure his posterity against the chances and changes of this unstable world. The broad domain, inherited but few years since by the child of affluence, who little dreamed that poverty could ever sit by his hearth, has already passed into the hands of strangers, and the late haughty possessor has hardly a shelter for his head. In the sight of the whole community, some are daily mounting from obscurity to the dizziest hights of wealth, while others are falling from a like altitude into the deepest gulf of penury and need. No man can insure affluence nor even competence to his descendants thirty years hence, but any one, by his vote, or his neglect to vote, may say that these descendants, and all who follow them, shall or shall not enjoy that which no gold can purchase, no estate can equal—the blessings of an adequate Free Education. Let us entreat you to esteem this not only worth voting, but working for—to hold it subordinate to no partisan, no personal consideration—to work for such a vote and such a majority as shall put the question at rest forever. Do this, and the canvass of 1850 shall long be remembered as that in which New York proudly vindicated her pre-eminence as the Empire State, and relaid the foundations of her freedom and greatness, in the intelligence, the virtue, the gratitude and admiring affection of her children through all coming time.

EARLY RAILROAD OPERATIONS.

The first Railroad charter is said to have been granted by the New Jersey Legislature, and the first surveys made about forty years ago between New York and Philadelphia. The Legislature of 1814—15 chartered "The New Jersey Railroad Company, for the erection of a Railroad, passing and repassing, from the river Delaware near Trenton to the river Raritan at or near New Brunswick." The Commissioners were authorized "to lay out a Railroad to be composed of either iron or wood for the running of the wheels." The term for the completion of the work was fixed at ten years. Its authors were rather ahead of their times, and the important object of the act was therefore not accomplished, though the project was never abandoned. The first Railroad in the country, we believe, was the "Quincy Railroad for transporting granite from the quarry in Quincy upon a gradual inclined plane to the Neponset River," which flows into Boston Harbor. This was put into operation in the year 1827. The Hudson and Mohawk Railroad Company was incorporated in the State of New York the year previous. Up to the year 1833 nine companies had been chartered for making Railroads, with an aggregate capital of $7,140,000. The West Jersey Railroad Company was authorized to make a road from Camden to Penn's Neck, in Salem Co. in 1831; the Paterson and Hudson River, and the Elizabethtown and Somerville, were chartered the same year, and in 1832 charters were granted for the New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Co., the Paterson and Fort Lee Railroad, and for a road to run from a point on the Delaware, in Sussex County, to any Railroad terminating on the Hudson, opposite New York. The next year the Delaware and Jobstown Railroad Company was chartered. Four of these are now, and have been for some years, in successful operation; and we may add in the same connection, the Morris and Essex Railway, which was chartered at a subsequent session. Previous to the introduction of Railroads, turnpikes were looked upon as great improvements, and no less than 54 were authorized by the Legislature during the first 30 years of the century. ACOUSTICS.

The intensity of sound, like that of attraction, diminishes in the inverse ratio of the squares of the distances of the sounding body, when opposing currents of air or other obstacles do not interfere.

According to experiments made by the French Academicians, the velocity of sound at a temperature of 55° Fahr. is ascertained to be 1,044 feet per second; but it has been variously given by different philosophers. According to Flamstead and Halloy, it is 1,142; according to recent experiments in Holland, its mean velocity is 1,120 feet per second.

A whisper, so far as it goes, travels as fast as the report of a cannon; it also describes equal spaces in equal times. The strength of sound is greatest in cold and dense air, and least in that which is warm and rarefied. During Captain Parry's first voyage, in lat. 74° 40′ N., people might be heard conversing distinctly, in a common tone of voice, at a distance of one mile.

Sound travels through different media with various velocities. Through air, at 1,130 feet per second; water, 4,900; cast iron, 11,090; steel, 17,000; glass, 18,000; wood, 4,636 to 17,000.

Two sets of sonorous vibrations, of equal intensity, and encountering each other in opposite phases of vibrations, will interfere and become mutually checked; and thus silence be produced by the conflict of two sounds. Sonorous vibrations, on impinging on a plain surface, are reflected from it in such a manner that the angles of incidence and reflection are equal.

A perfect echo ensues after the lapse of 0.1 second.

Sound is reflected by curved surfaces in the same manner as light and heat.

RETURNED CALIFORNIANS.

The Edgartown (Mass.) Gazette mentions the return to that place from California of Messrs. S. H. Fisher, William Cleveland, Wm. Simpson, Ichabod Luce, and Chas. Vincent. The two latter are said to have brought home some $4,000 or 5,000, together with an additional sum of $5,000 remitted by citizens of Edgartown now in California.

The company of the bark Sarah from Edgartown disbanded upon their arrival at California, forty-five of them going to the mines at an expense of $5,000, and after working twenty-eight days and obtaining only $800, they gave up in despair. Some of the company had engaged with mining speculators, at $150 per month. Capt. Morse of the Sarah compromised with some of the Company, canceling their engagements for the sum of $100 each, and with others without receiving any equivalent. Capt Morse intended to fit the Sarah for a whaling cruise.

A letter received at Nantucket from San Francisco, says:—There are thousands here, from Nantucket and elsewhere, who would give all they possess to be placed back where they came from. Still, fresh crowds are landing every day. There has been hitherto a great lack of females here, but at this time there are ship loads of them arriving from Sidney. I have seen them sold to any one who would pay their passage and take them off the landing. There are about 450 sail of vessels lying in port, jostling each other, and making work for the spar makers and lawyers.

If you wish to be respected by every one, respect yourself, and treat everybody respectfully, and your wishes will be realized.

SHAGREEN LEATHER.

This singular and valuable leather is a manufacture almost peculiar to Astracan, where it is prepared by the Tartars and Armenians. For making shagreen only horses' or asses' hides are taken; and it is only a part, from the crupper along the back, that can be used for this purpose, which is cut off immediately above the tail in a semi-circular form, about 34 inches upon the crupper, and 28 along the back. These pieces are first soaked in water until the hair is loose and can be scraped so thin as not to exceed a wetted hog's bladder in thickness, and till all the extraneous matter is got out, and only a clean membranous pelt remains. The piece is then stretched tight on a frame, and kept occasionally wetted, that no part may shrink unequally. The frames are then laid on a floor with the flesh side of the skin undermost, and the grain side is strewed over with the smooth black hard seeds of the Alalenta or goose foot, and a felt is then laid upon them, and the seed trodden deeply into the soft moist skin, which gives the peculiar mottled surface for which shagreen is distinguished. The frames, with the seed still sticking to the skin, are than dried slowly in the shade, till the seeds will shake off without any violence, and the skin is left a hard horny substance with the grain side deeply indented. It is then laid on a solid block covered with wool, and strongly rasped with two or three iron instruments, till the whole of the grain side is shaved, so that the impression of the seeds is very slight and uniform; the skins are then softened, first with water, and then with warm alkaline ley, and are heaped warm and wet on each other, by which means the parts indented by the impression regain much of their elasticity, and having lost none of their substance by paring, rise up fully to the level of the shaved places, and thus form the grain or granular texture peculiar to the shagrren. The skin is then salted and dyed.

RICHARD COBDEN.

Mr. Cobden would never have become the chief of a party comprising the most opulent capitalists of England, if he had not proved beforehand that he had a talent for business, and that he had no need to enter into public life to make his fortune. He quitted his manufactures before he had time to do more than lay the foundation of a good fortune; he was, however, already counted among the rich manufacturers of Manchester when he entered on his political career. Till 1835 he had appeared exclusively occupied with the business of his trade; nevertheless he paid great attention to political affairs. His leisure was entirely devoted either to repair by assiduous study the inconveniences of a defective education, or to complete, by frequent travels in France, Belgium, and Switzerland, the information gathered in the closet. The first sign that Mr. Cobden gave of a certain political aptitude, was a small pamphlet, written in 1825, in opposition to Mr. Urquhart, who was urging a war against Russia. The Manchester manufacturer bacame the advocate of peace; turned into ridicule the pretensions of diplomacy; opposed the absurdity of the old doctrine of the balance of power; and endeavored to establish it that the mission of England was to make commerce with the whole world, and to war with no one. This pamphlet, soon followed by another, written in the same spirit, had a marked success in Manchester, and he quickly obtained a decided influence among the industrial aristocracy of Lancashire. The first use which he made of this influence had for its object the foundation of an Athenæum, at the inauguration of which Richard Cobden, the man who was hereafter to deliver so many speeches, made his debut as an orator. He was then thirty-one years of age. [Work. Man's Friend.

OHIO HOG'S BRISTLES.

Speaking of bristles, Peter A. Brown says: "They form a much more important item in the rearing of hogs than one would at first suppose. The quantity of bristles now used in this country is immense; recollect that they are not only indispensable to our daily wants, in housekeeping and the toilet, but that there is scarcely a manufacturer or a tradesman who can do without them. We at present import them from France, Germany, Flanders, and Russia, instead of supplying them to all the civilized world as we ought to do, and as we might do. I have been for more than a year engaged in examining the hair, fur, and wool of the Mammalia, under the microscope, and while on the subject of bristles, I was a little surprised to find that all my specimens, from all the places above mentioned, were inferior in strength to those from Ohio. Even the bristles of the wild boar of Russia was inferior to the Ohio one in tenacity. The French bristle is the longest, measuring 11 inches and 7-10; but it has a diameter of 1-33 of an inch, and strength in proportion.

"I take the more interest in making these facts known, as I feel satisfied that the condition of the bristles may be improved by a treatment of the live hog that would not injure, but rather improve the meat. The Flanders bristle is short and fine, being only 4½ to 5 inches in length, and having a diameter of only about 1-100 of an inch; but it is much esteemed for manufacturing printers' brushes, and an immense quantity are therefore imported. These might be produced in this country with very little pains, and with great profit."

Why Epidemics rage at Night.—It was in one night that 4,000 perished in the plague of London of 1665. It was at night that the army of Sennacherib was destroyed. Both in England and on the continent a large proportion of the cholera cases, in its several forms, have been observed to have occurred between one and two o'clock in the morning. The "danger of exposure to night air" has been a theme of physicians from time immemoral; but it is remarkable that they have never yet called in the aid of chemistry to account for the fact.

It is at night that the stratum of air nearest the ground must always be the most charged with the particles of animalized matter given out from the skin, and deleterious gases, such as carbonic acid gas, the product of respiration, and sulphuretted hydrogen, the product of the sewers. In the day, gases and vaporous substances of all kinds rise in the air by the rarefaction of heat; at night, when this rarefaction leaves them, they fall by an increase of gravity, if imperfectly mixed with the atmosphere, while the gases evolved during the night, instead of ascending, remain at nearly the same level. It is known that carbonic acid gas, at a low temperature, partakes so nearly of the nature of a fluid, that it may be poured out of one vessel into another; it rises at the temperature at which it is exhaled from the lungs, but its tendency is towards the floor or the bed of the sleeper, in cold and unventilated rooms.

An American in India.—Mr. Fitz Edward Hall, a son of Daniel Hall, Esq., of Troy, in 1846 graduated at Harvard College, and went out to India with letters of introduction, to Bishop Wilson, of Calcutta, from Edward Everett and others. He devoted himself to Oriental languages and literature—to the Sanscrit, the Hindoo, Bengalee and Persian languages, and to the learning of the East. He had the good fortune to attract the attention and secure the good opinion of Bishop Wilson, and of the distinguished Rajirida, Dutt, and by the aid of the former was elected a member of the Royal Asiatic Society, founded by Sir William Jones. He has since been elected coadjutor to the President of the English college at Benares, a city on the Ganges, of some 650,000 inhabitants, and receives a handsome salary. The institution is under the patronage of the East India Company.

News from Oregon.—It will be remembered, says the Sacramento Transcript, that Rev. Mr. Whitman, together with his lady and family, were massacred by the Indians, at the Mission above the Cascade, in the Kyose country, Oregon, some time in the year 1847. There were some eight or ten families temporarily stopping in the place at the time, the male members of which were also murdered. The women and children were taken prisoners by the Indians, and the young women compelled to become the wives of some of the chiefs. Soon afterward Major Ogden, commander at Vancouver's Island, assisted by Gen. Gilman, started with a file of soldiers into the Indian country, to rescue the unfortunate prisoners, and punish the Indians for the outrage. They found the Indians, gave them battle, in which many of those engaged in the murder at the Mission were killed, and finally succeeded in recovering the women and children, some fifty in number, by hiring the savages to give them up. Thus the matter ended for the time. But Gen. Lane has taken decided steps to have a more satisfactory settlement. In March last, he formally demanded of the Indians the remainder of the murderers, and nine of them, including two Catholic Priests, have been delivered into the possession of the Government of Oregon. By proclamation of the Governor, the Legislature of the Territory was convened on the 13th of May, at Oregon City, to give the prisoners a trial, and it is thought that ere this they have been convicted and put to death.

Singular Suicide at St. Louis.—The St. Louis Intelligencer says that a German named Henry Lammert, who resides near the head of Garondolet Avenue, committed suicide last Monday night by shooting himself with a pistol loaded with water! In the day he had bought the pistol, and at eight o'clock at night, while in his brother's room, he took an ordinary charge of powder, which he poured into the pistol, ramming a wad down after it. Then nearly filling the barrel with water, he secured it firmly with a second wad, after which he handed $5 to his brother, with a request that he would give it to some one to whom it was due, and rushed into his own room. At the report of the pistol, when his brother followed him, he found him lying on the floor, with his upper lip, the upper part of his face, and nearly half of the skull, blown away. The effect of the pistol's contents were most terrible. Lammert has been married but four months. Jealousy is among the causes adduced for his self-destruction.

A Magnificent Present.—By a letter just received from M. Vattemare, says the Albany Argus, and dated at Washington on the 2d inst., we are informed that he has just received advices from his agent at Paris, stating that the French Government have made a donation to the New York State Library of a copy of the celebrated Gallery of Versailles—a work containing several thousand historical engravings. "To give you an idea of this magnificent present (adds Mons. Vattemare) I need only say, that each copy occupies a case three feet square by two and a half high."

Cost of Drink in England.—One of the orators of the Suffrage Association in England, urging his fellow operatives to buy freeholds, and thus obtain the right to vote, says:—

"The people of this country swallow two Birminghams every year. No oppression was so great as self-oppression, no pauper so great as a self-pauper; and if the working classes would not make some sacrifice in order to obtain freedom, they did not deserve to have it. As an example for imitation, he presented himself. He had not only a vote for Birmingham, but three freeholds for counties, and he was determined to have more. He was glad they had determined to rescue South Derbyshire. He would become a voter for South Derbyshire."

Rev. Alexander Denoon died at Caledonia, Monroe County, on the 17th ult., at the age of 80 years. He was a native of Inverness, Scotland. He settled in Caledonia in 1806, and was the first Minister ordained west of the Genesee River in this State.

The foundation walls of the grand Jenny Lind Concert Hall, in New York, are completed, and 150 men are now employed in its erection. The total cost is estimated at $80,000, and it is expected that by the middle of September next it will be ready for occupancy. The building, with a length of 150 feet and a breadth of 50, will be 90 feet in height, making the finest musical hall in the country. It is stated that Mr. Barnum has stipulated for the payment of $15,000 for the use of the hall while Jenny Lind shall remain in this city.

The St. Joseph's (Missouri) Gazette estimates that seventy-five thousand persons have started across the plains for California this season, all of whom are from the valley of the Mississippi.

The Merchents' Exchange of New York is to be sold at auction on the 29th inst. It rents for about $50,000 a year. Its mortgages and other liabilities amount to $964,000.

Littell's Living Age.

PROSPECTUS.—This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope, and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contribution to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia, and Africa into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as merchants, travelers, and politicians, with all parts of the world; so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening, through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selections; and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive to their wives and children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste.

Terms.—The Living Age is published every Saturday; price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

☞ To insure regularity in mailing the work, orders should be addressed to the office of publication.

Clubs, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:

Four copies for - - - - - - $20 00
Nine " " - - - - - - 40 00
Twelve " " - - - - - - 50 00

Complete sets, in 24 volumes, to the end of March, 1850, handsomely bound, packed in neat boxes, and delivered in all the principal cities free of expense of freight, are for sale at forty-eight dollars.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Judge Story—Chancellor Kent—President Adams.

I have read the prospectus of "The Living Age" with great pleasure, and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage long enough, and large enough, and securely enough to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more; it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character. Joseph Story.

Cambridge, April 24, 1844.

I approve very much of the plan of your work, and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit, and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day. James Kent.

New York, May 7, 1844.

Of all the periodical journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this, by its immense extent and comprehension, includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF A TOURIST—No. 3.

LONDON, July 8th.

If one be not endowed with a pretty good share of patience and capability of enduring all kinds of irritaments, traveling must be far from the pleasant amusement it is imagined by those who, conning over a book of travels by their own fireside, come to the settled conclusion, that it is "delightful to see the world." Comfort and economy pull different ways; and, especially in England, where the 'authorities that be' seem determined to make them as antagonistic as possible, it is very difficult to choose the 'golden mean.'

I have just passed through no small trial of the above-named qualifications, during a ride in the third-class train from Reigate to London. The thermometer being above 80°, the cars were of course packed as full as possible, and, though ventilated well, were almost unendurably close. The principle of construction in the English carriage seems to be, to get as much sitting room as possible in a given space. Around the side of the carriage is a row of wooden benches, with their backs to the windows, the occupiers of which kindly protect those on the inner row of similar benches from any danger of catching cold from the draft, or being in any way troubled by an excess of fresh air—an article that Englishmen generally seem singularly averse to. I have got into an omnibus in London, on a beautiful spring day, when the air seemed a positive balm for all bodily evils, and on lowering a window, the middle-aged lady next me petulantly exclaims, "I can't sit here with that window open, sir." You would perhaps hardly believe, that I have been obliged to ride for miles, in a crowded omnibus, on a warm and pleasant day, with every window tightly closed! If by good luck I got into an empty 'bus, the next one in was almost sure to ask, "Would it trouble you, sir, to close that window?" You may readily conceive that, with such aversion to a draft, my fellow travelers found the closeness of the vehicle no inconvenience. I did; and while some of the more fleshy and perhaps less fastidious Johnnys, sought the corners and farther ends of the carriage, I tried to get a place as near a window as possible. The best, unoccupied, was opposite them on the inner row of seats—on one side was a woman with a small family—on the other a very fat gentleman, and directly in front two ladies' maids, who had met for the first time in years, if one could judge by the amount of past events they had to relate. One had lived in the country—the other plumed herself on the fact of having been a city lady. For a whole hour there I sat, hearing nothing, and able to think of nothing, but narrations of city life below stairs, and the still duller responses the country lady was able now and then to edge in between the yarns of her more voluble companion. Altogether, railroad traveling in England is the most unpleasant kind of locomotion I have tried. The second-class varies from the third only in being still more confined, and being divided into compartments, giving the Englishman, what he loves so well, separation from the rest of humanity—seclusion, he calls it. To these add cushioned seats, and you have the first class—the ne plus ultra of English traveling—precisely like those antiquated cars thrown off from our railroads many years ago.

The conservatism of the English nation seems to imbue all things, from religion and the arts to the merest mechanism. To improve their own conceptions, is a matter not to be ventured on without care and much consideration; but to adopt those of another nation, something hardly to be looked for. They are very fond of laying excessive vanity to the charge of the Yankees, but their fault is a worse one. Being conceited implies previous comparison of one's self with others in some degree, and measuring by another standard than our own; but the Englishman has not got so far as that—he never thinks of any body else—it never occurs to him to trouble himself about what the rest of the world are doing, unless they happen to tread on his toes, or in some other way offend his dignity. Taking himself to be the key-note by which the scale of creation is arranged, he considers all discords with it to be interruptions, which he endures patiently, because they are not of sufficient importance to be vexed at. I am not speaking of all Englishmen, but of the characteristic John Bull—such as a majority of the nation are. The true English gentleman is a noble specimen of humanity, and I have had the good fortune to become acquainted with several such—men whose kindness, sympathy, and liberality, I shall never cease to be grateful for. Recollecting them, I cannot include the nation in an indiscriminate censure, on this or any other point; yet none the less true is it, that they are, generally, blind to all merit but their own, taking it as a matter of course, that other nations must be inferior to them, and very gravely assuring you, that you must be mistaken, if you suggest a superiority in any other in a matter of moment. It used to annoy me a little at first, but I soon learned to think that theirs was not the only tribunal at which nations were judged, and that it was of little importance whether or not they were just in their opinion, so long as the world could judge impartially.

Some days ago, I visited Hiver Castle, Kent—the residence of Anne Boleyn before her marriage to Henry VIII. It is a fine old building, of grey stone, and in excellent preservation, but occupied as a farm house. The moat still remains, but the drawbridge is replaced by a brick arched bridge, while the lawn in front is partly occupied by a stable and wagon sheds. There is a fine old gateway, with portcullis and screen leading into an open court-yard occupying the center of the castle, and a vine trained up the wall has grown over and through the portcullis, entangling and clogging it completely. The whole was a fine illustration of the triumph of the spirit of peace, though I must confess I was a little angered at the unpicturesque desecration of a place interesting from its historical associations, as well as its age, by being devoted to the purposes of 'utility.' I asked to be shown the interior, and a little black-eyed girl accompanied me through the rooms of most interest. We entered the old dining hall—a capacious, lofty room, whose walls echoed drearily with the ring of my heels on the stone pavement. A wooden screen, partitioning a corner of the room off, showed it to be devoted to some base uses, and the clothes were drying on lines stretched across it. We passed up an oak staircase to the room that Anna of Cleves, another of Henry's wives, died in. This was neatly papered, and from the articles of dress on the walls and bed, seemed to be the girl's bed-room. I turned from it in disgut, and passing through some rooms of less importance, entered the room once occupied by the unfortunate Anne. The walls were paneled with oak, which gave it a sombre appearance by its dark brown hue. The large window was covered by a climbing rose, which reached its branches into the casement, and shut the light out partially. The old furniture was still remaining, though the chairs would hardly hold together, and the bed, like that in the other room, showed a most laudable (?) desire in the inhabitants of the castle to turn everything to good account. I walked out on the terrace which overlooked the court-yard, and where, they told me, she used to walk. How many moonlight nights the royal lovers might have broken far into there, I know not—the walls retained no record of past hours, save the universal mark of time. There was no echo of the protestations and vows usual in such cases, and all was left to my imagination, which did not fail to work more vigorously from the lack of material to build a reasonable conjecture with. From here we passed into the old ball-room, the dimensions of which spoke poorly of the numbers who used to assemble, or of the agility of the dancers. It was a long, narrow, low room, with the beams of the ceiling exposed. This room was also paneled with oak, carved in a rich, quaint style. In one end my guide pulled up a trap-door, showing a dungeon ten or twelve feet deep, and perfectly dark and close—more like a grave than a room. Crossing the court-yard, we went up a winding staircase, past the little cell where the warder used to sit and look out through his narrow window, to a room in which hang the portraits of the family, as well as the King's. I could get no idea of the Lady Anne's looks from her portrait, which might have been painted for any body else; so, merely acquiescing in the statement of its being her likeness, I passed up a stone staircase to the top of the building, commanding a fine view of the surrounding country, and from which of course she used to watch for her lover's approach. Assailed as the memory of the hapless Queen has been with all the evil that religious and party rancor could suggest, I shall nevertheless believe her injured, innocent, &c.; in fact, I see no need of spoiling all the romance of the history and the place, by believing the stories handed down from a time when the truth was with difficulty got at and hardly treated when found.

Having finished our drawings, we packed up and started for the railroad station a little before sundown, taking the footpaths which intersect the country in every direction, running along the edges of the fields, by the high hawthorn hedges. The wheat was just beginning to show the ear, and the red poppies glowed through its rich green with a most intense brilliancy. In some places the field seemed perfectly crimson where they showed themselves above the wheat in great quantities. Occasionally, a wild rose reached out from the hedge, as though escaping from confinement, and the bank on which the hawthorn was planted bloomed with the forget-me-not and the little white daisy, a very different thing from that which we call by that name. The day had been a very beautiful one—still and clear, except that the sky was covered with a thin veil of thread-like cirri, tempering the sunlight to a milder, softer tone; and now, as the sun was going down, they glowed in pale gold, with occasional fiery fragments. Now and then a breath of wind came to us, bearing the fragrance of the fields of beans, mingled with the less rich scent of the hawthorn; and, as we rose upon a gentle elevation, we could look for miles over the broad, level landscape, dotted with here and there a windmill or a village church amidst its trees. There were new-mown hay-fields, with some score or so of "lads and lasses," raking and loading; and the sun-browned farmers greeted us with a "good day, sirs," as we passed them, and the girls diffidently stopped their merriment till we should have passed, obstinately refusing to return the jests of the less bashful young men, or to retaliate their peltings of hay. Our way lay through Edenbridge, a characteristic old English village, its little low red tiled houses, with jutting fronts, and the marvelously painted sign-board of the tavern, reminding one of some of Hogarth's pictures. We passed several of the hop-fields for which Kent is so famed, but they were not far enough advanced in growth to be seen to advantage.

The season of fruit has fairly set in, in London, and the markets are filled with the most beautiful strawberries and cherries, with other fruits which are too costly at present to notice. A walk through Covent Garden, the great fruit market, is as tempting as a ramble through the Hesperides could have been. There are strawberries by the wagon load, and of the most wonderful size, some of them certainly as large as a small peach, and selling at from 6d to 1s 6d per basket holding about a pint. There are peaches from £1 to 30 shillings per dozen. Apricots the same; grapes 5 and 6 shillings a pound.

Apropos of markets—a stroll through Tottenham Court Road, on seventh-day evening, well repays the stranger, if he does not get his pockets picked. It is a street corresponding in many respects to our Bowery. For a mile, along the west side, there is a row of shops (stores) of all kinds—butchers, bakers, tea-dealers, grocers, &c. These are thrown wide open in front, and the wares spread out to view on stands, illuminated with enormous jets of gas, looking at a little distance like torches. On the other side of the sidewalk, is a row of stands or stalls presenting a similar show, though much more varied. I went through the street about eleven o'clock, the hour when the outside venders are obliged to pack up their goods, and of course when they are most eager to sell. Here was a fruit stand, the woman crying most lustily, "Strawberries tuppence a pottle (a small conical basket,)—gooseberries three ha'pence a pint." There, a man with oysters on one end of his stand, and green peas on the other, bawling, "Penny a lot, oysters—sixpence a peck, peas—almost gone." Here was a stand of toys, the vender thereof assuring you, that he sold sixpenny toys for a penny; there a woman selling boiled 'winkles, nuts and oranges; and next a woman, holding on the lamp-post with one hand, and stretching up the other to display the length of some stay laces, which she called, as loud as her drunkenness would permit, at two a penny, in the interim making love to her next neighbor, the man with coral beads at a penny a string, which he averred to be the cheapest penny'orth ever offered. A blind-man stood on the edge of the pavement, with his face screwed down to a caricature of resignation, and in perfect silence holding out his hat. A little farther on was another, singing something very lustily, in a voice somewhat like an injured organ-pipe, while he rapped the sidewalk vigorously with a cane, the better to attract attention. The walk was crowded with folks come a marketing—black-eyed house-maids, with well-dressed mesdames, prying and peering about among the stands, threading and edging their way among the mass of humanity as well as they could; while at short distances stood the policemen, towering above the crowd, and looking stolidly and unmoved over it. In one place, a group had gathered round a ballad singer, whose tattered garb and almost bootless condition, told that his muse was coy, or would give him nothing more substantial than her favor. He was singing a song of a lost child, and I could not help thinking he was telling his own story, for he had a sad intellectual look, as though the sorrow of years had moulded his mind to a strange condition. In a by street, a man exhibited some phantasmagoria to numbers of admiring urchins for sundry halfpence. Near the door of an ale house, three degraded girls danced in each other's embraces, singing, shouting, and laughing, as though they were empresses, and had no empire to care for; and, seeing a group gathered around the door of the tavern, looking in, I too looked in, and saw the bar-room full of men and women in almost every stage of intoxication, drinking ale, rum or gin, as their circumstances admitted. A husband and wife sat on one bench, with a pint pot of ale between them, nodding and jabbering to each other very cosily; and a wretched looking woman, half drunk already, and holding a glass of rum in her hand, was abusing vociferously a man whom she held by the button-hole, and who was too drunk to get away. It was, all together, a perfect miniature pandemonium.

London is filled now with political refugees from the Continent, who have gathered here to wait the renewal of the struggle between the people and those who stand between them and their birth-right. They find no sympathy from the generality of the English, and as most of them are poor and unable to obtain a subsistence where the market is already overstocked with labor, the destitution among them is very great. Men who were wealthy, respectable merchants or tradesmen at home, are glad to obtain work on the streets and sewers of London, and many are obliged to lie out in the parks for want of means to procure lodgings. I have become acquainted with a number of the better class of them, and find them in all cases to be worthy, intelligent, high-spirited men, waiting with burning, indignant spirits, for an opportunity to make a last effort for the right to think and breathe as and where they will. This summer, they say, there is to be another attempt at revolution. They are deliberate, and seem determined not to be hurried into a premature rising. Heaven help them to succeed.

MAKE NOT POVERTY'S CUP TOO BITTER.

Ye may harness the lightning, till, trained like a steed,
It will carry your thoughts with its limitless speed;
Ye may yoke the fierce whirlwind, till, bowed to your will,
It will grind like the ox you have broke to your mill;
Ye may tame the wild cataract's flood, til'l it feels Like a felon condemned at your factory wheels:
But there stay your strong hand, nor dare lengthen your chain
E'er to harness a soul 'mid your engines for gain.
Ye may desecrate Nature, and haughtily tread
On the wrecks of its beauty, disfigured and dead:
But 'twere better for you that ne'er from the sod
Ye had started to life at the mandate of God,
If ye dare to subdue to your power the will
Of a soul which, though crushed and distorted, is still
In the image of Him who hath equal and free
Made that spirit, proud atoms of frailty, with ye.

We can toil for a purpose, and cling unto life
Through its storms and its turmoil, temptation and strife;
While the purpose is high, and the motive is pure,
Few indeed are the trials we cannot endure;
But go, put your curb on another's free will,
Keep us back from our aim, yoke our souls in your mill,
Make our poverty something too bitter to bear,
Ye will see then how much a high purpose will dare.

We can sleep upon straw on the cold garret floor;
We can toil on the crusts Dives casts from his door;
We can shiver half clad by the unlighted hearth,
Tho' we quail at the sound of the northern wind's mirth;
We can bear it, and smile, if the heart-food is there,
To urge on the free spirit to do and to dare;
Aye, can laugh at privation and hunger and cold,
And through scorn, though in rags, be strong-hearted and bold;
For we know that the wealth of Peru cannot buy
Our ambition's proud hope or a home in the sky.
And each slight that we feel, and sneer that we meet,
Adds fresh fire to our hearts, and gives wings to our feet;
Every force that opposed, when o'ercome, makes us strong—
Gives us courage to battle with famine and wrong;
But dare bar up the path to our purpose, and see
If the poor in their might are not stronger than ye.

ANNIVERSARY OF ALFRED ACADEMY.

The Annual Examination of Alfred Academy, for the year ending July 4, 1850, commenced on the first and closed on the third of July, during which time some forty different classes were examined. Examinations took place in all of the common branches, also in Latin, Greek, Algebra, Geometry, Trigonomety, Surveying, Calculus, Natural Philosophy, Physiology, Botany, Rhetoric, Elocution, Logic, Geology, &c. However satisfactory previous examinations may have been, this was still more so. The thoroughness and promptness manifested on the part of students, throughout the entire exercises, were truly gratifying. This institution has been enabled to adopt a system of very thorough mental training, which gives the students great analytical power, and readiness of expression, to make the close, clear, independent thinker—an object very desirable in all education. This, with the strict and steady method of government pursued in this Institution, has secured to it a superior class of students, intellectually and morally, and proves very conclusively the superiority of such a system over a loose, indifferent method.

The Anniversary Exercises took place on the Fourth. The morning was fine, and the students assembled at an early hour, and marched to the grove. The exercises commenced at half past eight o'clock, with reading of the Scriptures, singing, and prayer. The names of some seventy ladies and gentlemen were upon the Programme for reading and speaking. We find by it the following towns represented: New Hudson, Greenwood, Lyndon, Genesee, Alfred, Deerfield, Pa., Caton, Almond, Elmira, Cohocton, Mt. Eden, Ky., Hartsville, Portageville, Howard, Arkport, Allen, Avoca, Westerly, Canisteo, Penn Yan, Stephentown, Wirt, Naples, Knoxville, Pa., Hayfield, Pa., North Bergen, Milton, Wis., Corning, Amity, Dansville, Addison, West Almond, Rice, Angelica, Cuba, Belfast, Bolivar, Ceres, Pa., York. The pieces were short, and spoken with clearness and spirit. There was an elevated sentiment, a high moral tone, pervading all of the productions, that was truly pleasing. Between three and four thousand persons were present, and showed, by the deep interest which they took in the exercises, the estimation they placed upon such methods of celebrating the Fourth of July. We copy from the programme the themes of discourse and the names of the speakers or readers.

CHINA—THE OPIUM TRADE.

The ship William Stewart arrived at New York recently from China, bringing Canton dates to the 15th of March. This is the first British vessel which has arrived here from China under the operation of the new Navigation Laws. A letter in the Commercial Advertiser, from an American merchant resident in Canton, received by this arrival, presents an interesting view of the present condition of the country, and the influence of the Opium Trade upon its people and commercial prosperity. We copy a few paragraphs:—

While prospects for the commercial world, in general, are quite encouraging, those for China are gloomy in the extreme. This great country is being fast ruined by the opium traffic. The quantity of this pernicious drug, expected to be imported this year, is eighty thousand chests, valued at $40,000,000. This throws an immense balance of trade against China. The importation of this drug is continually draining the country of its precious metals.

Were it not for the opium, the country would prosper greatly in the foreign trade, the legitimate balance being much in her favor. But this drug not only throws the whole balance the other way, but draws from the country about $15,000,000 in gold and silver every year.

It is proposed to legalize the traffic, that the evil which cannot be overthrown may be modified in some degree, and the drain on the precious metals be diminished. But I doubt if this would remedy the evil, beyond breaking up the bands of smugglers now supported.

If the Government was to legalize the import, and encourage the home growth, it must necessarily sanction the use of it, and all the restraints which now exist would be removed. The importation would still increase, for the facilities of producing it in India are much greater than those in China.

Nothing but the most vigorous enactments on the part of the Chinese Government, joined to the hearty coöperation of all the foreign governments that would punish those who deal in it as for a high crime, can put an end to the trade.

Many of the foreign merchants here, who see this, and admit that the opium trade is fast drawing the country to ruin, and who abstain from any direct trade, continually have to touch the unclean thing in their commercial operations, especially in the way of exchange and remittance from one port to another; for the value of the drug is so great and overwhelming, that it has become the chief currency of the foreign trade; and a merchant who does business here, to any large extent, is necessarily forced to avail himself of it in his financial operations.

One of the most striking features in the traffic is the fact that the British Government is the chief actor in it; that she raises about one-half the opium herself in India, and levies a heavy export duty on the other half; thus deriving the largest profit out of it, and encouraging to the utmost its continuance.

If the venerable sages and moralists of China could understand all this, and fully estimate all the evils the opium trade is bringing upon the country, who could blame the people for setting their faces against the English foreigner especially as a "barbarian" and a "devil?"

STARVING CLERGYMEN.

We are often reminded of the man who boasted that he had been a Methodist forty years, and he 'thanked God it had never cost him a single cent.' Such people are too common in all denominations, and they need stirring up. The following extract from the Memoir of Rev. N. Stady, a pioneer of Universalism in Vermont and New York States, gives a hint which we trust narrow souls, of whatever creed, will understand as addressed to them:—

I had, at the solicitation of friends, particularly in Addison county, traveled two hundred miles to visit them, and deliver my message. They had manifested great satisfaction in the opportunity of hearing me preach, had urged me, with the utmost earnestness, to stay longer; solicited me, with all apparent sincerity, to make them another visit as soon as possible; but, alas! they never thought to inquire how I was, pecuniarily, prepared to meet the expenses of my journey; or if my horse would ever need a shoe, or myself a change of apparel. My ministerial labors had ever been sparingly rewarded: and it was right, no doubt, for they were worth but little—I so considered them myself; all I ever had received I esteemed as a charitable donation. But now I felt the need of something more than I ever had before. My earnings in school teaching the previous winter, had been exhausted in the payment of some small debts I had been obliged to contract, and in furnishing myself with a few articles of necessary wearing apparel; and the few shillings I had started on my jouney with were nearly exhausted. I had the confidence to name to them my destitute condition, but not one of them put a cent into my hand. I never was exactly like the unjust steward, who said, "Dig I cannot, to beg I am ashamed." I was ever ashamed to beg; but I could dig, with good will, if I had opportunity. But now I had no chance; it would require the whole, or nearly the whole time between this and the next Sunday to reach the place of my appointment. What was to be done? I felt very unwilling to cause a disappointment; I therefore moved forward, though with rather a despairing heart, at first; but soon gathered courage and strength from the reflection, that if God had allotted me a work to perform, he would either provide means to feed me on the way, or give me strength to perform the journey without it. It required me to be on the way two nights; and I had barely change sufficient in my pocket to pay for my horse-keeping and my lodging, and furnish me with a single meal. And with this I prformed the journey, without making my condition known to any person, or asking the charity of strangers. On the last day, long after every cent was spent in crossing the Green Mountains from Adams, through Savoy to Williamsburgh, I felt quite exhausted, and thought my poor beast felt faint and weary too; and on looking around and beholding the abundance that rewarded the labors of the industrious husbandman, even in that cold and mountainous country, I could scarcely refrain from repining at my lot, and thinking that, if this was an allotment of Providence, it was a severe one; and, for a moment, a fearful despondency seized my soul! But it was momentary only; for, on looking around, I saw a good fresh turnip by the wayside, that somebody had dropped. I alighted, picked it up, and proceeded but a few rods, when I came to a spot of good fresh grass by the way. I here let my horse feed, stretched my weary limbs on nature's verdant carpet, and ate my turnip. I then arose refreshed, both in body and mind. My desponding feelings had entirely left me; and a holy calmness, an unshaken confidence in an all-wise and bountiful Providence, with a conscientious conviction that I was in the way of duty, accompanied and cheered me to the end of my journey. I arrived at the house of Mr. Washburn, father of Mrs. Ballou, some time after noon, but could wait without feeling any inconvenience, until their usual teatime; and then ete a hearty meal, without experiencing any injury.

GROWTH OF HABITS.

A vizier having offended his master, was compelled to perpetual captivity in a lofty tower. At night his wife came to weep below his window. 'Cease your grief,' said the sage; 'go home for the present, and return hither when you have procured a live black beetle, together with a little ghee, (or buffalo's butter, three clews—one of the finest silk, another of whip-cord, and finally a stout coil of rope. When she again came to the foot of the tower, provided according to her husband's command, he directed her to touch the head of the insect with a little of the ghee; tie one end of the silken thread around him; and to place the reptile on the wall of the tower. Seduced by the smell of the ghee, which he conceived to be above him, the beetle continued to ascend till he reached the top, and thus put the vizier in possession of the roll of silk thread. He then drew up the pack thread by means of the silk; the small cord by means of the pack thread, and by means of the cord a stout rope, capable of sustaining his own weight; and thus he escaped from the tower.

As in this case the gossamer drew after it, first the pack-thread, than the whip-cord, then at length the rope too strong to be broken, so do the trivial acts of a young man, to-day as easily changed as the silken thread can be broken, draw after them habits strengthening into the cord, and the cable let down from heaven to draw him upward. If they are bad habits, they are like a cable fastened to a mill stone, sinking him with such a weight that all his efforts to rise are futile as those of the chained eagle. Wise, then, is the young man, who chooses his habits with reference to his lifetime. [Prisoner's Friend.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

As the time of our annual convocation approaches, we would take the liberty of making a few suggestions. In the first place, let there be as large an attendence as possible. This will show, that some interest is felt in our missionary and tract operations. Especially, let our ministering brethren be furnished with the means of attending. It is to them that our churches look to take the oversight, in a great measure, of our denominational enterprises. Let them, by all means, be there, and learn what they have to do. We wish, however, to see a large attendance of our brethren in general. Complaint is sometimes made, that our ministering brethren get together, and devise great schemes, and then call upon the people, who never had any hand in them, for money and other facilities to carry them out. We hope to see an attendance of private brethren sufficiently large to hold the ministers in check. We call special attention to this point. It is quite probable, that measures will be proposed at our missionary and tract meetings, calling for larger contributions, in the course of the ensuing year, than have heretofore been made. Some of us think, that the state of the times demands a mightier effort, on the part of Seventh-day Baptists, than they have been known to make before. Some of us think, that our people have never yet learned to act as good stewards of the bounty of God. It is not at all improbable, that an effort will be made to call forth a great deal more money from their pockets. If any are jealous of such movements, and feel anxious to guard their purses, we advise them to attend, and not allow ministers to have everything their own way. Watch them closely.

In the second place, we suggest to, and earnestly request, the good people of the place where our convocation is to be held, to make their calculations to attend from the very commencement. It has so happened, at some of our Anniversaries, that the most interesting part of the exercises has been completed before the people of the neighborhood were ready to come in, It was so, last year, at Hopkinton. It was in a great measure so the year before, at New Market. It was much so at De Ruyter. We do, most anxiously, hope to witness an improvement in this respect. Our friends at Alfred may depend on it, that if any interest should attach to our Anniversaries at all, it will be in connection with the first day's proceedings. Please to come out that day. We hope the female part of the community will consider themselves included in this invitation. We have been told, on former occasions, that they staid at home to do their baking, which, according to time-honored custom, is done on Sixth-day. Let the custom be dispensed with this time. Do your baking as early as Fourth-day. For ourselves, we would rather eat stale bread than have you stay from meeting. Get your work all out of the way, as far as possible, so that you can give your undivided attention throughout the occasion.

In the third place, let those who attend go with the intention of remaining till the business is all finished. Our meeting will commence on the fifth day of the week. If some do as they have often done before, they will be for leaving Second-day morning, and perhaps will have left appointments on the way, which regard to punctuality will require them to meet. Then, if something unexpected should prevent the finishing of our business, as it ought to be done, by First-day afternoon or evening, it must be left unfinished, however pressing. Our brethren are all impatient to be off; they have their engagements; they cannot possibly stay any longer. In this way business, towards the close, is often hurried; the work of a day is crowded into an hour; or, to save time, it is committed to the Board of Managers, thus devolving upon them responsibilities which they do not wish to assume, and the whole denomination must be crippled in its movements for another year. This has been too often the case. With uplifted hand do we protest against it. Brethren, go with the determination to stay till the business is properly done. Make no arrangement to leave on Monday morning. Stay a week if necessary.

Another suggestion of some importance is, that those who may be the bearers of money for the Tract and Missionary Societies will do well to seize the opportunity of paying over the same to the treasurers of those bodies as soon after their arrival as possible. This will save a great deal of trouble. Do not wait till the business of the meeting has been commenced, and then get up, while the treasurer is reading his report, to say that you have something more for him. This has sometimes been done, thoughtlessly, we suppose, but none the less improperly on that account. See him privately, before the meeting, if possible. If that cannot be done, wait. If, while he is reading, you discover what you suppose to be an error in his accounts, do not get up to make a correction in public. His report will not be adopted by the body, till after it has been examined by the Auditing Committee; and, in the mean time, you can go to him, and have the correction made. If he refuses to correct it, lay it before the Auditing Committee; and if they also refuse, it will be time enough then to bring it before the meeting.

But what is more important than all, do not forget to invoke the blessing of God upon the deliberations of that occasion. Pray much, pray fervently, that we may have the presence of Him who is the only source of wisdom, and without whose guidance all our proceedings will be marked with folly.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 7.

Sentence of Robert Pate—Death of the Duke of Cambridge—The Sunday Post Business.

Glasgow, July 12th, 1850.

On Tuesday, a bill was brought against Robert Pate, for his assault upon the Queen, and the telegraph this morning brings account of a verdict of "guilty" found against him by the jury before whom he was tried, and of the sentence of seven years' transportation awarded. The man looked unconcerned, but pleaded "not guilty." Mr. Cockburn, who appeared in his behalf, acknowledging his guilt, plead insanity as the cause. The evidence went to show, that the prisoner was eccentric to such an extent that his father had on one occasion consulted whether he should not be confined in an asylum, but it did not appear that he was incapable of restraining himself. The question of his responsibility may be presumed to have been doubtful to some of the jurors, as they were absent three hours and three quarters, before returning their verdict. The prisoner, it is stated, was somewhat affected by the address of Baron Alderson, in passing sentence.

On the 8th instant, the Queen's uncle, the Duke of Cambridge, died somewhat suddenly, in the 77th year of his age. Some time ago, symptoms which occasioned alarm had presented themselves, from which he never fully recovered, and for a few days before his death had been worse than ordinary, occasioning a visit of the Queen when the recent outrage was perpetrated upon her; but the fatal symptoms had rapidly developed themselves. He long acted as representative of the British Sovereign in Hanover, while the two kingdoms were under one head. Since his return to this country, on the elevation of Victoria to the British throne, he has interfered but little with politics. He took an interest, however, in the benevolent institutions of the land, and frequently presided at their meetings. His reputation is favorable; but whether he gave evidence of the enjoyment of true fellowship with God, we have not the means before us of forming any judgment.

Mr. Locke's motion on the Sunday Post Delivery, in the House of Commons, has been decided much as we anticipated, on the 9th instant, and a speedy return to the old practice may be expected as the result. Much previous effort had been made by both parties to influence the Government and members of Parliament, especially by the friends of Sunday observance, through their numerous organizations. Not contented with pouring in petitions from congregations, Presbyteries, and Synods, as well as from public meetings, a large deputation, lay and clerical, from numerous towns in Scotland, had an interview with Lord John Russell, to urge Government to give the new regulations a longer trial. They have published the memorial they presented, but have been silent as to the reception given them by his Lordship. The opponents of the new measures also had been preparing for the discussion, and the Post Office Authorities issued a Circular addressed to all Postmasters, to ascertain, in their respective districts, what deductions may be made in the salaries of those relieved by the omission of the Sunday delivery.

The discussion in the House was preceded by the presentation of a very large number of petitions, both for and against the resumption of the practice of post office deliveries on Sunday. One of these, presented by Mr. Forster, was from the Committee and a number of other members of Lloyds, complaining that their business was much impeded by the new regulations. The presentation of the petitions was interrupted by a very earnest endeavor, on the part of Lord Ashley and his friends, to prevent the discussion of the motion itself, on the ground that it had been agreed to by Mr. Locke, that it should not be taken up later than eleven o'clock, while it was two minutes past eleven before he was called upon by the Speaker. This attempt at a temporary stifling of the question was, however, overruled. Mr. Locke in his speech referred to the thinness of the House when the former Address on the subject had been agreed to, without blaming members for their absence, for he himself had been absent. Both Epsom races and the civic feast had tended to afford opportunity for passing a resolution, the following up of which, he said, had occasioned much inconvenience, while it greatly increased Sunday desecration, instead of diminishing it. The new arrangements only transferred the labor from the post office to others. Among the means adopted for Sunday deliveries by companies and individuals, he referred to those of Willmer & Smith, of Liverpool, for their extensive supply of newspapers, not in that town only, but in many other places, at an average distance from it of four miles, employing for the purpose not only foot-runners, but sixty mounted messengers. He contended, that if applied to the post office, the principle should be extended; and that if fully carried out, it would overturn the whole frame-work of society. He held that numerous as were the petitions for the continuance of the new system, more weight should be given to those for a return to the old. He reminded the House, that it was easy to get up petitions for anything bearing the name of religion, "through the organized machinery of the conventicle." His motion recognized the successful efforts of the Government to reduce Sunday labor in the post office, and requested Her Majesty to institute an inquiry whether this could not be further promoted without the entire discontinuance of the Sunday delivery, and prayed for the resumption, meanwhile, of the old arrangement.

The motion was seconded by Mr. Roebuck, who contended that Sunday is not the Sabbath, but differs widely from it, and that, therefore, "none of the canons against the breach of the Jewish Sabbath could be properly directed against any act performed on the Christian Sunday." He referred to the views of Luther, Calvin, and other of the Reformers, as entirely different from those now imposed. Lord Ashley and others insisted on the new regulations receiving farther trial. Lord John Russell said he was aware of great inconvenience occasioned by the alteration which had been made, but recommended that the motion should be modified so as to allow the new regulation to remain in force pending the proposed inquiry. The Address to Her Majesty for such inquiry, was carried by a majority of 233 against 92. Lord John had stated that he considered the postal delivery should be so managed as to allow clerks to attend divine service; and after his amendment had been carried, as against the original motion, on being questioned as to the mode in which the inquiry should be conducted, and whether the Government would act upon the result of their inquiry, without coming again to consult the House, his Lordship replied, that the inquiry would be as full as the means of the Treasury and Post Office would enable them, and that if Parliament were sitting when it terminated, he would state to the House the result, and the advice he had given to the Crown in consequence. And that, if Parliament were not sitting, Government were quite competent to advise Her Majesty to alter the existing arrangement, should this seem advisable. Lord Ashley was quite dissatisfied with this avowal, and attempts were made to procure an adjournment; but Lord John's amendment was at length put as the motion, and carried by a majority of 195 against 112. There can, I think, be little doubt, that the result will be a resumption of Sunday postal deliveries —though probably not until after the prorogation of Parliament, which may be expected to take place in four or five weeks.

J. A. BEGG.

PROFESSOR WEBSTER.

The case of this unfortunate individual has at length passed beyond the sphere of human adjudication. But little more than a month intervenes this side of a death as ignominious as ever closed the mortal career of man. Vain expectation, and idle speculation, may now subside; and however much every friend of humanity may deprecate the sentence which hurls such a criminal to the eternal world, yet unbiased reason must affirm the verdict truc. Circumstantial evidence may be wanting in certainty, and so may direct testimony; but such an array of circumstances can scarcely be impeached. The human tongue speaks many lies, but well-arranged circumstances approximate most nearly to certainty.

No case in the records of criminal jurisprudence has created a more wide-spread excitement of all classes than the one under consideration. The social and literary standing of the parties in this dreadful tragedy, and the unprecedented barbarity attending its consummation, have awakened at once the sympathy and abhorrence of mankind. Such a transaction cannot be without its teachings. The fearful depravity of the human heart, unsanctified by grace, is the great lesson taught. While we suppress no sympathy for the afflicted family, which, though innocent, shares in all the horrors of the dungeon—and while we deeply pity the victim of crime—let us not forget to adore the saving grace which lifts the Christian from the dark designs of the guilty.

Though the case under consideration has many features common with others, yet it is its peculiarity which gives it its peculiar interest. The history of crime presents but few instances in which men, even of pretended erudition, have been called by the stern mandate of justice to atone for violated law. While we mourn over a few luminaries of intellect hurled from their glittering constellation, yet facts that cannot lie point us back to the abodes of ignorance as the nursery of crime. Of all the inmates of our jails and prisons, few, very few, have felt the soul-ennobling influence of a common-school education, and fewer still of an extensive mental discipline. Death in multifarious forms has often hung the pall of mourning over our literary institutions by the decease of time-honored Professors, but never before in our country has the halter of the executioner found its victim there.

While literary men bow their heads in deepest humiliation, literature lifts its head unscathed. Dr. Webster may have had just claims to that to which a perverted public sentiment awards the name of erudition; but, if we admit that he was skilled in all the arts and sciences, who dare affirm, that because he was so skilled, he was a murderer? It was no fault of science. Let the traducers of education cease their boasts, and ponder well the truth, that ignorance is still, as ever, the mother of vice, and that Dr. W. was not a murderer because he was educated, but because he was not educated. He is a monstrosity, a model of disproportion, such as never fails to mix the harmony of the universe with fearful discord. An intellectual giant and moral pigmy in combination, is an engine of destruction more terrible than the simoon of the desert, and more potent than the wrathful elements of nature. Such was Napoleon, such Alexander, and such was Webster. To call such a man educated is a libel, no less glaring because sanctioned by common usage. The moral faculties are no less a part of the human mind than the intellectual, and no less need development. Whatever system of education neglects the development of the moral faculties, is false to humanity, and deserves only the deepest reprobation. A mind thus distorted is like an engine without a safety-valve—a system without a center—a watch without a regulator. The force of external circumstances may for a time restrain it, but in an unexpected moment the world shudders at its development. Temptations may arise which the sternest moral discipline alone can defy. Nor is this discipline an exception to the great law of mental development. It must be progressive; it cannot be instantaneous. But a high degree of moral development must be accompanied by a corresponding degree of intellectual. Hence, every system of instruction which overlooks the one, only distorts the mind from its native symmetry and beauty. Let our instructors of youth ponder well this fearful result of a deficient education, and never, by a shameful treachery to their holy calling, cause its reënactment. Let parents of "favorite children" think of the declaration of Webster from his grated cell, as he looked out upon an ignominious grave, and revealed the cause of his ruin: "I was a favorite child." Will not this voice from the grave ring in the ears of parents whose mistaken fondness is rearing inmates of prisons, and victims of crime? Inefficient parental government has dug many a murderer's grave, and tenanted many a convict's cell. Let not such parents mourn over the decrees of fate, but over their own recklessness of the good of those they should save.

CONDITION OF THE OHIO CHURCHES.

From a letter of Eld. Azor Estee, dated Jackson, O., July 17.

"I am now better prepared to inform you in relation to the condition of our brethren in Ohio than when I last wrote. Eld. Simeon Babcock is located on a farm near North Hampton, and conducts the religious exercises of a small congregation which meets at his house on the Sabbath. He appears to regard his ministerial labors as having nearly come to a close, or at least as being circumscribed within very narrow limits. In Jackson—the strongest and most numerous church of our denomination in Ohio—there are four or five brethren who are recognized as preachers, a part of whom have been preaching alternately on the Sabbath. The church has been very much discouraged, however, in consequence of an unhappy difficulty existing among the preachers. But an interview with the preachers and some of the brethren has resulted in the adjustment of the difficulty, and the prospects now appear better. The church at Port Jefferson is entirely destitute of ministerial labor. The same may be said of the little church at Scioto, and of that at Stokes. I have explored this territory, and visited these different churches, and regard this as a most important field of labor. The churches are able to sustain a missionary, if located among them, so that he might devote his whole time to the work of the ministry. I am at present engaged in circulating a subscription to raise the requisite funds to accomplish this object. I consider the vicinity of the Jackson church a very favorable locality, and the present a most propitious time, to commence a Seventh-day Baptist School, which may hereafter assume the character of an Academy."

THE ANTI-SECTARIAN CONVENTION.

Our notice, last week, of the Anti-Sectarian Convention recently held at Oswego, was incomplete, in consequence of having been prepared from a very imperfect sketch of the proceedings sent by telegragh to one of the New York Dailies. Gerrit Smith, Esq., of Peterboro, was chairman of the Business Committee, and reported the series of resolutions discussed and adopted by the Convention. Below will be found all of the resolutions not heretofore printed by us. Upon their general drift, we feel no inclination to comment. Most sincerely do we hope, that our anti-sectarian brethren will not, in their excessive abhorrence of sectarianism, fall into the error from which they are trying to recover their neighbors, and so furnish another illustration of the old remark, that "of all sects, the anti-sectarian sect is the most sectarian."

11. Resolved, That to invite to the Lord's supper the members of man-made churches, instead of Christians, forcibly argues the usurpation, and blindness, and absurdity, of Sectarianism.

12. Resolved, That Sectarianism is the deadly enemy of Moral Reform; and that the purest sect on earth will, on the trial hour of its integrity, be found to be the rival of Christianity instead of identical with it.

13. Resolved, That Sectarianism is an unequaled cause of rivalry, and contention, and pride, and prodigality; and that one-tenth of the property which it so wickedly wastes, would be ample to supply throughout the world the lack of Bibles and bread.

14. Resolved, That the Roman Catholic Christian is as dear to us as any other Christian; and that while we cannot invite him to leave his present sect for any other sect, we do most affectionately invite him to rid himself and keep himself rid of all sectarianism, and to receive from every Christian, of whatever name, the hand of Christian and church fellowship.

15. Whereas, It is proper that among the numerous and widely disagreeing definitions of Sectarianism, we should express our own views: Resolved, therefore, That in our view, Sectarianism consists simply and solely in the breaking up of the unity of the Christian brotherhood, and that while, on the one hand, he is not a sectarian who, however great may be the errors of his ignorance or bigotry, still clings to and contends for the oneness of the Christian brotherhood; he, on the other hand, who forsakes such brotherhood, and confines his sympathies as a church member to a sect, is, however large may be the measure of his liberality, knowledge and piety, a sectarian.

16. Resolved, That no person is to be reconciled to war, rumselling and slaveholding, until he shall have come to think it suitable for Jesus Christ to appear in the garments and harness of a soldier, to be employed in setting upon the counter the drinks of the drunkard, and to be swinging the lash over the trembling, bleeding slave.

NEW TRANSLATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

As the question of a new and more correct translation of the Holy Scriptures is becoming one of some interest, it would be interesting to many, no doubt, if they could have the means of comparing all the old translations, and thus seeing at a glance the difference heretofore made in the phraseology of the text by translators. It may be called a difference of style, but it is often a difference as great as exists between sense and nonsense. Take the 5th verse of the 12th chapter of Job, for instance, and compare King James' with Tindall's translation.

King James.	Tindall—1549.
He that is ready to slip with his feet, is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at ease.	Godliness is a light despised in the heart of the rich, and is set for them to stumble upon.

There are many passages as different in sense as the above. The preference ought to be given to the translation of James or Tindall as one or the other agrees most nearly with the original. If the sense of the original be obscure, it cannot be helped; but let it be known to the reader of the Bible by a comparison of different translations, and he can judge for himself how much scope is taken by the translators in conveying the original sense to us, and will make up his mind with more confidence as to the propriety of a new translation.

Church Establishments in Canada.—A Canada letter-writer says that the churches of Rome, England, and Scotland, are all endowed and pensioned by the State in Canada. Of late the subject has been much discussed through the press and in the Legislature; but there appears to be no encouragement that any important change will be made soon. The writer in question says:—

"There are millions of acres of the best land in the country, generally in choice situations, reserved for the maintenance of the clergy of certain favored sects. The English Episcopal Church ministers are organized as ecclesiastical corporations, with their bishops, archdeacons, and rectors, and privileged as in England. A fund of several millions of dollars has been set apart for their especial use, and there can be no doubt but that it is a part of the policy of the mother country to keep in the pay of the State, and dependent on other support than that of their congregations, a large body of religious teachers of the most conflicting spiritual doctrines."

Departrure of Misssionaries.—The ship Washington Allston sailed from Boston last week for Maulmain and Calcutta. She took out as passengers the following missionaries, several of whom are returning to fields of labor long occupied by them: Rev. Messrs. J. Wade, and wife; E. Kincaid, wife and three children; J. H. Vinton, wife and two children; M. Bronson, wife and one child; W. Ward and wife; S. M. Whiting and wife; Dr. John Dawson, wife and two children; Mrs. O. T. Cutter, Miss M. S. Shaw, Miss McBain, Masters Lucien Hayden, and Jas. Tripp, (two Assamese;) Miss Barbori (an Assamese girl.)

New Mode of Preaching.—The Union Mission, of this city, has recently gone to work in the vicinity of the Five Points, in hope of doing something to redeem that locality from the degradation and wretchedness which have so long characterized it. One of the expedients they have adopted to get the subject of religion before the minds of the people, is to print, in the shape of a newspaper, called the "Gospel Sun," extracts from the Bible, giving the history of Jesus Christ, incidents in his life, &c. No doubt many will read the truth in this form who could not be induced to take up and peruse a Bible.

Furman University.—The South Carolina Baptist Convention lately held a special meeting, at which it was resolved to establish a College in connection with the Furman Theological Seminary, to be under the control of "the Baptist denomination," and that $70,000 be raised for that purpose—the object being to connect a religious influence with a classical education.

"New York: Past, Present, and Future," is the title of a neat and useful duodecimo volume, the third edition of which has just been issued by Prall, Lewis, & Co., of 76 Nassau-st. Its editor, E. Porter Belden, A. M., is the well-known and ingenious projector of the Model of New York. In this work he has embodied a large amount of historical, statistical, and commercial information, interesting and valuable to every resident and visitor of the city. The volume also contains a map of New York, and nineteen elegant steel plates, giving views of public buildings, the Croton reservoirs, &c.

Wreck of the Elizabeth.—On the morning of the recent storm, July 19th, the ship Elizabeth, from Leghorn for New York, went ashore near Fire Island Light, and was soon a complete wreck. There were five passengers on board, four of whom were drowned, viz. Marquis and Marchioness D'Ossoli, a child of theirs about two years old, and Mr. Henry Sumner of Boston. The Marchioness D'Ossoli is better known in this country by the name of S. Margarett Fuller. A few years ago she was an assistant in the editorial department of the N. Y. Tribune. In 1845 she visited England, Scotland, France, and passed into Italy, where she was married to Giovanni, Marquis d'Ossoli, and took up her residence in the Roman States. After an absence of five years, she was returning with her husband and child to visit her friends, when the fatal storm overtook and wrecked the vessel in which she was a passenger. Mr. Sumner was a son of the late Hon. Charles P. Sumner of Boston, and a brother of the distinguished American scholars George and Chas. Sumner. He was about 24 years of age, and had been traveling nearly a year in the South of Europe for the benefit of his health. The Captain of the Elizabeth died on the passage, of small pox. His wife was saved from the wreck. The cargo of the vessel consisted of marble, straw goods, castile soap, olive oil, and silk, which were strewn on the beach for two or three miles. Mr. Aspinwall, of the firm of Howland & Aspinwall, had a lot of valuable paintings on board, which were lost. Powers' statue of John C. Calhoun was also on board, and was lost.

Union College.—"Commencement week" at Union College, opened on Sunday evening, July 21st, by an address from Dr. Cox, of Brooklyn, on the Study of Theology. The following evening, the "Senate" of the College (composed of the late Senior Class, who meet weekly with the same forms and topics of debate as the U. S. Senate,) were addressed by John K. Porter, Esq., a distinguished lawyer of Albany, upon "the Duties which the Educated Man owes to his Country." On Tuesday evening, W. H. C. Hosmer, of Avon Springs, entertained the Literary Societies with a poem on the "Utility of Imagination." "The fourth Wednesday of July" witnessed the usual declamatory exercises by thirty members of a graduating class numbering eighty. Besides the first degree conferred upon the eighty graduates of this year, the second degree was conferred in course upon twenty-nine graduates of former years. The title of L. L. D. was conferred upon Wm. H. Allen, President of Girard College, and that of D. D. upon four ministers of the Gospel. Among the graduates we notice the name of C. S. Titsworth, a son of A. D. Titsworth, of New Brunswick, N. J.

Brown University.—We learn, says the Providence Journal of July 22d, that the entire subscription to the fund of Brown University has reached $110,000, which is within $15,000 of the sum originally proposed. We learn, also, that the subscription having advanced so far, and with good assurance of further aid, the committee have reported to the President, that the success of the plan, so far as the money is concerned, may be regarded as assured, and that consequently it will be safe to go on with the new organization as rapidly as may deemed advisable. Of the sum raised, about $96,000 have come from that city. This liberality is creditable to the citizens, and the sum so expended will prove an investment which they will never have cause to regret. A meeting of the corporation of the University will soon be called, when the entire plan will be decided upon, and we presume that it will be carried into effect as rapidly as so important a change can be made with prudence. The experiment will be made, therefore under the most favorable auspices. We shall be disappointed if it do not prove greatly successful.

Obsequies of Gen. Taylor.—Third-day, July 23d, was the day set apart by the Authorities of the City of New York for a Grand Funeral Pageant in honor of the late President. The Procession was one of the most extensive ever got up in the city. It comprised between twenty and thirty thousand persons, was about seven miles long, and was over three hours in passing any given point. The number of lookers-on has been estimated at two hundred thousand. After passing through some of the principal streets, all of the procession there was room for brought up in the Park, where a Funeral Oration was delivered by David Graham, Esq., after the usual religious exercises. The day was pleasant, and the exercises throughout were quite satisfactory to those who favor such a way of showing sorrow for the death of a Chief Magistrate.

Prof. Webster's Case occupies a large place in the communications of Boston letter-writers. They tell us that last week the Professor was visited in his cell by Mr. Littlefield and his wife, whom he received very cordially and kindly, asking forgiveness, which was freely granted, for all the wrong he had done them by insinuating that they had plotted his destruction. The scene is said to have been very interesting and affecting. Doubts whether Webster will be hung, are very freely expressed by some of the writers in question; their belief being, that he will find means to commit suicide before the day fixed by the authorities for his execution. Indeed, it is said that numerous bets upon the subject are now pending.

Ordination.—Bro. Jared Kenyon was ordained to the work of the Gospel Ministry, in the 2d Church of Alfred, on the 11th ult. Ordination discourse by Bro. T. E. Babcock; consecrating prayer by Bro. Hiram Cornwell; charge by Bro. N. V. Hull; the right hand of fellowship by Bro. Hiram P. Burdick; benediction by the candidate. Comm.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, July 22.

A communication was received from Mr. Webster, resigning his seat in the Senate.

Mr. Houston presented the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of Texas, asserting the right of Texas, to all the territory claimed by her; condemning the acts of Federal Officers in preventing her exercise of jurisdiction, and declaring their determination to resist such interference, at all hazards, and to the last extremity.

The Compromise Bill was taken up, and Mr. Clay made his closing speech in its defense, and in answer to objections which had been raised. He expressed his firm conviction that there is danger to the Union, and adduced as proof the establishment of the Southern Press at Washington, and the sectional resolutions of some of the Southern Legislatures. He did not regard New Mexico as sufficiently matured to form a State, but thought the Texas boundary question ought to be settled now, to avoid the terrors of a civil war. By this bill, he said, the North will gain the admission of California, and the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, while the South will gain the settlement of the boundary of Texas, thus securing a large portion of territory now in dispute, and will also be saved from the imposition of the Wilmot Proviso by Congress, and the agitation of the question of slavery in the District of Columbia. If the bill is defeated, he thinks the consequence will be a civil war between Texas and New Mexico, and also between Texas and the United States, in which many Southern States will make common cause with Texas. After a bitter denunciation of the Liberty Party, he declared his firm belief, that the passage of the bill would put agitation to rest forever by using up all the abolition material.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

In the House, an ineffectual attempt was made to procure the passage of a resolution to adjourn from the 28th of August to the first Monday in November.

The New York Branch Mint Bill was taken up and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

An Executive communication, in reply to a resolution of the House in relation to British movements on the island of Tigre, was received, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, July 23.

After disposing of the morning business, the Compromise Bill was taken up; several amendments were voted down, and as many more proposed; finally the subject was postponed; until to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Featherston introduced a bill regulating the payment of interest on claims against the United States, and preventing those engaged in the Department from acting as Claim Agents against the government. Referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Nelson, from the Committee on Claims, reported the Senate bill to establish a Board of Accounts, which was referred to Committee of the Whole.

A bill passed providing for the holding of U. S. Courts, when there shall be sickness or disability among the judges.

After a useless discussion of the Nicaragua Treaty, on a motion for a different reference of President Fillmore's Message, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE. FOURTH-DAY, July 24.

The bill granting additional security to lives and property on the Western waters was ordered to a third reading.

The Compromise Bill was taken up, and Mr. Bradbury moved an amendment for the appointment of a Joint Commission on the part of Texas and the United States for the settlement of the Texan boundary. Mr. Rusk proposed to amend the amendment by declaring the Rio Grande the boundary, which was rejected, 18 to 34. Mr. Hale moved to amend the amendment by adding a provision, that until the duties of the Board of Commissioners shall have been completed, the rights of the United States and Texas respectively shall remain as they were at the ratification of the treaty of Gaudalupe Hidalgo. Considerable discussion followed, but no vote was taken.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Potter, from the P. O. Committee, reported a bill to reduce and modify the rates of postage, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, after an ineffectual attempt to make it the special order for the first Tuesday in August.

The House then went into Committee, and the special order, the California Message, was laid aside, and the West Point Appropriation Bill was taken up. A long discussion followed, which was mostly confined to the California question, notwithstanding that subject had been turned out. Without coming to any vote upon the bill, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, July 25.

The Compromise Bill occupied the attention of the Senate most of the day. The amendment proposed yesterday by Mr. Hale was rejected. Several other amendments were proposed and rejected. Mr. Clay urged the bringing of the discussion to a close; he felt that his physical powers were failing, and that it was necessary for him to leave Washington in search of rest and health. No vote was taken, except upon unimportant amendments.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Young, from Committee on Agriculture, reported back with amendment the bill to encourage agriculture by giving, without cost, to every man or woman, the head of a family, and citizen of the United States, one hundred and sixty acres of land, provided he or she cultivates the soil. Remarks upon the bill were made by Johnson of Tenn., and Brown of Miss., but no vote was taken.

The Military Academy Bill was taken up, and a good deal said about the adjournment of Congress, but there was no action upon the bill or the time of adjournment.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, July 26.

The Senate was the scene of an animated and piquant debate, growing out of Mr. Bradbury's amendment to the Compromise Bill, providing a Commission for the settlement of the Boundary between Texas and New Mexico. Mr. Seward showed that this amendment amounted to a surrender of the essential thing in the bill, namely, the settlement of the Boundary. He then moved to amend further by authorizing the President to admit New Mexico to the Union by proclamation, provided he should be satisfied that the proceedings of her recent Convention have been ratified by the people. Hereupon followed an exciting scene between Mr. S. and Mr. Pratt, of Md. The amendment of Mr. S. was voted down, he alone voting in the affirmative. The Senate then adjourned without action on the Bradbury amendment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The bill to give every man or woman, the head of a family, a quarter section of land free of cost, was discussed in committee of the Whole, by Messrs. Brown, of Miss., Morse, of La., Hubbard, and others, and laid aside without a vote upon it.

The Military Academy Bill was then taken up and passed; after which the House adjourned.

SABBATH, July 27.

Nothing was done in either House beyond receiving the announcement of the death of Hon. Daniel P. King of Massachusetts, a Member of the House of Representatives, and passing the resolutions usual on such occasions.

CALIFORNIA ITEMS.

The third great fire in San Francisco, which we announced briefly last week, is likely to cool the ardor of many California speculators. The Pacific News says, that the first two fires were met with undrooping energy, and a few days only was needed to elapse until the hum of business commenced with renewed enterprise. But the present disaster is a most stunning blow—people pause in their operations until they thoroughly consider what is best to be done. It visited a quarter of the city which has been the main depot of commerce, and swept away far more property than on former occasions, a large proportion of which is on consignment, the loss of which falls heavily upon distant shippers.

The intelligence from the mines is of such a nature as to prove that there will be a greater quantity of gold dug out this Summer than ever before.

The foreign miners are paying their tax without opposition, and all disturbance had ceased from that cause.

On the Upper Sacramento there is much excitement about land titles between those who wish to settle upon a part of those immense claims of Capt. Sutter, and others who have purchased his right to many of the best localities, and hold them for speculation. The discovery of large gold deposits in Oregon has awakened considerable attention there. The accounts are very authentic, and may probably have an influence to direct part of the current of emigration which is now on the plains.

Pacific City, near the mouth of the Columbia, is drawing very considerable attention among business men. Quite a number of buildings have already been erected there ately, and several large improvements are in lontemplation. An able firm of San Francisco is about to ply a steamboat between Pacific City and the upper waters of the Columbia.

CHOLERA ON THE PLAINS.

The St. Louis Republican publishes a number of letters from the Plains, chronicling the progress of cholera among the trains. A letter dated 110 miles west of Fort Kearney, June 9, says:—

"We have had good weather and good roads; but we have witnessed most horrible havoc of that dread disease cholera. That disease broke out about the same time in every train that was in Plum Creek Valley, from the 1st to the 7th of June. I have endeavored to ascertain the particulars, but in a great many instances I saw graves without even a name left, and in others the name only given. Up to this time I have counted forty graves, in sixty miles travel, and we have passed several trains where from one to six were sick, and probably two-thirds of them are dead ere this. The following particulars were given me by a gentleman who overtook us yesterday, and I have every reason to believe them true. He states that on the 7th, about 15 miles west of Plum Creek, he found a small train of three wagons, about half a mile from the main road, and but one man able to sit up; there were originally twelve men in the train, but six were already dead and buried; four were about dying of the cholera; one had the measles, and the other well, but so fatigued from nursing, that he could scarcely stand."

Under date of Sunday, June 16, 240 miles west of Fort Kearney, the same writer says:—

"During the past week we have witnessed a great amount of sickness and distress in different trains. In fact, I have not yet heard of a train that has escaped sickness, and in nearly all the monster Death has taken one or more victims. To give you some idea of the sickness on the Plains this year, I will only mention a few cases that have come under my own personal observation. I visited a train on Tuesday last. Of the 17 men composing it, 16 were sick. Another train I passed buried seven at one time, five or six more sick, and one dying as I passed. In two instances I have passed trains where all but one had died. In one instance I saw at an encampment one tent left standing and another "struck," but lying on the ground; also a barrel of crackers, several blankets, six or eight pairs of boots, hats, coats, shirts, &c. &c., and near by five graves. It was a sad spectacle."

ATTEMPTED ABDUCTION.—We understand, says the Watertown Union, that an attempt was made by some of the company of Robinson & Eldred's Circus, during their late visit to our village, to entice away a couple of young girls—aged 12 and 13—daughters of a widow Clark, living on Beebe's Island. The attempt was a bold one, and the rascals engaged in it deserve to be "posted up." The girls, as we understand, were around the tent during the afternoon performance, and attracted the attention of the door-keeper, who, after inquiring their names and something of their history, invited them in. Every effort was then made to win their confidence, and through the influence of numerous presents and a promise of $200 on reaching New York City, the girls consented to go with them. Arrangements were accordingly made to convey them to Sackett's Harbor immediately on the close of the evening's performance. Their mother, till then unconscious of what was going on, employed constable Keon to assist her in obtaining their release. The company stoutly refused to give them up, but finding that legal action was about to be taken, let them go.

CONSTITUTION OF NEW MEXICO.

The Constitution of the State of New Mexico has been published. With the exception of the first section of the Declaration of Rights, it does not differ materially from the Constitutions of the States now composing the Union. That Section reads as follows:—

SEC. 1. All men being born equally free and indepdent, and having certain natural, inheritant and inalienable rights, among which are the enjoying and defending of life and liberty, the acquirement, possession and protection of property, and the pursuit of and attainment of happiness; therefore, no male person shall be held by law to serve any person as a servant, slave, or apprentice, after he arrives at the age of 21 years; nor female in like manner, after she arrives at the age of 18 years, unless they be bound by their own consent after they arrive at such an age, or are bound by law for the punishment of crime.

The Boundaries of the New State are thus set forth:—

Beginning at the dam in the Rio del Norte, which supplies with water the "asequia," or irrigating canal of the town of El Paso del Norte, and running thence due east to the hundredth parallel; thence due north on said parallel to a point where the same intersects the river Arkansas; thence in a direct line to a point on the Rio Colorado of California, where the same is intersected by the one hundred and eleventh parallel of longitude to a point on the Rio Gila intersected by the same; thence up the middle of the main channel of said river to the point which may be designated by the Commissioners appointed to establish the line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, as the point where said river or one of its branches shall be intersected by the western line of New Mexico; then south on the said line, as the same shall be established by the Commissioners, to the angle formed by the States of Chihuahua, Sonora, and New Mexico; thence easterly on the line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, as it shall be laid down by said Commissioners, to a point where the same may intersect the Rio del Norte; thence down said river to the place of beginning.

THE PURCHASE OF NEW MEXICO.—Hon. Truman Smith, in his speech in the National Senate, on the 8th ult., produced full and official statistics to show, that the territories of New Mexico and California cost the Union $124,038,353 65, in the expenses of the war and the indemnity paid for the Territory acquired. Besides which, we have the following statistics of the loss of human life in the war: The number of deaths returned by the officers of the army is 12,878; 9,749 were discharged for disability, of whom at least half have died, say 4,874; 73,260 men were mustered into service during the war, and 50,573 were mustered out; of the residue, amounting to 22,687, 20,072 were returned as dead, discharged or deserted, and the difference, 2,615, are supposed to be dead; of those mustered out of service it is estimated that ten per cent., or 5,114, have since died; thus making, in the aggregate, a loss of 25,481 lives through this war. Mr. Smith rightly asks whether, with this expenditure of life and treasure, the United States have not purchased New Mexico, and whether we are to be obliged to purchase it a second time?

THE CHOLERA IN HAVANA.—A letter from Havana, dated June 22d, says that much anxiety is felt and a great degree of uncertainty exists in regard to the progress of the Cholera in the interior of the Island, and as to its probable effects upon the next and subsequent crops. This disease has not yet become general, but it continues to spread in various directions, and its ravages in many cases have been appalling. On several estates the destruction of life among the negroes amounts to 25 and 30 per cent. and in some cases even 40 and 50 per cent. of the whole number, and the most efficient are generally the victims. Should the disease diffuse itself throughout the island, the loss of life among the slave operatives would in this ratio probably not be short of 100,000 to 125,000. Even at the present average rate of mortality on the estates the estimates as to the ultimate destruction of life among the negroes, in the event of the epidemic becoming general throughout the interior, are not less than 70,000 or 80,000. The period of the year is unfortunately not favorable for checking the malady.

THE ISSUE THAT MUST BE MET.—Texas claims to be the rightful owner of a large territory lying North and North-west of her conceded domain, which never was for one moment in her possession, but which passed, first by conquest, afterward confirmed by treaty and purchase, directly from Mexico to the United States. The war in which it was conquered cost the United States over One Hundred Millions of Dollars and many thousands of lives; it cost Texas, as Texas, nothing. The cession to the United States made no reference to Texas as having any special interest in the matter. Yet Texas says she will have this territory, every foot of it. [Tribune.

RUTGER'S COLLEGE.—The "Commencement" of this institution, located at New Brunswick, N. J., was held on the 25th ult., when sixteen young gentlemen took part in the exercises, and were invested with the degree of A. B. In the afternoon of commencement day, the President elect, Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, was inducted into office, and delivered his Inaugural Discourse.

A letter dated Shelbyville, Ind., July 14, says that the Indian corn crop of Indiana is almost certain to be heavy this year—heavier than ever before. The Wheat is now safely gathered, and its abundance will make the hearts of our Hoosier farmers exult with gladness. Fruit—Apples, Peaches, &c.—will also be abundant.

SUMMARY.

Reports are in circulation, both in Berlin and Vienna, that the Emperor of Russia intends, on the 9th of December next, to abdicate in favor of his son, the Hereditary Grand Prince Alexander Nicolagewitsch. The motives of his resolution are said to be a desire to retire from the fatigue of Government, and the recollection of the old superstition that no Russian emperor can ever govern more than 25 years.

A large peach grower of Morris County, N. J., says that the crop of that fruit was materially injured by the gale of Thursday night. In numerous instances the trees were entirely uprooted; and in others the weight and foliage of the limbs, caused them to be broken off and the fruit destroyed. In that region, it is also said that at least one-half of the apples have been blown off.

Thomas Key, alias Stevens, has been arrested in Milton, Mass., on charge of being implicated in the Dorchester and Milton Bank robbery. He was committed to Dedham Jail for further examination in default of $10,000. John H. Brooks, keeper of a place called Gray Eagle at Providence, has been arrested and committed to Jail in default of $30,000 for being concerned in the same robbery.

We learn from the Bunker Hill Aurora, that Mr. Amos Baker, of Lincoln, Mass. died on Tuesday, July 16th. He was the last survivor of the Concord Fight, and the only man living who bore arms on the 19th of April, '75. He was present at the late celebration at Concord, and was 94 years of age on the 9th of April last.

The European inhabitants were in daily expectation of a fresh breaking out of hostilities between the contending native parties.

A letter from Oregon says that laborers of all kinds are much wanted there. Carpenters are receiving from $8 to $12 per day. Common day laborers $4 to $5 per day. Tailors charge $30 for making a dress coat, and from $8 to $10 for vests and pantaloons. School teachers are in very great demand, and at their own prices.

The damage done by the recent gale along the Southern coast is beginning to develop itself. Off Hatteras eight or ten vessels are reported totally lost. The brig Benjamin Carger of Maine is much damaged. Every where outside the wind was tremendous. Some large ships, names unknown, were seen total wrecks.

The Massachusetts Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance, at the quarterly meeting in Newburyport, resolved, 87 to 10, to maintain the Subordinate Divisions to admit members to the order without regard to color. This is against the National Division in Boston, which voted, 76 to 6, that it is improper and illegal to admit colored men.

Mr. Kendall, of the firm of Kendall & Dix, Charlestown, Mass., was robbed of $1,075 in bank bills the other day. Mr. K. left the money in the pocket of his coat, which was hanging up in his counting-room, and was absent about twenty minutes, and on his return discovered that some thief had taken his money.

On Friday, Chas. B. Foster, of Utica, fell over the precipice of the second falls, near the Catskill Mountain House, a distance of 80 feet. He fell into a small stream, and was alive when taken out. Assistance was immediately sent for, and a remote hope was entertained that he might survive.

The work on the Rome and Cape Vincent Railroad is rapidly progressing to completion. Regular passenger trains from Rome to Camden are to commence running by the 20th of August, and the entire length of the road will be finished by the 4th of July, 1851. Its business promises to be good.

THE AMERICAN ADVERTISER,

A reference work for purchasers, containing the cards of merchants and manufacturers in every line of business. PRALL, LEWIS & CO., Publishers,
76 Nassau-st., N. Y.

Harper's New Monthly Magazine,

No. 1 published June 1, 1850.

PROSPECTUS.—The design of the Publishers in issuing this work, is to place within the reach of the great mass of American people the unbounded treasures of the Periodical Literature of the present day. Periodicals enlist much of the literary talent and creative genius of the age. The best writers in every nation, devote themselves mainly to the Reviews, Magazines, and Newspapers. Through the pages of these, the most powerful historical essays, the most elaborate critical disquisitions, the most exquisite delineations of manners and of Nature, the highest Poetry, and the most brilliant Wit, have, within the last ten years, found their way to the public heart.

The ablest and best productions of Lamartine, Dickens, Alison, Lever, Bulwer, Croly, and Macauley, are found in Reviews, Newspapers, and Magazines. Their productions, however, intermingled with much that is of merely local and transient interest, are scattered through scores of periodicals, so as to make it obviously impossible that, under present circumstances, any considerable number even of the reading public, and much more, that the great mass of the community, should have an opportunity of becoming familiar with them.

The Publishers of the New Monthly Magazine intend to remedy this evil, and to place such of the Periodical Literature of the day, as has commanding interest, in the hands of all who have the slightest desire to become acquainted with it. Each number of their Magazine will contain 144 pages octavo, in double columns. The volume of a single year, therefore, will present nearly 2,000 pages of the choicest of the Miscellaneous Literature of the age. The Magazine will transfer to its pages, as rapidly as they may be issued, the continuous tales of Dickens, Bulwer, Croly, Lever, Warren, and other distinguished contributors to British Periodicals; articles of commanding interest from all the leading Quarterly Reviews of both Great Britain and the United States; critical notices of the publications of the day; speeches and addresses of distinguished men upon topics of universal interest; notices of events in Science, Literature, and Art, in which the people at large have an interest, &c., &c. Special regard will be had to such articles as relate to the economy of social life, or tend to promote in any way the well-being of those who are engaged in any department of productive activity. A carefully prepared Fashion plate, and other pictorial illustrations, will accompany each number.

This Magazine is not intended exclusively for any class of readers. The Publishers have at their command the exhaustless resources of current Periodical Literature in all its departments. They have the aid of editors in whom both they and the public confide. They have no doubt that, by an intelligent use of these appliances, they can present a monthly compendium of the periodical productions of the day which no one would willingly be without; and they intend to publish it at so low a rate that its cost shall not prevent its making its way into the hands and family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States.

TERMS—$3 a year, or 25 cents a number. The work may be obtained of Booksellers and Periodical Agents, and of the Publishers.

Liberal arrangements will be made with the Trade and with Agents for extra efforts in circulating the work, and specimen numbers will be supplied gratuitously for canvassers.

Miscellaneous.

IF I WERE A VOICE.

If I were a voice, a persuasive voice,
That could travel the wide world through,
I would fly on the beams of the morning light,
And speak to men with a gentle might,
And tell them to be true.
I would fly, I would fly over land and sea,
Wherever a human heart might be,
Telling a tale, or singing a song,
In praise of the right—in blame of the wrong.

If I were a voice, a consoling voice,
I'd fly on the wings of air;
The homes of sorrow and guilt I'd seek,
And calm and truthful words I'd speak,
To save them from despair.
I would fly, I would fly over the crowded town,
And drop, like the happy sunlight, down
Into the hearts of suffering men,
And teach them to look up again.

If I were a voice, a convincing voice,
I'd travel with the wind;
And wherever I saw the nations torn
By warfare, jealousy, spite, or scorn,
Or hatred of their kind,
I would fly, I would fly on the thunder-crash,
And into their blinded bosoms flash;
Then, with their evil thoughts subdued,
I'd teach them Christian brotherhood.

If I were a voice, an immortal voice,
I would fly the earth around;
And wherever men to idols bowed,
I'd publish in notes both long and loud
The Gospel's joyful sound.
I would fly, I would fly on the wings of day
Proclaiming peace on my world-wide way,
Bidding the saddened earth rejoice—
If I were a voice—an immortal voice.

SALT LAKE CITY.

We have been furnished, says the St. Louis Intelligencer, with leave to publish, a letter from an intelligent gentleman now in Deseret, to his family at St. Charles. The gentleman crossed the plains late last Fall, a portion of the time with an express, and the remainder in the company of some Virginia emigrants, under the command of Capt. Critcher. As they neared their journey's end, the sufferings of the party from cold and hunger, are said to have been most terrible. Several of the number had their hands or feet severely frozen, and the others were so emaciated and weakened by fatigue as to be almost utterly unable to reach the Mormon Settlements, when even only a mile or two from them. They finally arrived at Salt Lake City some time in December. The writer dates his letter April, 1850. We extract his description of the Mormon City:—

"The Salt Lake City is situated three miles from the range of mountains which circles the valley on the east side, and about twenty-two miles from the great Lake. The country about slopes gradually, and with beautiful effect, from the mountain to the Utah outlet, and is beautifully watered, like the city, with a number of mountain streams of pure, sweet water, which the present population, I believe, have never, at any season, known to fail. For milling, manufacturing, agricultural, or other purposes, the sufficiency of supply of water need never be apprehended. The soil in every part of the valley (above forty miles in length, by twenty in breadth) is extraordinarily fertile. I was conversing, a few days since, with an intelligent farmer on this subject, who assured me that last year, from the plant of a single bushel of Irish potatoes, he raised nearly three hundred bushels of a large size, and of excellent quality.

"For wheat and a variety of other grains, I do not suppose that a more generous soil can be found on the whole Continent, and everything, indeed, here, favors their rapid and abundant growth. Owing to the coldness of the weather, however, corn does not grow so freely, and is not, in consequence, much cultivated. The members of the Mormon persuasion are encouraged to agricultural pursuits. They are allowed to improve as much land as they choose to have surveyed and enclosed in the "commons" near the city, and the preëmption title they thus assume is held indisputable. One man can, in this way, accumulate immense quantities of land, but the privilege of selling it is not extended to him. Either to reserve the right in the city, (better, in the city's Apostle,) of themselves disposing of real estate, or to prevent others than Mormons from obtaining a foothold in the country, no Mormon can sell or bargain for a single foot of his lands. I should add that, besides the very encouraging privileges of the commons, every citizen of the Salt City is allowed one and a half acres of ground; having thus an opportunity of cultivating gardens, fine yards, &c.

"The city is divided into nineteen Wards, each containing a half mile square. Every square has its Bishop, whose powers temporally correspond to those of our Justice of the Peace. The officers of the General City Government are: A President, Marshal, Sheriff, &c.; the first of whom is elected for life by the Council of Twelve, and the second semi-annually by the same body. The power of the President is unlimited; his word in almost every instance is the law of the land. In the event of the perpetration of any crime, however, the Council of Twelve have a right to depose him. Since the murder of the famed Jo Smith, Mr. Brigham Young has ruled among the Latter Day Saints. He is much beliked by the people for his honesty (so called) in office, no less than for his social, democratic deportment out. He need never apprehend a revolt among his people; they are ever disposed to wink at his little errors, and to award him a full measure of praise for his virtues. I have known him pretty intimately since my arrival, and can assure you that if he is not a saint, he is at least an intelligent, energetic business man, and a very pleasant, companionable gentleman.

"About two years ago the first building was erected in Salt Lake City, and already the population numbers much over 25,000. The houses are yet all one story adobes, but but preparations are being made for the early erection of a temple and other public buildings in a nobler and more durable style. As it is, the city does not present such a mean appearance. Its broad streets, laid out with great regularity; its large lots, converted generally into blooming gardens or to well ornamented yards; and the many neat little cottages that meet you at every turn, render it more attractive in many respects than are other older and more magnificent cities.

"The Mormons are a gay people, given to music, dancing, and women. They do not, as far as my observation goes, profess to keep the Sabbath holy, nor (despite that the apostles pretend to have secret interviews with their Maker) do I perceive that religion has much influence over them in any circumstances. The followers of Christ they pretend to regard as those heathens who stand the least chance of salvation. Indeed, the Mormons regard the creed of our sires, which they have themselves just foresworm as the most deceitful of all creeds—they abominate it. The dislike they bear to Christianity is divided with that which they bear American Christians. The United States is seldom alluded to in other than an unfriendly, rancorous spirit, and Missouri and Illinois, you may rest assured, come in for a round share of hate. In the counsels of the people, this feeling is, from politic and prudential motives, in a great measure concealed. In society, and in business transactions, however, they allow it full play. I hear daily predictions of the most frightful calamities that are shortly to befall the United States. Its cup of wickedness, they say, is full, and the Lord will now visit it with its deserts—his vial of wrath will be opened upon it. It is firmly believed here, that the cholera was only a forerunner of the greater evil which will follow, and I hear it ridiculously enough stated, that when the worst does come, 'Zion'—the Salt Lake City—will be the only one which can be looked to for security.

PEONAGE IN NEW MEXICO.

As this system is much talked about, but little undersood, we copy the following account of it from the Savannah Republican:—

Peonage is a species of slavery resulting from debt, and is bottomed upon contract. It had its origin in the civil law, and existed first in Rome, then in Spain, and finally was introduced into Mexico while it was a Spanish province. Hence we have it at this day in New Mexico. The peons of that territory are generally Indians who have become indebted to the whites and are unable to pay; though it is not confined entirely to them. It is said that any person, white, black, or copper-colored, may be made a peon, if he places himself in the condition of an insolvent debtor. Hence, if an individual should create a debt, then peonage exists if he is unable to discharge it; for this gives the creditor the right to take him before the alcade, who gives him power over the peon until the debt is paid. The master then furnishes the debtor or peon with all his supplies, for which he charges his own prices, credits him with his services, but generally takes care to strike a balance against him, so that he is never able to discharge the debt. The consequence is, that the peon becomes a slave for life; and not only a slave for life, but the debt descends to his posterity, and the children are furnished with supplies by the master in the same way as were the parents. Thus the son, when he comes to maturity, finds himself indebted to the master to such an extent that he can never free himself; consequently he and his descendants ad infinitum are made slaves irrevocably.

Different systems of this species of servitude obtain in different localities. Every city, every town, every municipality, has a right to make regulations respecting their peons or servants. And perhaps there may be half a dozen different systems now existing in New Mexico, in different localities.

GEN. TAYLOR'S PROPERTY.

A Washington correspondent of the N. Y. Express says:—

Gen. Taylor, I regret to learn, leaves his business affairs in a very unfinished and somewhat doubtful condition. When he left for Mexico, it is stated that in three sealed letters he left directions for the management of his property in case of his death there, in which was supposed to be a will—and these three letters were not opened till after his burial here—but no will was among them, and the directions applied to a property which is now almost wholly changed in its form.

Indeed, his family now have no home, and, therefore, Mrs. Taylor, it is supposed, will not return to Louisiana. His plantation on the Mississippi has been sold since he came here to enable him to purchase a sugar plantation below, so that that home is lost. Previously, however, he had purchased another midway plantation, but that has turned out to be a very unprofitable piece of property, making no crops, in consequence of being flooded repeatedly. Then the homestead is gone to make one payment on a sugar plantation, on which something like seventy or eighty thousand dollars must now be due—and the middle plantation is under water. Probably, some of the presidential salary was relied upon to meet the further payment on the sugar plantation, but that salary is gone. You see from these general facts, that Gen. Taylor died in a very unfortunate time for the interest of his family. He had previously, however, to Col. Bliss's marriage with his daughter, settled upon her a considerable sum in money.

THE "BENEVOLENCE" OF ODD FELLOWSHIP.—A case occurred in New York recently which illustrates the sympathy of the Order for poor widows. It seems that Mr. John Heirn, a member of the United Brothers Lodge, No. 52, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, died on the 11th of May last. His widow brought a suit to recover $30 burial fees, under article three of the Bye-Laws, which says, "On the decease of a brother who shall not owe more than four months' arrears, there shall be allowed $30 for burial expenses." Payment of the $30 was contested on the ground that Mr. Heirn had not paid up his dues so as to entitle his widow to the allowance for funeral. The section relied upon was as follows: "14. Any member owing a quarter's dues, and not paying in the next four weeks, shall be excluded from all benefit, and cannot again be entitled thereto, except in case of sickness occurring three months after he has paid his dues." Mr. H., it appeared, by the testimony, had been in arrears four months, and paid it, but died before the expiration of three months thereafter. On behalf of plaintiff, it was contended, that although by the latter rule Mr. H. could not have received benefit, if living, till after three months, yet, that under Section 3, his widow was entitled to funeral expenses unless more than 4 months in arrears, which was not the case. To meet this it was shown that the Grand Lodge, on an appeal case, had decided that the friends could not receive benefit where the sick member could not. The Court, in its charge to the Jury, said the questions for it to decide would be, whether the deceased was a member of the Lodge, and had paid his dues. If so, plaintiff is entitled to recover. The Jury, after being out about an hour, returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $30, the amount, which carried cost.

VALUE OF NEWSPAPERS.—A thousand times, says the Macclesfield Courier, have we heard this question and answer:—Two gentlemen meet—"What's the news?" says one. "Nothing but what you see in the papers." They pass on about their business. Has it ever been noticed, that among the thousand benefits of a newspaper, not the least is, that it does away with tittle-tattle, gossip, street-yarn, foolish exaggerations, scandal, and news-mongering, which once took up so much of the time of those who were always hearing or telling some new thing. One real evil of social life is thus ended. The man rises in the morning, looks over the paper, is satisfied that he knows all that is worth knowing of the passing history of the world. He has nothing to tell and nothing to hear farther. He does not spend his time in giving information which his neighbor knows as well as himself. He is not annoyed in the midst of his business or pleasures by the recital of affairs in which he takes no interest. The same with women. Curiosity is gratified without the loss of time. The scandal of the day has not employed a hundred busy, meddling tongues in its circulation and exaggerations. Conversation takes a higher tone. Principles of morals and taste are discussed; the new poem, the last book, the magazine, or the review, becomes the subject of conversation. Even in the minor matters of life, society owes a large debt to the newspaper.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.—The Philadelphia Sun of Tuesday says: Yesterday, in the Court of Common Pleas, Judge King delivered the first opinion, under the new law in reference to the rights of married women over the property possessed by them. By this decision a wife has not only the absolute control over her own property while living, but may dispose of it as she pleases, by will, at her death, without regard to the husband's courtesy.

George N. Gamble's Estate.—In this case the point decided was, that since the act of 11th April, 1840, the husband of a wife, the owner of real estate in her own right, has no interest in such estate—that he cannot either sell, lease, charge, or incumber in any way, without her consent; that the only interest he has in such estate, if it can be called an interest, is his expectant right therein, for life, in the event of the wife dying intestate, seized thereof; that this expectancy depends on such intestacy, because she can by will dispose of it absolutely, without regard to the husband. He, therefore, has no other interest in her estate than any other of her representatives under the intestate law—the right of both resting alike on the fact of the wife dying intestate.

GREAT EXPLOSION IN INDIA.—The London Times, in announcing the receipt of the last overland mail, says that the terrific explosion at Benares, by which upwards of 1,000 lives were lost, forms the principal topic. A fleet of 35 boats, containing Government ordnance stores, among which were 3,000 barrels (330,000 lbs.) of gunpowder, arrived at Benares en route to the upper provinces on the afternoon of the first of May, and were moored off the Raj Ghaut (the principal landing place of the city) in the center of the town. A little after 10 P. M. one of the boats caught fire, and immediately after the whole exploded, sinking all the boats near the landing place, and destroying or injuring every one within a certain range. By the latest accounts the killed and wounded amounted to 1,200, but more were continually being disinterred by the 300 men at work removing the ruins. The Raj Ghaut Hotel, the Begum's Palace, and the Mission House, are among the principal buildings destroyed, and the missionary's wife and the Begum and her family, are among the victims. In addition to the ordnance flotilla, 40 other boats, containing merchandise belonging to European or native merchants, were sunk or destroyed; the ordnance flotilla was under the charge of a warrant officer who was absent from the boats at the time of the catastrophe.

HEAD WATERS OF THE MISSISSIPPI.—Gov. Ramsey, the Governor of Minnesota, who has for some time been absent on an expedition into the Chippewa country, around the head waters of the Mississippi, returned to the seat of Government on the 7th ult. The St. Paul Chronicle of the 8th says:—

"He penetrated as far as Cass Lake, about five hundred miles above St. Paul. He represents a trip of this kind as pleasant and novel in the extreme, and the country grand and romantic to the highest degree. We are sorry we have not time and space to give a detailed account of the voyage. A most interesting fact in regard to agriculture is, that on the borders of Cass Lake the Missionaries have fine fields of winter wheat growing. Their potatoes and other vegetables look as forward and thrifty as any in this part of the Territory."

GOOD VENTILATION.—You should have, if possible, a pipe connected with the air without, passing behind the cheeks of your stove, and opening under your fire, about, on, or close before your hearth. They say that from this source the fire will be supplied so well, that it will no longer suck in draughts over your shoulders and between your legs from remote corners of the room. They say, moreover, that if this aperture be large enough, it will supply all the fresh air needed in your room, to replace that which has ascended and passed out, through a hole which you are to make in your chimney near the ceiling. They say that an up-draught will clear this air away so quietly, that you will not need even a valve; though you may have one fitted and made ornamental at a trifling cost. They would recommend you to make another hole in the wall opposite your chimney, near the ceiling also, to establish a more effectual current in the upper air. Then, they say, you will have fresh air, yes, at the expense of a hole in the door and two holes in the wall. We might get fresh air, gentlemen on a much larger scale by pulling the house down. They say, you should not mind the holes. Windows are not architectural beauties, yet we like them for admitting light; and some day it may strike us that the want of ventilators is a neighbor folly to the want of windows.

THRILLING INCIDENT AT NIAGARA FALLS.—A correspondent of the Buffalo Courier, writing from Niagara Falls on the afternoon of the 13th instant, narrates the following incident:—

On Saturday forenoon, a father with his son, a little boy about ten years old, in making their way home to Grand Island, came near going over the Falls under these circumstances: The father was intoxicated, and the boy was left in charge of the canoe—the wind being high off shore, the lad was unable to contend with it, and necessarily was drawn into the current and rapids within a few rods of the Falls. Fortunately they were driven near the islands, and at the first fall in the rapids the canoe was capsized. The first impulse of the heroic boy was to seize his father by the coat collar, and after floating a short distance they brought up against a rock, and the father was saved. The canoe was dashed to atoms long before it took the awful leap. The boy fainted immediately upon reaching the shore, and the father was somewhat sobered off. May this prove a warning to him that will never be forgotten.

A PHILADELPHIA SCENE.—One evening last week, the rowdies on Fell's Point got up another riot, in which pistols and muskets were used. A colored man named Daniel Peer, and three white men, named John Myers, Jacob Clestner, and Frederick A. Kettler, who were spectators, were shot by a fellow named James Manly, receiving a whole load of small shot in their persons. The colored man was shot in the throat, and will hardly live. A young man named Jackson Solomon was shot in the head by a rowdy, named George Konig. A woman named Barbury, a small child, and a man named John Stiller, a stranger, all spectators, were wounded badly by shot. The last named, it is said, will die. An immense crowd was drawn together to see the fight, but, unfortunately, none but the spectators were injured. The Police arrested James Manly, George Konig, and Jackson Gooderson, charged with firing pistols and muskets, and they were committed to appear at Court. The riot occurred at a place called The Causeway, a similar hole to the Five Points of New York.

LYNCH LAW.—Fredericksburg, Va., July 23.—A terrible outrage took place in Culpepper, in this State, on Wednesday last. A mob of 200 men, including Justices of the Peace, members of the church, and others proceeded to the jail, resisted the Sheriff, and carried off William Grayson, a free negro. They dragged him to the woods, where they hung him dead. The cause of this high-handed measure is this—Grayson had twice been convicted of murdering David A. Miller, a white man, but each time he appealed, and the General Court granted him new trials on the ground that the testimony hardly justified suspicion, much less guilt. The mob allowed Grayson one minute to confess. He firmly avowed his innocence of the murder. The mob then placed a fence rail across two trees, and strung him up. This outrage has created intense excitement. The papers entreat the Governor to arrest every one concerned in it.

SCIENTIFIC VOYAGE.—The Mobile Tribune notices the sailing from that port of Prof. Tuomly, the State Geologist of Alabama, on a private scientific voyage around the coast of Southern Florida, accompanied by several other men of scientific ability, to ascertain whether the marine flora of the waters between Florida and Cuba, is almost identical with that of the Straits of Gibralter, as has been asserted. They intend also to pay particular attention to the geology, meteorology, &c., of that region, the geography of the everglades, the practicability of draining them, the value of the hammock lands, and whether they will prove permanently productive upon culture, or, as some persons assert, fail on account of the porus nature of the subsoil, or, more properly, the sand, and the consequent sinking of the surface of the soil after being put into cultivation.

GRINDING COAL.—Our attention was attracted, says the Richmond Whig, during a walk along the Canal bank, about three miles above the city, by a mill used for grinding the bituminous coal, which is obtained from the pits in the vicinity of Richmond. The coal, when ground, gains in bulk five bushels in every forty. It is reduced almost to an impalpable powder, and then passed through a bolting cloth as fine as 50 wires to the inch. The barrels in which it is placed, when thoroughly powdered, are compelled to be cautiously lined with paper.

This ground coal is shipped to the Northern cities, where it is used for the purpose of sprinkling the inner surface of the mould for large metal castings, its gaseous quality preventing the too sudden cooling of the metal, and the formation of air cells in it.

The machinery for the large Ocean Steamers now building in the Northern cities, which has to be cast with great caution, renders the demand for the ground coal a very lively one; and the gaseous quality of the Virginia coal gives it a precedence for that purpose over any other.

IRON MOUNTAIN IN WISCONSIN.—A few days since (says the Mineral Point Tribune of July 12) we were shown a specimen of iron ore, brought from Black River, Crawford Co., the quality of which surpasses any iron ore we have ever before seen. So pure is it, that it is thought by good judges that smelting furnaces will be unnecessary for obtaining the pure metal—it yielding about ninety per cent. pure iron. The amount of ore is said to be very great, it covering at least forty acres. Other veins have been discovered near by, and, if our informants are not very much deceived, this discovery is sure to add much to the already extensive mineral wealth of Wisconsin.

EXECUTION.—Geo. W. Evans, a young man convicted of murder, was executed at Macon, Ga., on Friday, 5th inst., in presence of an immense concourse of persons. He was born and reared amid profligacy and crime, which had combined to destroy the better impulses of his nature. The Macon Messenger says: On the scaffold he warned the youth of the country to beware of his example and shun the ways of wickedness which led to the ignominious gallows; and, in alluding to the teachings of his own sinful mother, gave fearful warning to the mothers of the land to look well to the habits and conduct of their children.

PEACE CONGRESS AT FRANKFORT.—This great meeting is now definitively settled. The German Senate has given in writing their full authorization for holding the Congress, and in the most courteous manner complied with the application made for their permission. An active Committee is also formed for making the arrangements both for the meetings of the Congress and the hotel accommodation of the delegates and visitors who will attend it. Some of the most eminent men in Frankfort, including a number of the Senate, are on the Committee, and have engaged to do their utmost to secure efficiency to the Congress. From various parts of Germany and the Continent adhesions to the Congress have been sent in, and the interest felt in the undertaking is widely spreading. This Congress, judging from present appearances, will be the most important one yet held. The sittings of the Congress will commence Aug. 22, and careful arrangements are making to convey the English delegates and visitors from London on the 19th of August. The movement has already secured a large amount of attention, and the friends of Peace throughout the country are manifesting a deep interest in the enterprise.

Variety.

There are now belonging to the various Libraries connected with the Harvard University about 86,000 volumes, besides pamphlets, maps and prints. The Public Library contains over 57,000 volumes. The Law Library, 13,000; Divinity School, 3,000; Medical School, 1,200; Society Libraries for the students, 10,000. There have been added during the past year 1,751 vols. and 2,210 pamphlets.

Mr. W. H. Jennison has invented a new process for ventilating vessels by taking advantage of their rocking or side-wise motion to inject continuous columns of fresh air and eject corresponding columns of foul air through gutta percha tubes in each side of the vessel, the air being impelled by the rising and the falling of the water in these tubes as one side and then the other of the ship is lifted by the force of the waves.

The New Orleans Bee publishes a circular from a Committe of the Louisiana Senate, seeking information from the planters, engineers, &c., as to the best method of guarding against the continual and disastrous overflows of the Mississippi. The Committee, without expressing any opinion of their own, recognize the fact, that the general sentiment as to river treatment is in favor of a system of outlets.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, of which Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall are the representatives, have declared a dividend of 50 per cent—their first dividend. This Company started, we believe, with a capital not exceeding $600,000. It has since purchased the steamships Unicorn, Tennessee, Cherokee, and Philadelphia, for which there must have been paid all of $700,000.

Mr. Knox, of Ottawa County, Canada, was recently killed on board a steamboat in the Rideau Canal. His wife, hearing of the approach of his corpse, went out to meet him, taking her youngest child with her, leaving six others at home. During her absence, the house took fire, and they were all burned to death. Thus, of a family of nine, the mother and one infant only remain.

Late advices from Mexico represent the Cholera as raging very violently. From the 17th May to 16th June, there were 7,846 cases, and 2,700 deaths, from Cholera, in the City of Mexico. Late reports say 1,000 daily. The Mexican Congress was unable to organize for want of a quorum. In San Louis Potosi there have been 900 Colera deaths. In Zacatecas Cholera is declining.

Three men named Pemberton, Gaylor, and Bramhall, have been arrested at Albany, N. Y., on a charge of stealing parcels of letters from the post-office on Sunday. One of them confessed having stolen six parcels at as many different times. They gave bail to appear before the U. S. District Court at Utica on the 16th inst.

On the night of the 1st of June, as will be recollected, the vault of the Dorchester and Milton Bank, at Milton, Mass., was entered and robbed of $30,000, mostly in notes of the bank. Through the New York Police $700 of the stolen money was traced to the possession of a fellow named Brooks, who has been arrested and committed to prison in Providence, R. I.

A correspondent of the St. Louis Intelligencer says that Lord Calthrop, Lord Breatley, Lord Cook, and some other English nobles, are encamped with a swarm of California emigrants at Council Bluffs, Nebraska Territory, on their way to the land of gold, all by way of a summer pleasure jaunt.

The Teacher's Association of the State of New York will hold its Annual Meeting in this city on the 7th and 8th of August. Lectures are expected from Rev. J. Proudfit, D. H. Cruttenden, S. S. DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.

Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.

Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.

ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

THE WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

In our brief notice, several weeks ago, of the annual meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, we promised to copy at an early day some portion of its printed minutes. The following Reports treat of matters of general interest.

Report of the Executive Board.

Your Committee entered upon the discharge of their duty under something of a sense of the importance of their mission. Immediately after their appointment, the Board organized, entered upon an examination of the merits of the several fields of labor designated, and the appointment of missionaries.

Bro. Hiram P. Burdick was appointed to labor in Ulysses, Hebron, Sweden, Coudersport, Oswayo, and their vicinities. During the year Bro. Burdick has labored six months and five days in the field above designated, and your Committee rejoice to know that it has been a harvest season as well as seed time. According to the report of your missionary, there have been thirty-six hopeful conversions, besides of backsliders professedly reclaimed thirty-nine. There have been ten baptized upon profession of faith in Christ, and eight have embraced the Sabbath of our God. This brief notice seems to establish the fact so clearly that God is with us, that to doubt is most unreasonable.

Bro. Burdick has also, under the direction of the Board, visited the brethren in Persia and Clear Creek, Cattaraugus County. In Persia, there seemed to be considerable religious interest, yet the Church had not for a long time enjoyed the ordinances of God's house, and it is their earnest desire to be made partakers of your bounty in aiding them to obtain the preached gospel by one of like faith with themselves.

The Churches of Clarence and Pendleton were likewise visited, and the former was found in a low and discouraged condition. This church has for a number of years been suffering under adverse influences, and it cannot be disguised that its very existence is threatened, and it comes to be a question of thrilling interest whether we ought not to make a speedy and earnest effort in God's name to resuscitate and reinvigorate it.

The whole time employed in your service is seven months and eight days. Sermons preached, 111; family visits, 282; hopeful conversions, 36; backsliders professedly reclaimed, 39. Ten have been baptized, and eight have embraced the Sabbath of the Lord. The traveling and kindred expenses of your missionary have been $12 32, and his receipts $113 01. His wages per month are $22 00. There is therefore his due $58 81, and the Board have given him an order on the Treasurer for the same.

Bro. James Bailey has labored under the direction of the Board twenty-two days, during which time he preached about forty sermons. His expenses were $1 25, and his receipts $13 10. There is therefore due Bro. Bailey $4 28, which he proposes to contribute to the funds of the mission. The field of labor occupied by Bro. Bailey is one of interest, and your Board earnestly recommend its farther occupancy, and that the labors of Bro. Bailey be secured for that object.

In reviewing the past, there appears abundant reason for devout thanksgiving to the God of missions for his kindness in preserving the lives of our missionaries and crowning their labors with success. May these tokens of divine goodness excite us all to a more faithful performance of our duty in this holy work.

Your Committee cannot close this Report without presenting to your notice a thought of painful interest. We refer to the fact that the churches of this Association, as a whole, are not imbued with the true missionary spirit. In support of this, your Committee would bring to your notice the fact, that the urgent appeals made by the Board for the contributions of the churches in behalf of the missions have been almost wholly disregarded. Nor have those churches which have disregarded those calls which have been made from time to time, sent in their contributions even at this time, save in a few instances. These things have had the effect to greatly perplex the Board and embarrass and cripple its operations. "Brethren, these things ought not so to be." The demands for missionary labor are increasing on our hands, and for the means of responding to them we fall back upon the churches. Shall our operations continue to be crippled and the Board rendered still more fearful to proceed in the work? or may they hope for the dawn of a brighter day, when every church in the Association shall, in the regularity of her contributions, furnish a pledge of her devotion to the cause?

THOS. E. BABCOCK, President.
N. V. HULL, Secretary.

Report on the State of Religion.

The Committee on the State of Religion report, That the communications from the several churches within the bounds of this Association, do not furnish us with assurances of that deep-toned piety that should characterize the elect of God. Yet we rejoice, that a few of the churches which are represented in this body have, during the past year, been blest with accessions to their numbers, and an increase of godliness within them. One church complains of difficulties which mar its peace and destroy its prosperity. May the Lord in great mercy imbue them with that spirit which will enable them to effect an amicable adjustment of every wrong, and lead to the advancement of the cause of Christ among them. Another church speaks of being persecuted for the truth's sake, and of having to contend with him who, like a roaring lion, goeth about seeking whom he may devour. Several of the churches have adopted a systematic course of raising funds for benevolent objects, which seems to indicate an increasing interest in the promulgation of truth.

By examining the communications from the churches, we conclude that Family Devotion is generally neglected, and that this wide-spreading evil calls loudly upon ministers, and indeed upon all who exert an influence, to labor for the correction of this deplorable neglect.

Finally, in view of the position that we ought to occupy, we feel called upon, by considerations that are weighty, to concentrate our efforts for the elevation of vital piety among our fellow men. May the Lord in infinite mercy revive us all, and crown our public efforts to glorify him, and bless the Word with Divine success.

C. T. CHAMPLIN, Chairman.

SABBATH SCHOOLS—THEIR UTILITY.

The subject of Sabbath School Instruction has attracted the attention of our churches more or less ever since the introduction of Sunday Schools in the United States, early in the nineteenth century. We are well assured, that if what we as a people have accomplished in this department of religious instruction has fallen short of the results anticipated, the defect must be traced to the unfaithfulness or the unbelief of those who have been engaged in the work, and not to any defect in the system itself. It is an institution that commends itself from its remarkable simplicity. It proposes to gather together the youth and children of our several congregations on the Sabbath, at some convenient time and place, and give them instruction and counsel from the holy Scriptures. Other arrangements, such as classification, rewards, visiting, libraries, &c., are designed only as aids in this good work. Wherever two or three families of Sabbath-keepers live in the same neighborhood, who have children, there a Sabbath School may and should be established and maintained. It is true, that religious instruction should be imparted by the parent and the guardian; and some believe that nothing more is necessary. That is good, and ought not to be neglected. But we know from observation, that a child who has been religiously instructed at home is a valuable accession to the Sabbath School; and there is no danger of his learning too much of God or his word. While there are and will be some who neglect the religious instruction of their children, we deem this a Heaven-appointed system for the pious and philanthropic young man and woman to gather such together on the Lord's holy Sabbath day, and instruct them in a knowledge of his Word. In our day, and that too within the bounds of our own congregations, many grow up ignorant of the things of God; and by far the largest proportion of those who depart from the faith, and become lost to the denomination, are those whose early instruction in these things has been neglected.

We have young men and young women in all of our churches who wish to become useful. Let such look around them, survey the back settlements and destitute neighborhoods, go and visit them, and if they can find but four young immortals who need religious instruction, organize a Sabbath School, attend to it as a work of great moment, give it time, labor, and talent, and make it an object of prayer, and who can calculate the good that would thus be accomplished? It may be the means of saving souls, and laying a foundation in those places of great and lasting good. In this good work you would be sowing seed to bring forth fruit in the future. You need not hesitate from fear that it will do no good. God has bid you, in the morning to sow your seed, and in the evening to withhold not your hand. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." I often think of the beautiful lines of the poet, where he says:—

> "Though seed lie buried long in dust,
> It shan't deceive your hope;
> The precious grain can ne'er be lost,
> For grace insures the crop."

Those who labor in this cause meet with untold encouragement, not only in seeing the good they are doing to others, but they enjoy a peace within. "Casting their bread upon the waters, they expect to see it again after many days;" and having begun in a good work, they are encouraged to go on, until time will disclose to the world the great secret, that the work of instructing the Sabbath School was the stepping stone to future usefulness in the church of God and in the world. I hope that many may be induced to engage in this good work, until "the wilderness and the solitary places may be made glad."

I am of the opinion, that to further this enterprise with becoming zeal and vigor, a denominational organization is necessary. I have not any particular form matured, but that something more efficient can be done is evident. Let us form a denominational Sabbath School Society, with its proper officers, who will manage its concerns, use their influence in establishing Sabbath Schools, furnish books to such as are unable to buy, give needful counsel, hold correspondence, send out Sabbath School agents if necessary, obtain full reports and statistics of all the Sabbath Schools in the denomination, and present a report of all their proceedings to the annual meeting of the Society. May we not with propriety think of this, and pray over it, and at the next meeting of our Societies, to be held at Alfred, in September, if the Lord so direct, organize a general Sabbath School Society.

ANCIENT AND MODERN PHARISEEISM.

"The growing neglect of the Sabbath among us is a great and pernicious evil—a moral and social evil of no common magnitude. But the evil is not only social—it is also national. For while as a nation we acknowledge the Supreme Ruler of the world, do not our government functionaries assume the prerogative of annulling the Divine law which enjoins the observance of the Christian Sabbath? Else why all this rushing of steamboats and cars for the conveyance of the United States mails on the Sabbath? Why is the peaceful quiet and the hallowed worship of so many of our inland villages, as well as larger cities, disturbed by the rumbling stage, together with the noise and confusion attendant upon the arrival and the departure of the mail? Or why, indeed, do our naval and military commanders, in the time of peace, and when no necessity rests upon them, exhibit such an indifference to the observance of the Christian Sabbath? How often has the quiet of the Sabbath in many ports in the Union been disturbed by the firing of a national salute? Is the nation above God? Are we bound by stronger obligations to the exercise of national courtesies than we are to yield obedience to the law of Heaven? While our Government thus desecrates this holy day, what can we expect but that the youth of our country should be infested with the same spirit, and that steamboats and railroad cars should be thronged by parties of pleasure; the day itself at length becomes a day of sinful amusement, of dissipation and folly, instead of a day of sacred rest, of holy, heaven-inspiring devotion? When, as a nation, we shall cease to remember the Sabbaths of the Lord—when, as a nation, we shall turn away our feet from observing the commandments of the Lord on this holy day—the influence of this departure shall be felt upon all our institutions; upon the desolate walls of liberty—all round the sacred shrine of freedom—shall be inscribed, 'Its glory has departed.'"

☞ The above extract is from a thanksgiving sermon, reported for the N. Y. Tribune, and published some time ago. It is not for any thing new contained in it, that I cut a valuable number of that paper for the benefit of your readers; but because the extract sets forth, by insinuation, what is in fact a gross imposition, and therefore ought to be exposed and reprobated.

The Scribes and Pharisees of old were zealous for all the punctilios of their religion, and under the cover of piety made void the law of God through their traditions; and yet, with the knowledge of the fact that such conduct in them was condemned by our Savior, there are ministers of churches at the present day, who more grossly violate or make void the law through their traditions! The law of God enjoins the keeping holy of the seventh day of the week, and makes the first day of the week a working day, or one of the days in which we are commanded to do all our work; nevertheless, the early efforts of the Roman Church succeeded in branding the Sabbath as a disgrace to Christianity—a Jewish institution—and in its place set up the great pagan festival then most popular among the nations. As this festival was dedicated to the Sun, it was only necessary to transfer the honor intended by it to the "Sun of Righteousness," and the beautiful analogy would make the deception complete. Of course God must, out of regard to his beloved and catholic Church, adopt the festival as his own, and transfer the sanctity of the Sabbath day to the adopted institution, nolens volens. O triumphant tradition! thou hast subverted the law of God, and thyself become the supreme law of faith to the devotee of the new creed! Our Scribes and Pharisees may now talk of the divine law which enjoins the observance of the "CHRISTIAN Sabbath," though they have made void the law of God by their traditions. Having destroyed the Sabbath, they have dishonored a law which God himself enacted, and they have substituted for that law a human ordinance. Nevertheless, they still appeal to Mount Sinai for its thunder to terrify the people into submission! Well may the dupes of such sacrilege deplore "the growing neglect of the Sabbath among us." The light of truth will dispel such flimsy mists from inquiring minds, and their wonder will be, that deception could so long prevail to support a tradition so God-dishonoring and presumptuous. When such men as James Ockford testify against pharisaic liberty, and maintain as he did more than two centuries ago, that it is as great a sin to observe the first day of the week instead of the seventh, as to worship an image instead of the true God, some will take up stones to put them to death, or burn their books, as the Scribes of that day did his, and command that they teach no more in this name. But those who wish to honor God, the true law-giver, will nevertheless testify against all such assumptions of men, and when set free from the yoke of human bondage, will return to their duty, and talk no more about our rulers "annulling the divine law."

LUTHER.

LOVE IN DEATH.

A mother sits by a lonely grave,
  A hillock small and green,
With two gray stones at the head and feet,
  And the daisied turf between.

Silent she sits in that place of graves,
  As if tranced in a dream of prayer,
And her hand oft plays with the rustling grass,
  As with curls of an infant's hair.

Does she think of the time when she hushed it soft,
  With cradle lullabies?
Or when it hung on her teeming breast,
  With a smile in its lifted eyes?

Or when she touched with a reverent hand
  (When its sunny years were three)
The lamb-like fleece of its flaxen locks,
  As it prayed beside her knee?

Or the hour when a sad and simple pall
  Was borne from the cottage door,
And its dancing step was never heard
  Again on the household floor?

Does she fondly imagine a cherub shape,
  'Mid a shining angel band,
With star-crowned locks and garments white,
  With a lily in its hand?

Silent her thought: but at twilight hour
  Ever she sitteth there,
And her hand oft plays with the rustling grass,
  As with curls of an infant's hair.

A TALE OF THE STAGE COACH.

Two gentlemen and a female traveling in a coach together, the latter, in answer to a question that had been proposed to her, said:

"I never drank any spirits till about three years ago, just after my youngest child was born."

She uttered this reply in a suppressed tone of voice, and with evident emotion.

"You have been married, then?" said the English gentleman.

"Yes, sir," she replied, "I was married eight years since."

"Is your husband living?" he inquired.

"I suppose he is," said she; "I have not seen him for more than two years, and I do not know that he will ever come back again."

At this moment the old Dutchman shook his head; and the woman bowed down her face. Her bonnet concealed her features, but tears were falling on her cloak. After a brief interval, the Englishman resumed his conversation.

"I am fearful," said he, "that you have a bad, perhaps intemperate husband."

His remark seemed to summon her to the rescue; for, whatever may be the nature of domestic strife, foreign interference is seldom welcomed by either party.

"No, sir," she replied, "I had as good a husband as ever lived, and he was always a very temperate man. He was a member of the temperance society. My husband was a carpenter, and worked as hard as any man, but he never took strong drink of any kind; and if I could only say the same thing of myself, we never should have parted."

"How did you first contract this habit?" said he.

"After my last child was born," she replied, "I had a severe fever, and was brought very low. It seemed as though I never should recover my strength. Our doctor, who was a skillful old gentleman, said nothing would raise me as soon as a little brandy. My husband asked if nothing else would do as well, and was opposed to my taking it. It was not pleasant at first but I soon began to relish it with sugar, and after a month's trial I got myself into such a state that I could not live without it. My husband was greatly distressed about it, and said he would not have it in his house. I then got it privately, and the habit got so strong upon me, that I used to lie awake very often thinking how good it would taste in the morning. I have often said, and say now, that I would give the world, if it were mine, to be cured of this hankering after strong drink. At last my poor children—"

"Poor leetle children!" cried the Dutchman, as he brushed away a tear from his eye.

"My poor children," continued the woman, "began to suffer, and my husband became desperate. At one time he would coax me, and after I had kept clear of it for a week or so, he would make me a present, though he could poorly afford it. At another time, when I could hold out no longer, and he returned and found nothing ready for dinner or supper, and the children crying, and his wife unfitted for everything, he would talk very harshly and threaten to leave me. I deserved it all," said she, weeping bitterly; "and I have thought if he should come back I would try to do better, and leave off, though I am afraid I should not be able to. I never thought he would really go away. He seemed at last to be giving the matter up. He let me go on pretty much as I pleased. He used to take the two eldest children, upon a Sunday, to meeting, and leave me at home, for I was ashamed to go there, as folks had begun to take notice of me. A few days before he went off he said very little to me, but seemed to be busy packing his chest. I thought all this was done to scare me, so I took no notice of it. He finally put his chest upon a wheel-barrow, and wheeled it away. 'Good by, John,' said I, thinking he was not in earnest; and I was sure he was not when I saw him coming back in about an hour without it. I told him he had made a short voyage. He said nothing—not a word—but took the children on his lap and kissed them, and cried over them as if his heart would break. His silence and his taking on so worried me more than all his threats. Next morning he asked me to take the children and go with him to see his mother, who lived about a mile off. So I got ready. We had an old dog that watched round the house. My husband patted the dog—'Good by, Cæsar,' said he, and sobbed aloud as he said it. I then began to fear he was a going; and as I thought how kindly he had always used me, and what a miserable wife I had been to him, I could not help shedding tears. But I said nothing, for I still thought he only wanted to try me. When we got to his mother's I saw his chest outside of the gate. We went in, and the old woman began to shed tears, but said not a word. I thought he meant to leave me. He looked at the clock, and said it was about time for the stage to come; and turning to me he took my hand, but it was some time before he could speak. At last, mastering his feelings, 'Fanny!' said he, 'there is but one way to convince you that I am in earnest, and that is to leave you. I took you for better or worse, but I did not take you for a drunkard, and I cannot live with you as such. You have often said you were willing to part, and could support yourself, if I would the children, and you have agreed that they would live with their grandmother. I have sold my tools and some other matters, and have raised a few dollars, which I have placed in her care for their use; and if God spares my life they shall never want. When she writes me word that you have kept clear of this habit for six months, I will gladly come back, but never till then." While he was speaking the stage arrived, and I saw them lashing on his chest. I then had no longer a doubt. He kissed the children and his mother, and rushed out of the house. I followed him to the door. 'Oh dear, John,' said I, 'do not go, John—try me once more,' but he never looked back; and the stage was soon out of sight. 'He is a cruel, cold-hearted man,' said I, as I sat down on the threshhold of the door. 'Fanny,' said his mother, as she sat wiping her eyes, 'will you abide by these words at the great judgment day?' 'No,' said I, after a short pause, 'he is the kindest and best of husbands and fathers.' 'Then try and kill the sinful habit, and win back your happy fireside.' 'I will try,' said I. And I have tried, but how poorly I have succeeded, every person acquainted with me knows too well."

When the poor creature had finished her narrative, which bore irresistible marks of truth in the very manner of its delivery, the Englishman gave her the most admirable counsel. The old Dutchman turned round and gazed upon upon her, while the tears trickled down his weather-beaten features. "Mine Got," said he, taking off his hat with an air of the deepest reverence while he spake, "ven vil there pe an end of dish accursed traid? Ven vil a body leave off selling the fires of hell to his neighbor in exchange for de poor leetle childer's pread?"

From the Central Christian Herald.

A FARM FOR SALE—BIDDERS WANTED.

"Have you sold that farm yet?"

"What farm?"

"Yours, certainly."

"Why do you ask that? What am I to sell my farm for?"

"Because Christ commands you to do it?"

"I did not know that before."

"That is strange, indeed. You ought to have known it, surely. What did you tell the missionary agent when he called on you a short time ago?"

"I told him I had no money."

"And you thought that a good reason for not giving, did you?"

"Certainly I did. How can I give when I have no money?"

"I will tell you that presently, but first answer me another question. What did you tell the agent you had done with your money?"

"I told him I had paid it on the land I bought."

"Just so I thought. Now, brother, this is an old story of yours, and I am going to deal faithfully with you, for the honor of my Master requires it. I remember, two years ago, I called on you in behalf of the American Board. It was a pressing time. There was danger that all our missionary operations would be greatly crippled for want of funds. You had just concluded a bargain for another piece of land, and said it would take all you could rake and scrape to pay for it. The Tract Society's agent came along, and made an earnest appeal. You still owed a little on your land, and could do nothing for the cause of benevolence until that was paid. Then the Bible Society presented its claims—you had just bought a horse, and could do nothing. Afterwards, Home Missions—you had lent your money a short time before, and had none by you. Now, brother, these excuses of buying and being in debt will not do. You can't escape the claims of the Lord Jesus by any such manœuvreing. He has been beforehand with you, and put a text in the Bible on purpose to meet the plea of those who say they have no money. You will find it in Luke xii. 33—'Sell that thou hast, and give alms.' Have no money! Then sell a few acres and get some. Sell a horse—a cow—some grain—some merchandize. What right have you to be speculating on God's money; to have it pledged to mammon beforehand, so that you protest every order the Lord Jesus sends you, and feel easy as long as you can say, 'I am in debt,' or, 'I am about buying more.' It is a fraudulent transfer to avoid a just claim. The Lord can carry on his purposes without your money. Certainly he can, for the silver and gold are all his. But he has a mortgage on your property, and if it is not cancelled one of two things you may expect. Either he will send an execution by the hand of one of his strong sheriffs, viz: fire, flood, blasting, or mildew; or else it will remain only to be a curse to you and your children. Your gold and silver will be cankered, and the rust of them will be as a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. The Lord Jesus allows you, as a redeemed sinner, the privilege of bringing an offering as a testimonial of your gratitude.

"Oh! this ever buying for self, and never selling for Christ! My brother, reverse the order. Begin to sell for Christ. The world is getting too much of your heart." T. S. M.

AN EXAMPLE OF BENEFICENCE.—Facts daily coming to light show that God has been inclining many of his children noiselessly to pursue a system in giving, and with the happiest results.

A liberal donor, in enclosing $100 to a benevolent institution, but strictly withholding his name, says, "When I began business it was with the intention and hope to become rich. A year afterwards I became, as I trust, a Christian, and about the same time met with "Cobb's Resolutions," which I adopted. Some four or five years later, I read "Normand Smith's Memoir," and also Wesley's "Sermon on the use of Money," which led me to devote all my gains to benevolent societies. Up to this time—about sixteen years—by the grace of God—nothing else—I have given about $24,500 to benevolent purposes, and lent about $500 to those in need, which has not been returned; making in all about $25,000." DR. MEDHURST IN A CHINESE TEMPLE.

The Rev. Dr. Medhurst, with three missionaries at Shanghai, supplied themselves with books, and took a boat to visit a city thirty miles distant. On landing, they passed along one of the narrow streets, for many of them are not more than four or five feet wide, when they came to a thoroughfare with splendid shops on each side. A multitude instantly poured forth to see them, asking in a friendly manner who they were and what they wanted, till they were completely hedged in. Mr. Medhurst appealed to their politeness—an appeal which is generally successful—and said, if they would go to a temple, he would answer their inquiries. "They instantly cleared a way to take us there," says Mr. Farebrother, one of the missionaries, "and the crowd followed. As we passed under the gateway leading to a square courtyard, seats were placed for the ladies. We stood in an elevated position, and near the end we saw the three golden images, the three precious Bhudas. Standing in the presence of the gods, an elderly gentleman in a satin dress rose and said, 'Give an account of yourselves. Where do you come from? Where are you going? What is your business? and what are your ancient family names?' These questions were answered, and the people expressed themselves satisfied. I suppose they never saw a European before. The doctor said, 'We bring with us a book which the great God, of whom you have some knowledge in your ancient writings, has given to us, and we are commanded as his servants to go into all the world to carry the book, and make it known to every creature.' The astonishment of the crowd I cannot describe. They all came closer to the place where we stood to hear something more about this wonderful book. The book was opened. The doctor said, 'If you will give attention to its contents, I will state them.' In a quarter of an hour he gave a simple outline of the truths of Christianity. They listened with profound attention; and though I have passed through many troubles and dangers, as I stood gazing on that vast crowd, many of them educated young men, and saw them listening to the great truths of the gospel, I felt that it was a moment worth living for; it repaid me for all I had experienced. As soon as we had done, a shout arose from the crowd, 'When will you come again, and tell us more?' We said, 'We will wait on you in a month, but in the mean time we have books to give away.' We had a sack of tracts; we placed them near a wall, where we could defend them, if an attempt were made to steal them. Standing there, we distributed the tracts, allowing each one to come, and when he had received a tract, to pass away. I believe all had one or more."

A FUGITIVE FROM SLAVERY.

Rev. Eli Noyes, in a letter from Providence, R. I., to the Morning Star, says:—"Yesterday we baptized in the Roger Williams Church, a man, who recently escaped from one of our States, where he was held in slavery. Now, we suppose it was right enough for the church to receive him to fellowship upon a profession of his faith, and for us to baptize him; even slaveholders, we understand, do the same. But what are we to do with him now? Some of our great men, statesmen, divines, &c., have been calling us back "to our constitutional duties," which they say require us to send the fugitive back to his master. Now, we wish to be good, peaceable and obedient citizens. We by no means wish to favor any fanaticism that would destroy our glorious union. We wish to act deliberately, rationally and charitably in this affair, and yet we do not see how we can send our brother back into slavery; for, to tell the plain truth, he wont go, and should we advise him to do so, and send a letter by him, as Paul did by his convert, Onesimus, he would only doubt our friendship, and we are confident no modern Philemon of the South would receive our epistle from his hand. Well, considering that the man has been sold four times, and has had a pretty decent quantum of flogging, we cannot blame him. He does not believe that even his profession of Christianity would shield him from the awful lash, for Philemon of late has become fearfully impartial towards all runaways, saint and sinner—brother according to the flesh, and brethren according to the Spirit, must share the same fate from his implacable hand. Upon the whole, we conclude that we shall not send our brother back into slavery till God gives us another Bible, from which we do not read, "Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee. He shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best; thou shalt not oppress him." Deut. 23: 15, 16. No, we shall not send him back till God effaces the last sentiment of humanity which he has written with his own finger upon our hearts. Neither shall we let any one take him away. We believe our brother is about as safe among us as he would be in Canada. Though many of us are great peace men, yet we think it would be a very difficult affair indeed for any gang of manstealers to kidnap and carry off our friend."

THE FUNERAL SERVICE.

The religious service connected with funerals is not performed for the benefit of the dead. They are past all benefit, or injury, from any thing that we can do. It is intended as a recognition of our dependence upon Him who gives life, and takes it away when it pleases Him; also as the means of impressing the living with the importance of holding themselves ready for nature's last struggle. It is generally expected, however, that the officiating minister will have something to say of the character of the deceased, and of his present condition. The Universalist minister has no difficulty here. Believing, as he does, that sin and misery are confined to this life, and that in the future state all are made holy and happy, he soothes the hearts of fond relatives by assuring them that their departed friend is, or will be at the resurrection, in the enjoyment of the full glory of heaven. Not so the minister of different creed. Funeral occasions often place him in circumstances of peculiar trial. His conscience admonishes him to faithfulness. The character of the deceased has been bad, perhaps notoriously bad. He was one of that class, of whom it is testified, that "they shall not inherit the kingdom of God." 1 Cor. 6 : 10. To his last moments he remained impenitent, and died without hope. Or, it may be, that in the very act of rebellion he was suddenly cut off—"driven away in his wickedness." The minister's faithfulness is now put to the test. On the one hand, he dreads to disturb the feelings of relatives by any intimations that the deceased has fallen short of heaven. Their breasts are already filled with sorrow; and how can he add to their desolation? Besides, the mourning family is one of much worth and respectability. They stand high in the neighborhood. They have been regular attendants at church, and contributed liberally to sustain the cause. It is quite a serious question, whether it will do to run the risk of offending them; and, in his anxious cogitations on the subject, the minister falls into some such train of reasoning as this:—'Here is a family who have always been regular attendants upon my ministry. They have always seemed to be interested in the Word, and have apparently entertained a very high respect for me. Shall I now offend them, and drive them away from my congregation, (for if I speak out plainly, it will most probably have this effect,) and so deprive myself of all opportunity of doing them good in future?' On the other hand, the character of the deceased was too notoriously wicked to leave room for the least hope in his case. To hold him up as a pattern of piety, would be ridiculous; and any minister who would do so, would be regarded as destitute of all sincerity—in short, as a hollow-hearted hypocrite. What, then, shall the faithful minister do in such a case?

Any one who has paid attention to these things, cannot have failed to notice with what carefulness the minister sometimes travels round such an unpleasant point, lest he should wound the feelings of friends. Though he knows that there is not one particle of reason to hope concerning the deceased, he ventures to express some sort of trust that it is well with him. How often is some such language as this employed: 'The one for whom we mourn is now gone. In the hands of his Judge we leave him; and although he never made any profession of piety while he moved in active life, he was nevertheless a good neighbor, and possessed many worthy traits of character. We trust that the infinite mercy of God was exercised towards him, and that his soul was not lost.' Yet the very minister who utters such language professes to believe that "unless a man be born again, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Perhaps three days have not passed since he publicly proclaimed this belief from the pulpit, and told his hearers, in unmistakable terms, that a life spent in unbelief subjects the soul to eternal damnation. Every body knows that this is his belief; yet now we find him half ready to give the lie to his own creed. Universalists are among his hearers, and do not fail to remark that the minister does not believe his own doctrine. Persons halting between Universalism and the opposite belief, have their doubts in orthodoxy strengthened; while confirmed infidels go away more than ever convinced that the whole system of religion is but a system of imposture.

Now, when we express our fear, that the funeral sermons of orthodox ministers have, in many instances, exerted a most ruinous influence, we are honest—we mean what we say. If a minister does not believe that a person's conduct in this life has any bearing upon his future condition, let him come out boldly, and say so. If he really thinks that a man may spend his life in utter neglect of the great salvation, die without giving any evidence of a change of heart, and yet go to heaven, let him plant himself openly upon the Universalist platform. But if he does think that this life is a state of probation, let him not shrink from the responsibility of the doctrine upon a funeral occasion.

For our own part, we see no necessity of bringing the character of the deceased under review at all. In some instances, it is true, it may serve a good purpose. When the life of the deceased has been that of eminent devotion to the cause of God, or when it has afforded a striking proof of the reality and sustaining power of the Christian religion, it may answer very well to exhort the hearers to imitate his piety. This is not only allowable, but is in accordance with Scripture; for we are commanded to be "followers of them who, through faith and patience, inherit the promises." But, in general, we think it better to pass them in silence; and infinitely better to do so, than, by a time-serving, man-pleasing course, to compromit the truth of God.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 8.

The Sunday Postal Question—The Sunday Trading Prevention Bill—The Great Gorham Case.

GLASGOW, July 19th, 1850.

Little is at present said about the Sunday Postal Question. It will not, however, be allowed to settle without another effort on the part of the Sunday sanctifiers, should the resolution of the Government be to order the resumption of a postal delivery on that day. And that this will be the result of the present "inquiry," few have any doubt. Previous, indeed, to the last decision of the Commons, the British Banner—whose editor, in noticing my pamphlet maintaining the claims of the Seventh Day, in his Christian Witness, said, "We cannot confess to much sympathy with any discussions concerning it"—intimated pretty plainly its convictions that the new regulations expressed neither the mind of the Government nor of the Legislature, when it avowed that if the question came once more before the House, "it admits of no doubt that the old system will be re-established." And since the passing of the new Address to Her Majesty, requesting that inquiry be made whether Sunday labor might not be diminished in the Post Office, while yet the letters were delivered, and Lord John Russell's proposed plan was developed, the Glasgow Daily Mail, in bitterness of spirit, has said, "The plain English of the intimation is, that the Government will re-open the Post Office, except during the hours of divine service, at an early period of the recess." I need not remark upon the tone of the general newspaper press at the result of the discussion. Those to which I have referred have been laboring in the cause of Sunday sanctification; and with them I would contrast the Edinburgh newspaper of the Free Church, the Witness, which sees in what has taken place the ground of hope for their cause. It rests on "enlightened public opinion," as that which will compel the Legislature to enforce Sunday observance. When the public are truly "enlightened," they will not desire to see Sunday supplant the Sabbath; but the standard seems strange by which the social condition of our country is tried, when it is hoped that the public will urge their representatives to impose restrictions upon self-indulgence in any such form. Numerous as were the petitions of congregations and other bodies under clerical influence, for shutting the Post Office on Sundays, the fact is altogether unquestionable, that even among the professed friends of Sunday sanctification there is a growing laxness regarding it, that contrasts very decidedly with the strictness of a former age. And in the discussions that have taken place of late upon the subject, and the need for facilities of communication at all times, we are painfully impressed with the general want of confidence in the good guidance by God of all affairs. Seen in the light of such speeches, whether having a bearing on Sabbath or Sunday, the awful significancy of our Lord's question becomes apparent, "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith in the earth." We need not attribute it to a keen moral perception, that the Glasgow Chronicle declares that the recent efforts for the better observance of the church's chosen day did not arise from an improved religious condition, but from a false zeal. The avowal, by a paper having circulation chiefly among those who do make a profession of religion, is however entitled to the credit of greater candor.

For a few weeks, it seems probable the present Post Office arrangements will continue. To avoid farther discussion in Parliament, it may be expected that Government will give no order to resume Sunday deliveries until the recess, which, it is anticipated, will be about the middle of August. But already the Postmaster-General has issued an order to all Postmasters and sub-Postmasters, that letters to the officers of Government must still be forwarded on Sunday. This, the notice says, "must be clearly understood." But as, in order that such letters may be forwarded, it will be necessary that all the letters in the different bags be sorted, the diminution of labor arising from non-delivery will be inconsiderable. Meanwhile agencies have been established in different towns in England, through which, for one penny in addition to the postage stamp, letters are forwarded by the trains on Sunday, and being put into the Post Offices at their respective destinations, will be ready for Monday morning's delivery, as before. And, in order that Government may have the countenance of public opinion, for acting on what they have all along avowed as their own desire, an "Anti-Sunday Postal Restrictions Association", is being formed, to have its head-quarters in London, but extending its operations through the provinces, by holding meetings, &c. Not less may we expect a renewal of the meetings and petitions, so easily got up and managed, by those whose institution the Sunday is. The day is perhaps not far distant when this machinery will be less easily wrought, and when those few who really care for religion will less readily accept of traditions by which the law of God is made void.

The Sunday Trading Prevention Bill, which passed through the House of Lords, has this week met with a check in its progress through that of the Commons. The night before last it stood for the second reading—which very usually determines the fate of a Bill; the first reading, except in cases wherein there is almost absolute unanimity, being allowed to take place as a matter of form. But on this occasion, after several petitions had been presented against the Bill by Mr. Wakley and Mr. B. Wall, in answer to an appeal by the latter, Mr. C. Pearson said, that he had engaged, as the representative of an absent member, to move the second reading of this Bill in the event of many petitions being presented in its favor. But these not having been forthcoming, but many against it, he would postpone the second reading for a week, to afford farther opportunity. In the present advanced stage of the session, no measure leading to much discussion can hope to be carried—and such discussion the details of this Bill can scarcely fail to elicit.

"The Great Gorham Case," as it has been well called, has been decided in the Court of Exchequer, against the Bishop of Exeter. It will be remembered, that these individuals are the representatives of the two opposite parties on the subject of Baptismal Regeneration, into which the Church of England is at present divided—Mr. Gorham belonging to what is termed the Evangelical party, and his Bishop to the Tractarians, of Popish tendencies. Mr. Gorham having obtained an appointment to Bampford-cum-Speke, it became the Bishop's part, according to their law, to institute him to the living. The Bishop, however, on examination, found that Mr. Gorham did not hold the views set forth in the Liturgy, and refused to induct him. Appeal was made by the latter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who decided in his favor. The Bishop then appealed to the Court of Arches, a lay tribunal, from which he obtained a favorable decision; but Mr. G. next appealed to the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, who determined that his views were not such as to exclude him from the living. The Bishop, not yet foiled in his endeavors to maintain from farther adulteration the Popery of the Church of England, sought to evade the consequences of this decision, by declaring that it was that of an incompetent tribunal, and that Mr. Gorham's appeal from the Court of Arches ought to have been to the House of Convocation—a long defunct clerical Court, either an assemblage of ministers, whom he would name "priests," or a Board of Prelates. In order to have this declared, the Bishop went first to the lay Court, the Queen's Bench, and was beat; next, to another lay Court, that of Common Pleas; and, lastly, to the Court of Exchequer—and in vain. Meanwhile, applications have been made by Mr. Gorham to the Court of Arches to compel the Bishop to carry out the judgment of the Judicial Committee, by instituting Mr. G.; but delays have been made, apparently, for the purpose of seeing the result of the application to the Court of Exchequer. That decision is now given "with costs;" and from the nature of the case, these must be serious even to a Bishop. His advocate, Sir F. Kelly, in the Court of Exchequer, spoke of it as "a course of lengthy and costly litigation, which might well exhaust the fortune of the Bishop, and last out his life." It is, however, believed to be now at an end, in so far as law courts are concerned. Its bearing on the church herself we may advert to in another communication.

METHODISTS IN ILLINOIS.

A notice of the recent annual meeting of the Rock River Conference—a body embracing the northen half of Illinois—says that more than 100 traveling preachers are connected with it, about 700 organized congregations, and a membership of nearly 18,000, being an increase of 1,800 during the past year. Over 250 Sunday Schools, with 2,269 officers and teachers, 10,542 scholars, and 28,637 volumes in their libraries, are reported; together with 98 Bible, and 673 Infant Classes. From these Schools 250 conversions have taken place since the last report. The support of the ministers is chiefly derived from the voluntary contributions of the people. $2,000 of missionary money is appropriated to the whole field, $500 of which is employed in the support of a mission among the Swedes, who have settled in considerable numbers within the bounds of the Conference. The missionary collections during the year amount to $2,300—an excess of about $850 over those of the previous year. For the first time, the Conference gives more for missionary purposes than is expended within its limits. There is a Literary Institution at Mount Morris, called Rock River Seminary, under the patronage and control of the Conference. Over $4,000 was subscribed during the session of the Conference to liquidate the Seminary debt; and effective measures were also taken to secure the erection of additional Seminary buildings.

HEALTH OF MR. JUDSON.

Mr. Judson, the venerable Baptist Missionary, has been compelled to leave his station and go in search of health. He sailed on the 8th of April for the Isle of Bourbon. So reduced had he become, that it was feared he would die before the ship got out of the river. At last accounts, he had rallied, and seemed somewhat better. We copy a portion of a letter from Mrs. Judson, dated April 19th:—

"Dr. Morton says that Mr. Judson has had no specific disease, though every vital organ has in turn (partially and sometimes altogether) refused to perform its office. He spoke particularly of the sluggish action of the heart and lungs; and remarked, that the hardships of his past life were now made to tell most fearfully on his failing constitution. He says he remarked a look of age stealing over him for some months before his illness, and thought it the result of his short visit to America. In connection with this, he begged me to write to the Wades to postpone their return until Mr. W.'s health should be fully established; but I suppose a letter would not reach them previous to their embarkation.

"Dr. Morton told me, that if Mr. J. had remained in this place, a little longer, he would have lost all chances of life, but that now the probabilities were in his opinion about equally balanced. If I could know that he were living now, my hopes would be very strong; but it will be so, so long before I can hear!

"I will not attempt to describe my own feelings. Those who have suffered will be able to surmise in some small degree, and to those who have not, my words would be an empty sound. I can only be thankful that we are both in the keeping of a Being who loves us infinitely, and that we shall ere long find ourselves occupying the places now preparing for us, in that world where

"Sin and sorrow, pain and death,
Are felt and feared no more."

With these prospects, one cannot be very miserable, though the heart must needs sometimes be heavy.

"For a long time before he was ill, Mr. J. seemed daily to grow more spiritual and childlike, so much so that even some of the natives remarked the change in his preaching; he was all tenderness and tears. Since his illness he has been singularly resigned. 'How sweet to lie, entirely helpless, in the hands of God!' he would often remark. He seemed to have a deep sense of the love of Christ, and sometimes, several times a day, would break out with the exclamation, 'Oh, the love of Christ! the love of Christ!'"

SUPPRESSION OF GAMBLING.

Mr. J. H. Green, the Reformed Gambler, gives notice that he, as General Executive Agent and Corresponding Secretary of the New York Association for the Suppression of Gambling, has opened an office at No. 37 Chatham-st., N.Y., for the purpose of carrying out a plan of operations to suppress gambling. The following are among the ways in which he and the Association propose to do it:—

1. By opening what may properly be called an Intelligence Office, by means of which merchants, banking, insurance, and all other public institutions, may learn whether persons in their employ, or with whom they have pecuniary dealings, are wasting their substance at the gaming table.

2. By affording such advice and succor to those who have been victimized by gamblers, as may be necessary to the proper and certain administration of Law and Justice.

3. By enforcing the present law against gaming, Lotteries and Policies, whenever there is an occasion or an opportunity to do so.

4. By endeavoring to procure of the next New York Legislature, the passage of a new and stringent law against gaming, suited to the present condition of that vice in the State of New York.

5. By circulating petitions in New York, and all other States affected by the evils of Lotteries, praying the Legislatures of Delaware, Maryland and Virginia, to prohibit the drawing of Lotteries in their respective States.

6. By popular lectures and by the general circulation of books, tracts, &c., on the subject of gambling, by which means all classes of citizens will be duly warned of the danger of gaming, and of associating with those who indulge in play.

Liberty—Equality—Fraternity!!!

Fugitives from the prison house of Southern despotism with their friends and protectors in Council!

Such persons as have escaped from slavery, and those who are determined to stand by them, are invited to meet for mutual counsel and encouragement at Cazenovia, Madison County, New York, on Wednesday, 21st of August, 1850. The assembling will take place at 10 o'clock A. M., in the Independent Church, and the meeting will continue through two days. The object aimed at on the occasion will not be simply an exchange of congratulations and an expression of sympathy, but an earnest consideration of such subjects as are pertinent to the present condition and prospects of the Slave and Free Colored population of the country, and to the relations which good and true men sustain to the cause of impartial freedom and justice. Friends! shall not this be made a grand event? Shall not the channels of former sympathies be opened anew? Will not they of the "old guard" delight to look each other in the face once more, and renew their vows upon a common altar? Let them come from every quarter—free men, free women, and fugitives! They are bid a most cordial welcome by the good people of Cazenovia. There are friends, hospitalities, meeting-houses, and beautiful groves there! Let all come who have a heart and can!

NEW TRANSLATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Some time ago you published an editorial headed "New Translation," which suggests a plan for that purpose. I concur in what you say, in the main, and should delight to see a translation which could be relied on as strictly correct. I was rather surprised, however, at your closing remarks; for, after mentioning several places in King James' translation which you consider faulty, and blind to the mere English reader, you express the belief that it is "the best extant;" whereas the corrections you desire in the passages named, are all made in a "carefully revised and amended" translation, recently published by Dean & Barker, with the exception of Heb. 9 : 16, 17, in which I think the sense is clear as there rendered. That there is some objectionable rendering (to Sabbath keepers, at least,) there is no doubt. Yet I think it more correct, and much plainer, than the old version. It is stigmatized as the "Baptist Bible;" but if the original from which baptize is derived means to "immerse," why not let it be thus rendered? If you have carefully perused the amended work alluded to, and still think the old translation the "best extant," I should like to know your reasons therefor.

A. W.

☞ We know nothing about the translation referred to by our correspondent as "recently published by Dean and Barker," and therefore cannot say anything of its merits. If it is the one got up under the auspices of David Bernard, we must confess our unpreparedness to give any opinion Our belief that the common translation is, on the whole, the best extant, is not founded upon a careful examination of all that have ever been placed before the public, but only upon an examination of those which have obtained the greatest reputation.

HONORING A MISSIONARY'S DRAFT.—A recent number of the American Messenger published what purported to be a draft for twenty-five dollars, drawn by a missionary at Sheboygan, Wisconsin, on any "rich or liberal disciple." The Treasurer of the Society which publishes that paper soon received a check for the amount from one who says it is his "earnest prayer that many such drafts may be drawn, and as promptly honored." A lady in New Haven, on seeing the draft, cut it from the paper, and countersigning it "accepted," returned it with $25 to the Treasurer. A lady in New York, and another old friend and constant contributor, each forwarded the amount. Two gentlemen in Hadley, Mass., sent $25, and two other individuals sent $5 each.

BAPTIST MISSION IN WEST AFRICA.—The Committee of the English Baptist Missionary Society have received distressing intelligence from Western Africa. Mr. Newbegin, the only remaining European Missionary on that station, was proceeding by sea from Calabar to Clarence, for the benefit of his health, when he became worse, and died on the voyage. To add to the calamity, his young and interesting wife was so shocked by the event as to be deprived of reason.

PEACE IN AFRICA.—In a letter to the American Missionary, Geo. Thompson, the missionary among the Mendi Africans, says that the war which has raged between the tribes of that region for four or six years has been brought to an end. Mr. T. was chosen by other parties as a mediator, and after a long and perplexing negotiation, he succeeded in effecting a satisfactory peace. The waste of life and property and distress caused by the war, has been great, and the joy of the people at the restoration of peace is proportionate.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.—Under date of April 20, Mr. Loomis, the Seamen's Chaplain at Whampoa, says that the Church of England has established a mission at Fuh-Chau. A gentleman and his assistant, then in Hong Kong, were about to proceed to Fuh-Chau, and establish a hospital. Mr. and Mrs. Doolittle had arrived, destined for Amoy. Messrs. Martin and wives, destined for Ning Po." Mr. Loomis was about to embark on a visit to the Northern ports of China.

CONSECRATION OF THE FIRST FRUITS.—A missionary at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, writes that a member of his church brought him four parcels of gold dust, amounting to $40, as an offering to the cause of Christ. On going with four men to California, he had engaged with them that all the gold obtained by the first day's labor should be consecrated to the Lord, and this was the result. It was forwarded to the Treasurer of the American Board of Foreign Missions.

WESLEYAN PROSCRIPTION.—The Wesleyan Conference of England continues to exercise its authority in the way of expulsion. Mr. Alderman Schofield is the latest victim, he having been excommunicated for attending a Reform Conference at London, and other similar meetings. The matter caused considerable excitement among the Wesleyans at Sheffield.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE for August (No. 3) was laid on our table the first day of the month. Of its 144 large octavo pages, 127 are filled with choice selections from periodicals and new books, 9 are devoted to a monthly record of current events, 6 to literary notices, and 2 to the summer fashions. Such an amount of elegantly-printed and choice reading matter can no where else be found for 25 cents. That the reading public generally think so, is evident from the fact that they require the printing of thirty-two thousand copies as the first edition of a magazine only three months old.

THE INQUISITION.—Dr. Achilli, who recently escaped from the dungeons of the Inquisition at Rome, is said to have stated, in an address at Dublin, that "the inquisition is now what it always has been, save that it does not burn its victims alive. He himself was a living witness of its existence at present in Rome. During the last days of the Roman Republic its cruelties had been exposed; and from the human remains that had been found amidst its dungeons, it was evident that there had been persons recently murdered there. There were the remains of males and females exhumed of different ages, adults and young persons—some that might have remained in that place for fifty years, and others for not more than ten or fifteen. All of these had either died by strangulation or poison. Neither Pope nor Cardinal dare deny this statement, and the fact showed that the Church of Rome is the same as she existed in the dark ages."

LIBERALITY OF THE SULTAN.—The Jews at Damascus, in common with the Catholic and Greek churches, have experienced the liberality of the Sultan, who, as we learn from a letter of Sir Moses Montefiore in the Morning Chronicle, has addressed to the Chief Rabbi, and to the local heads of those churches, a request that each should furnish from among their co-religionists a member of the New Divan. This Council, which formerly consisted of Moslems exclusively, has now only five Moslem members. A great change must have taken place since the date of the severe persecutions of the Jews a few years ago. Now they are not only guarded against the effects of prejudice and intolerance, but they have secured to them that consideration to which they are entitled, in common with others of whatsoever creed.

REVIVAL INTEREST IN GERMANY.—The Rev. J. G. Oncken, of the American Baptist Mission at Hamburg, writes that, during the last year, 112 converts had been added to the church, and that about forty missionaries and colporteurs, nearly half a million of tracts and other publications, and 22,000 copies of the holy Scriptures, had disclosed the untold tale of Christ's love to sinners among the millions in Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Hungary, Austria, Holland and Switzerland. The churches are becoming organized into associations for spreading the gospel, and it is recommended to every church to appoint brethren to supply every member, each month, with a suitable number of tracts for distribution. Of the converts added to the church, not a few were convinced of the error of their ways by reading tracts thus circulated.

LIBERAL BEQUESTS.—Thomas F. Thompson, Esq., of New York, who died on the 22d of July, has left the following sums to charitable institutions in this City:—The Protestant Episcopal Orphan Asylum, $4,000; the Asylum for the Blind, $2,000; the Deaf and Dumb Institution, $2,000; the Society for the Relief of Respectable Indigent Females, $2,000; the Widows and Orphans of Seamen, $2,000; the Society for the Relief of the Poor of the City, $2,000; and also the Moral Reform Society. Beside these, the deceased gentleman has made other bequests to various private individuals whom he held in high estimation.

ANTI-SLAVERY CELEBRATION.—On the 1st inst., the Anniversary of British West India Emancipation was celebrated at Worcester, Mass., in a very spirited manner. Among the speakers were Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Charles C. Burleigh, Rev. Mr. Carpenter of England, Edmund Quincy, Wendell Phillips, and S. S. Foster. Mr. Quincy read a letter he had recently received from Cassius M. Clay, expressing his sympathy with the objects aimed at by the American Anti-Slavery Sotciey, and enclosing a donation in aid of the same, with a promise of more if needed.

METHODIST MISSIONS.—Rev. James Colder, of Philadelphia, is about going as an additional missionary to Fuh-Chau, China, and is to be accompanied by a "missionary physician," if a suitable person can be found. Bishop Morris has recently made the following appointments for Oregon and California:

Rev. F. S. Hoyt, principal of the Oregon Institute.

Rev. Edward Bannisser, principal of California Academy.

Rev. S. D. Simonds, for the regular work.

Rev. M. C. Briggs, for the regular work.

Rev. John Flinn for the regular work.

Rev. E. G. Nicholson for the regular work, and stationed at Santa Fé.

WARNING TO ANTI-PAPISTS.—The New York Freeman's Journal, which assumes to be an organ of Roman Catholic sentiment, thus announces the late calamity off our Long Island coast:—

"The too widely known Margaret Fuller, formerly of The New York Tribune, was shipwrecked and drowned off Fire Island, just as she was approaching the American coast. She had with her the manuscript of of a book in which she sang the praises of all the scoundrels who pillaged Rome, and vilified the Pope and all decent men. Her terrible end should be a warning to the miscreants of whom she was an advocate."

THE DESCENDANTS OF ROBERT BURNS.—"For some time," says the Daily News "there has been treveling in the interior of the remote island of Borneo, and sojourning among its rude people of head hunters, a young man by the name of Burns, and this young man is the grandson of Robert Burns, and "bonny Jean." This adventurous youth has not only been hospitably and kindly treated by the rude Dyaks, but a prince of the Kayan nation, the most powerful of the island has given him one of his daughters to wife; so that the future biographers of Robert Burns will, in all human likelihood, be able to enumerate among his descendants those also of a Bornean prince. Mr. Burns has discovered mines of antimony and coal-fields in Borneo more extensive than any in the world, out of America.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, July 29.

After disposing of unimportant morning business, the Compromise Bill was taken up, the question pending upon Mr. Bradbury's amendment, providing for the ascertainment of the boundary of Texas by a Board of Commissioners, whose action shall undergo subsequent consideration and revision by Congress and by Texas. A substitute was offered, authorizing Texas to institute a suit against the U. S. in the Supreme Court. Remarks were made by Messrs. Clay, Benton, Rusk, Dayton, Turney, Cass, Ewing, Hale, and others, after which the substitute was rejected. The question then recurring upon Bradbury's amendment, it was rejected—yeas 28, nays 28—thus deciding the fate of the much-talked-of Compromise Bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A motion by Mr. Olds to suspend the rules to take up a resolution for a recess from Aug. 28 to Nov. 1, was lost, yeas 72, nays 92—showing a majority resolved to stand by and do the business before adjourning.

A motion by Mr. Wentworth, to suspend the rules, to admit a resolution against adjourning until California is admitted, was lost, not having two-thirds. The vote, 99 to 83, shows a decided majority of 16 resolved to admit California.

The California Bill then came up, and several propositions were made to adjust matters involving the slavery question, the admission of States, and the formation of Governments for the Territories. No votes worth recording were taken.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, July 30.

Robert C. Winthrop, appointed Senator from Massachusetts, in place of Mr. Webster, being qualified, took his seat.

Mr. Pearce, from the Select Committee of the Foote and Benton difficulty, made a report, which was ordered to be printed.

The Compromise Bill was taken under consideration. Mr. Dawson moved to amend Mr. Bradbury's amendment, by providing that until Texas or the United States shall reject the Report of the Commissioners, the part of the bill providing a Territorial Government for New Mexico shall not be in force over the territory east of the Rio Grande. This was adopted—yeas 30, nays 28; and then, by a like vote, Mr. Bradbury's amendment was adopted. A motion to lay the bill on the table was rejected—yeas 25, nays 32.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The bill to pay revolutionary and other pensions was discussed a while, and laid aside without action.

The West Point Appropriation Bill was read and referred.

The California Bill then came up, and Mr. Duncan offered an amendment, that until the boundary is agreed to by the United States and Texas, the Territorial Government authorities, by this bill, shall not go into operation east of the Rio Grande.

IN SENATE. FOURTH DAY, July 31.

The Compromise Bill was taken up at 12 o'clock. The New Mexico sections having been stricken out for amendment, the Senate refused to reinstate them, 28 to 25. A motion to strike out all but the California sections failed by 29 to 28, when a motion to strike out all but Utah was carried by 34 to 25. A motion to make the line of 36½° the southern boundary of Utah failed by 37 to 26. A motion to lay the bill on the table failed by 29 to 20. Finally, the Senate, after defeating several attempts to adjourn, to postpone, &c., ordered the bill providing merely a Territorial Government for Utah to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 32, nays 18. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Crowell reported a bill enabling the President to negotiate treaties with the Indians south and west of the Missouri, on the northern boundary of Texas and about New Mexico. The bill contains an appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars, and was referred to Committee of the Whole.

The Fortification Bill was discussed in Committee of the Whole, and a lively skirmish took place between Mr. Bissell and Mr. Cartter, touching the appropriation of fifteen thousand dollars for military erections near Detroit. No conclusion arrived at.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, Aug. 1.

The independent bill for the admission of California was made the special order for every day at 12 o'clock until disposed of.

The California Bill, having been taken up, several amendments were proposed, and an animated discussion between Messrs. Foote, Dawson, Clay, and Pearce, followed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. White asked leave to offer a resolution, which was read for information, that the Speaker appoint a special Committee of twenty-one members, whose duty it shall be to meet, consult, and draft such measures for the consideration of the House as may in their judgment have the effect of allaying the present excitement prevailing in different sections of the Union. Objection was made, and the matter dropped.

The Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of sundry memorials asking the use of the Navy to carry Delegates to the Peace Convention at Frankfort-on-the-Main.

Mr. Stanton, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to establish a line of war steamers to the coast of Africa, for the suppression of the slave trade, and the promotion of commerce and navigation; which is referred to the Committee of the Whole. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Navy, after the passage of this act, to contract with Joseph Bryan, of Alabama, or Nicholas Saunders, of New York, and their associates, for the building and equipment of three steamers to run between the United States and the Coast of Africa, each ship to be not less than four thousand tons burthen; so constructed as to be convertible, at the least possible expense, into war steamers of the first class, to be commanded by officers of the navy. In the event of war, the government to take the ships. One is to leave Baltimore and one New York every three months, to carry not exceeding twenty-five hundred passengers each; the charge for passage to be ten dollars for free negroes over twelve years of age, and five dollars for negroes under twelve years, under the Colonization Society's direction.

The Fortification Bill was taken up and discussed till 4 o'clock, and a motion was made to adjourn, when a message was received from the Senate that they had passed a bill establishing a Territorial Government for Utah. Amid general laughter and much confusion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, Aug. 2.

The California Bill was taken up at 12 o'clock, the question being on Foote's amendment, restricting the boundaries of California to 36° 30'. After remarks by several Senators, the amendment was rejected. Mr. Douglass' amendment relative to the Public Domain was agreed to; after which the farther consideration of the bill was postponed.

Mr. Pearce gave notice that he would on Monday introduce a bill to establish the Territorial Government of New Mexico and settle the boundary of Texas. The Senate then adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House was engaged mainly with the Indian Appropriation Bill, but accomplished nothing. An ineffectual effort was made to adjourn till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. SABBATH, Aug. 3.

The House, in Committee of the Whole, spent the day upon the Indian Appropriation Bill. Mr. Johnson, of Ark., offered an amendment, which was adopted, appropriating $30,000 for procuring information and preparing statistics, and making treaties with, and presents to, various tribes of Indians in the United States, on the borders of Mexico. In the course of the debate, Mr. Kaufman, of Texas, said that he had read letters from Major Neighbors, who was of the opinion that a few thousand dollars, to make presents, would have far better effect than military force to coerce the Indians, and an expenditure of millions in warfare. Among other amendments adopted, was one of $15,000 for the extinguishment of the title of Indians in the territory of Minnesota, and a similar sum to carry out the treaties with the Texas Indians, and preserve peace and tranquility with them. These amendments were concurred in by the House, which adjourned pending the third reading of the bill.

LATE EUROPEAN NEWS.

The steamer Canada, with one week later news from all parts of Europe, arrived at New York on the 2d inst.

The U. S. Mail Steamer Pacific arrived at Liverpool in ten and a half days from New York, allowing for difference of time.

At latest dates the American fleet was off the port of Lisbon, but the papers furnish no news relative to the difficulties between Portugal and the United States.

Little doubt exists but that hostilities have ere this actually recommenced between Denmark and the Duchies. If so, important results are likely to ensue, as a large Russian fleet is off the coast, for the avowed purpose of giving the Danes all the assistance they may require.

A difficulty has arisen between Spain and Portugal in consequence of the marriage of the King's sister with Condé Montemolin, the son of Don Carlos. The Spanish Minister has protested against this alliance as a breach of the quadruple treaty, and has asked for his passports.

The butcher Haynau has been dismissed in disgrace from the government of Hungary. The immediate cause of this dismissal is owing to his having set at liberty Bezerady, a confidential friend of Kossuth.

The law against the press passed the French Assembly by a majority of 127. Its chief features are, that the caution money is enormously increased. Stamps are imposed on all newspapers, Paris journals being more heavily stamped than Provincial. Every newspaper article must be signed by the name of the writer.

The last overland mail brought news tha a serious epidemic had broken out in Canton, China, which resembled the Yellow Fever in the West Indies. It is said to be invariably fatal, and in most cases in about 12 hours. The Cholera was raging frightfully at Cambodia.

The Queen of Spain has been delivered of a son, which lived only a few moments.

The weather and growing crops in England are reported to be all that could be desired.

The present Sir R. Peel has been elected for Tamworth without opposition.

The Cholera has again broken out in London.

Accident on the Erie Railroad.

As the down freight train on the Erie Railroad was crossing the iron bridge over a small tributary of the Delaware, about three miles above Lackawaxen, at 1 o'clock Wednesday afternoon, July 31, the bridge gave way, precipitating the entire train into the stream, and strewing the freight in all directions. The train was very heavy, consisting of nearly twenty cars, which were filled principally with live stock for the New York market. The accident occurred soon after the passage of the express train. As the locomotive of the freight train came upon the bridge, it was observed to settle gradually; but the engineer putting on all steam, the increased power carried the engine over safely. The tender parting from it, fell, with some fifteen of the freight cars, into the ravine below, a distance of some 25 feet. The stock on board consisted of some 500 sheep, over 100 head of cattle, and 200 hogs, much of which was destroyed.

The most painful part of this calamity, however, is the loss of three lives, viz: J. L. Clapp, of Parrisville, Ohio, the owner of most of the cattle, Mr. Randall, brakeman, H. C. Clapp, a nephew of J. L. Clapp before mentioned. The death of the latter occurred under peculiarly distressing circumstances. He was discovered soon after the catastrophe, buried among the fragments of the cars, directly beneath an ox which was still alive, and, at times, greatly distressed Mr. C. by kicking him in the breast. It was impossible to extricate him until the ox was removed. He retained his senses, and gave directions how he could be relieved. He thought he could endure the weight of the ox until it could be killed and removed piecemeal. It was therefore shot, but in its dying struggles kicked Mr. C. so violently in the breast as to deprive him of life. Immediately previous to his death, he spoke much of his family in Ohio, stating that he had there a wife and four children.

In addition to the killed, Mr. Hatch, late conductor, was much injured; also two brakemen. Mr. H. was on the tender when the bridge gave way, but saved himself from being crushed in the wreck, by leaping from it. His head, however, is supposed to have struck a stone abutment of the bridge in his descent, causing a bad gash.

The total loss of property resulting from this catastrophe is estimated by one of the Directors of the Company at $30,000 or $35,000. The cars were worth about $700 each, and $50 a head was recently offered for the cattle. The loss of brute life by the accident was 72 oxen, 85 sheep, and 70 hogs.

FIRE ISLAND PLUNDERERS.—A large amount of property washed ashore from the ship Elizabeth, recently wrecked near Fire Island, was seized and carried to places of concealment. The Collector of New York has taken steps to bring the plunderers to justice. Proof of guilt has been procured against many persons, and an example may be made which will be felt and remembered. Articles of clothing belonging to Mr. Sumner, the Marchioness Ossoli, and her child, have been found in several of the houses searched. About forty persons, several of whom have heretofore been considered respectable, have been implicated. Part of them are residing on Fire Island, and the rest scattered along the shore for a distance of miles. The property seized was brought to the City, and the names of the parties with whom it was found are to be laid before the Grand Jury of the County, which meets next month. In one house was found 1,000 lbs. of wool, in another 40 bars of soap, in another 20, 17, &c., in another a quantity of silk, in another bbls. of oil, in another flasks of oil, Leghorn hats, &c. All this came from the wreck of the Elizabeth, and some of the goods had been carried miles from the wreck. Upon the person of one woman was found a dress, supposed to have belonged to Madame Ossoli, and there are reasons to suppose that this dress was taken from the body, with the money and jewels which she was known to have tied about her waist. Several of her relatives who have been to the Island are of the opinion that her body was washed ashore, plundered by the pirates, and then secretly buried. [Trib.

ANOTHER STEAMBOAT DISASTER ON LAKE ERIE.—A dispatch dated Erie, Pa., July 31st, and published in the Buffalo Morning Express of August 1st, says: Our citizens were again startled this morning by another of those occurrences which have been so frequent and so destructive to life on the Lakes this season. The steamer America, Capt. Squier, one of the boats of the Sandusky line, on her passage down, exploded one of her middle boilers about 1 o'clock this morning, a short distance below Barcelona. The Alabama came along soon after the occurrence and towed her into this port. The explosion must have been terrific, as the deck over her boilers is completely torn up. There were about 150 passengers on board, and it is surprising so many escaped injury. About thirty were scalded, five of whom were dead before the boat reached this port, and six or eight more are so badly injured that there is but little hope of their recovery. It is feared that some jumped overboard in the alarm produced by the explosion, and were drowned. One or two who jumped over got on board again, but it is feared others were lost. The whole number known to be dead is eight. Reports as to the cause of the accident are contradictory.

POWDER MILL EXPLOSION AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Monday last, says the Pottsville Emporium of Aug. 1, an explosion occurred at the powder mill of Messrs. Elijah Hammer and Michael Seltzer, of this borough situate on Mill Creek, just above St. Clair, which proved fearfully destructive of human life, as well as property. About 300 pounds of powder was exploded, which utterly demolished the building, with the exception of a portion of the frame. Theobald Sherrer, one of the two workmen engaged in the mill at the time, was instantly killed, his body being shockingly burned and mangled. John Scharr, the other workman, although not killed outright, was so horribly burned and otherwise injured, that he survived only about six hours. Two lads, one 17 and the other 10 years of age, sons of Mr. Solomon McKianey, of Barry township, who had accompanied their father to the mill with a load of charcoal, were instantly killed. Their bodies were fearfully burned and disfigured. Mr. Daniel Dengler, of Berry, who accompanied Mr. McKinney to the mill, intending to ride home with him, also fell a victim to the explosion.

This is the fifth or sixth time that the same mill has been blown up within a few years, and similar catastrophes have occurred at other mills in the county, at none of which, however, was there so great and melancholy destruction of human life.

DEATH OF A PUBLISHER—Mr. James G. Wilson died at his residence in Plainfield, New Jersey, on Wednesday morning of last week, after a tedious illness of more than a year's duration. His disease was consumption. Mr. Wilson was well known in New-York, having been successful as a newspaper publisher for fifteen years past. One of his first efforts was his association with Mr. Greeley in the publication of the New-Yorker in 1835. He afterward published the New-York Whig and the Empire State, and in 1829 he commenced the publication of the Brother Jonathan, which attained a large and profitable circulation. In 1842 Wilson & Co. began the issue of cheap re-prints of English books; and being first in the field of cheap literature, realized a rapid fortune. Since that period Mr. Wilson has been engaged in the book business, and in the publication of a paper called Wilson's Weekly Dispatch.

The assignees of Wm. P. Van Rensselaer, have sold Mr. V. R.'s splendid mansion, opposite Albany, with 950 acres, and the farm houses, lodge, &c. to Paul C. Forbes, of Boston, for $62,500. Mr. F. intends to take up his residence in this splendid mansion, whose construction cost more than Mr. F. has paid for the whole estate.

The Newark Daily Advertiser says that the Burlington Co. Mutual Insurance Company met a loss of a few thousand of dollars on Friday, by the burning of a mill at Vincent town, and that this is the only loss within the last eighteen years.

A detachment of several companies of soldiers recently arrived at Jefferson Barracks from New York, via the Lakes. They were recruits, intended to fill up the skeletons of regiments from New York. On their arrival at Lasalle, the cholera appeared among them in a malignant form and seven or eight of them died. This created a perfect panic among the soldiers, and before they arrived at the Barracks about seventy of them had deserted.

A dispatch dated Danville, Penn., Thursday, Aug. 1, says: "The Northumberland Canal Bridge broke down early this morning, while the Harrisburg stage was crossing it. The stage was precipitated into the Canal, with 11 passengers, among them Mr. Benj. D. Jones, who was instantly killed. The remainder of the passengers were more or less injured. Two horses were killed."

The proceedings at a mass meeting at Galveston on the 20th, declare that the present civil and military government of Santa Fe have violated honor and right. Texas claims the right to reject every proposition for the sale or disposition of that territory unless based upon the distinct recognition of the boundary defined by the act of 1836.

The Milwaukee Wisconsin says that an Irishman, named McCalarty, residing at Kenosha, murdered his wife on the 22d in a most brutal manner. He forced her into a hogshead of water, and kept her under till she was drowned. The murderer is in the hands of the officers of the law.

Six slaves escaped from Kentucky, and while passing through a retired locality in Lawrence Co., Ohio, met eight white men, and supposing them to be in pursuit of them fired upon them, wounding several. They then beat the rest severely and fled. A large party on hearing of this affair started in pursuit.

At Milton, Charles Southwick alias Palmer, was examined on the charge of being concerned in the late robbery of the Dorchester & Milton Bank of about $32,000, and held for trial in default of bail for $30,000. James H. Brooks of Providence, was also examined as a participator in the robbery, and discharged. He is, however, held as a receiver of the stolen property.

There is a rather better inquiry for Land Warrants, and there is no supply pressing on the market. The fear of any unfavorable action at Washington this session is wearing away. The range of prices is $115 to $130, the latter being for single warrants, guarantied by undoubted parties.

New Orleans papers have later news from Texas. Recently a skirmish took place between the Indians and a party of Whites under Lieut. Underwood. The Lieutenant and seven men were wounded, and 2 men were killed. The Indian loss was heavy.

Two men (brothers) named Vickey, lost their lives at Boston the other day, from the foul air of a cistern inio which they had descended for the purpose of cleaning it out A third came near losing his life.

At Boston, on the 1st inst., during the storm five men who were at work in the bottom of the brig Washington, lying in "Sampson's dock," were knocked down and stunned by lightning.

Several mills in Rhode Island have recently determined to suspend operations, among which are the Campton Mill, 10,000 spindles; and the Newport Steam Mill—all manufacturing print cloths.

Henry Clay has gone to Newport, R. I., to recruit his health, which is said to be much impaired by the incessant toil and anxiety of the last few months.

The Bridgeport Sentinel says that two steamboats are anchored at the spot where the steamer Lexington sank. It will be recollected, that at the time of the loss of the L., on the night of January 13, 1840, a large amount of specie was on board, under the charge of Harnden's Express. Workmen, under the direction of a competent Engineer, are now engaged in raising the hull, which lies in the depth of about 130 feet of water, off Old Field Light, about 12 miles from Bridgeport. It is expected that they will be able to make a 'raise.'

At 11 o'clock Monday night, says the Newark Mercury, a splendid celestial phenomenon made its appearance. The moon was up about 15 degrees in the east, and a shower of heavy drops of rain coming up, flung upon the western sky the most perfect rainbow we have ever seen, even by the reflection of solar rays. Those whose eyes were not heavenward that night, lost a treat which they may never have the opportunity of enjoying. It vanished in a few minutes after 11.

An Italian musician from New York, named Carlo Bassigallope, died by poison at Providence, R. I., on Friday last. He had been engaged to perform at the saloon of Mr. F. F. Foster—complained of feeling unwell, and drank a large quantity of tartar emetic in mistake for cream of tartar. He was 30 years of age, was born near Genoa, and leaves a wife and child whom he had recently sent for to join him in this country.

Capt. Hall, of the brig Margaret Hall, from Cienfuegos for Philadelphia, arrived at Baltimore Tuesday July 30, in the Norfolk boat, and reports that his vessel was totally lost off Cape Hatteras on the 18th ult. Himself and part of the crew succeeded in swimming ashore—three of the crew were drowned. Capt. Hall reports seeing eight vessels ashore along the coast.

The transit duties paid to the State of New Jersey, by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, on passengers and merchandize, for the quarter from April 1 to June 30, 1850, amounted to $10,625 98. The duties paid for the same quarter in 1849, were $9,832 39, showing an increase for this quarter of this year of $783 59.

Cholera has broken out at Uniontown, Pa., and Harper's Ferry, Va. Several fatal cases occurred at the latter place July 29. Cholera prevails in a number of towns along the National Road.

During the procession at Philadelphia, Tuesday, July 30, two men were sun-struck, and were taken to the Pennsylvania Hospital. One of them died, and all hopes for the recovery of the other have been given up.

An unprecedented number of deaths from heat occurred in New York last week. From other cities, also, we have reports of numerous deaths from the same cause.

On Second-day afternoon, Aug. 5, a wall in the rear of No. 40 Spruce-st., New York, fell upon and buried a number of workmen, of whom four were killed, and three seriously injured.

☞ On looking over the list of subscribers for membership in the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, the Agent finds the names of several individuals from whom the money has not yet been received. The First Annual Report of the Society, to be presented at Alfred in September, will contain a list of members, including of course only those who have complied with the Constitution by paying five dollars to make themselves members or twenty-five dollars to make themselves honorary directors. It is hoped that all who have subscribed will send on the money before the Anniversary, and that many who have not subscribed will send both their names and the money.

MARRIED,

In DeRuyter, on the 2d of July, by Rev. J. W. Morton, Mr. JOEL C. WEST, of Shiloh, N. J., to Miss E. MALVINA CRANDALL, daughter of Henry Crandall, of DeRuyter.

DIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., July 9th, AMY ANGELINE, only daughter of Reuben and Phebe Brown, aged 20 years. In the death of Angeline her parents, her friends, and the church, have been deeply afflicted. Long will her memory be cherished. In her death religion achieved a glorious victory. Such calmness and cheerful acquiescence are seldom witnessed. Though naturally timid, yet she seemed almost to lose sight of herself in her deep concern for others. Her dying chamber was hallowed by her prayers for friends, brothers, companions, the church, and the poor slave. By her silent and Christian composure she demonstrated that

> "Jesus can make a dying bed > Feel soft as downy pillows are;"

while her joyful anticipation of glory burst forth in strains of sweetest melody. May our last end be like hers. COM.

In Hayfield, Pa., May 9th, after ten hours of great suffering, occasioned by being scalded, HIRAM BOYD, son of Eld. A. A. F. and Lucy C. Randolph, aged three years and two months.

Firm is the promise our Saviour has given,
Who has said that of such is the kingdom of Heaven.

THE AMERICAN ADVERTISER,

A reference work for purchasers, containing the cards of merchants and manufacturers in every line of business. PRALL, LEWIS & CO., Publishers,
76 Nassau-st., N. Y.

Harper's New Monthly Magazine,

No. 1 published June 1, 1850.

PROSPECTUS.—The design of the Publishers in issuing this work, is to place within the reach of the great mass of American people the unbounded treasures of the Periodical Literature of the present day. Periodicals enlist much of the literary talent and creative genius of the age. The best writers in every nation, devote themselves mainly to the Reviews, Magazines, and Newspapers. Through the pages of these, the most powerful historical essays, the most elaborate critical disquisitions, the most exquisite delineations of manners and of Nature, the highest Poetry, and the most brilliant Wit, have, within the last ten years, found their way to the public heart.

The ablest and best productions of Lamartine, Dickens, Alison, Lever, Bulwer, Croly, and Macauley, are found in Reviews, Newspapers, and Magazines. Their productions, however, intermingled with much that is of merely local and transient interest, are scattered through scores of periodicals, so as to make it obviously impossible that, under present circumstances, any considerable number even of the reading public, and much more, that the great mass of the community, should have an opportunity of becoming familiar with them.

The Publishers of the New Monthly Magazine intend to remedy this evil, and to place such of the Periodical Literature of the day, as has commanding interest, in the hands of all who have the slightest desire to become acquainted with it. Each number of their Magazine will contain 144 pages octavo, in double columns. The volume of a single year, therefore, will present nearly 2,000 pages of the choicest of the Miscellaneous Literature of the age. The Magazine will transfer to its pages, as rapidly as they may be issued, the continuous tales of Dickens, Bulwer, Croly, Lever, Warren, and other distinguished contributors to British Periodicals; articles of commanding interest from all the leading Quarterly Reviews of both Great Britain and the United States; critical notices of the publications of the day; speeches and addresses of distinguished men upon topics of universal interest; notices of events in Science, Literature, and Art, in which the people at large have an interest, &c., &c. Special regard will be had to such articles as relate to the economy of social life, or tend to promote in any way the well-being of those who are engaged in any department of productive activity. A carefully prepared Fashion plate, and other pictorial illustrations, will accompany each number.

This Magazine is not intended exclusively for any class of readers. The Publishers have at their command the exhaustless resources of current Periodical Literature in all its departments. They have the aid of editors in whom both they and the public confide. They have no doubt that, by an intelligent use of these appliances, they can present a monthly compendium of the periodical productions of the day which no one would willingly be without; and they intend to publish it at so low a rate that its cost shall not prevent its making its way into the hands and family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States.

TERMS—$3 a year, or 25 cents a number. The work may be obtained of Booksellers and Periodical Agents, and of the Publishers.

Liberal arrangements will be made with the Trade and with Agents for extra efforts in circulating the work, and specimen numbers will be supplied gratuitously for canvassers.

WATER.

"Water! water!" cries the bird,
With his singing, gentle note;
And the liquid cry is heard
Pouring from the little throat;
Water! water! clear and sweet!
"Te-weet! Te-weet!"

"Water! water!" roars the ox,
While it rushes at his side,
Down among the mossy rocks
Rippling with its crystal tide;
Water! water! pure and true!
"Moo! Moo!"

"Water! water!" said the tree,
With its branches spreading high;
"Water! water!" rustled he,
For his leaves were very dry;
Water! water! for the tree!
Pure and free!

"Water! water!" said the flower,
Whispering with its perfumed breath;
"Let me have it in an hour,
Ere I thirsting droop in death!
Water, water, soft and still,
Is my will!"

"Water! water!" said the grain,
With its yellow head on high;
And the spreading fertile plain,
Ripening, joined the swelling cry;
Water for the grains of gold!
Wealth untold!

Water! water! sparkling, pure,
Giveth Nature everywhere—
If you drink it, I am sure
It will never prove a snare!
Water is the thing for me—
Yes! and thee!

Water! water! Young and old!
Drink it, crystal-like and sweet!
Never heed the tempter bold—
Crush him underneath your feet!
Water! water! youth, for thee—
Thee and me! [N. Y. Evangelist.

SENATORIAL SKETCHES.

Grace Greenwood, who is at Washington, in a letter to the Philadelphia Post, gives a few off-hand sketches of prominent Senators:—

Webster and Clay I had seen before, yet I should have singled them out, I think, had I not known them. The unapproachable grandeur of Webster's head, the imperious eye of Clay, the Wellingtonian front of Benton, who could mistake?

There was, that morning, animated discussion on the Compromise Bill, of which you will have seen the report. Clay, Webster, Benton, Seward and Foote were among the speakers. Mr. Clay was suffering from recent indisposition, but he spoke with great energy and with keen flashings of his wonderful eye. It cannot be denied, however, that he oftener parried the attacks of his opponents with wit than met them in argument. At one time, when Benton was thundering out a severe passage, directed especially to him, he bent forward and placed his hand to his ear, in the attitude of listening, saying—"Speak a little louder," but ere the close of the debate, this early morning coolness forsook the distinguished Senator—there were some keener passes between him and Benton, and both the honorable and venerable Senators seemed somewhat oblivious of the little proprieties naturally to be expected of such "potent, grave and reverend seigniors."

Webster's manner in speaking, had a sort of solemn heaviness, which may have been impressive, but which certainly was not inspiring. I was surprised to find Senator Foote a slight, genial looking, elderly gentleman. I had supposed him to be a younger and more fiery-visaged individual. He is a most restless statesman—seems afflicted with a sort of patriotic form of the dance St. Vitus—is on his feet with every opportunity, pouring forth burning fluids of speech and inflammable gases of Southern democracy. In strong contrast was the calm self-possessed Yankee coolness of Seward, who never moves from his positions, nor suffers himself to be "riled" in the least. Gen. Cass has a good, easy, uncle-ish appearance, and his face has a rather dull, after-dinner expression, not indicative of transcendant abilities, but which may do him injustice. Senator Houston amused me greatly as I looked down upon him from the gallery. He sits at his desk and whittles diligently and deliberately by the hour, very much with the air and expression of some worthy, complacent, stout, spectacled old lady at her knitting—pretty well satisfied with things in general, and thinking of nothing in particular. Now and then, he pauses to take a fresh piece of timber, or sharpen his knife, as said worthy old lady might pause to take up a stitch, or regale herself with a pinch of snuff. I perceive that most of the honorable Senators are "up to that." A Whig may be seen passing his box to a Democrat, who passes it to a Southern ultraist, who passes it to a Northern incendiary—and all three forget their factional differences in a delightful concert of sternutation. No business is too grave—no speaker too eloquent, to be "sneezed at."

Mr. Clay has a peculiarly gracious manner of acknowledging snuff-box courtesies, and a peculiarly graceful way of taking a pinch—but I do not perceive that he sneezes more harmoniously than his humbler fellow-citizens.

I suppose that beauty is not precisely the forte of the Senate of the United States—so I trust I commit no offense when I say, that a rotundity of figure slightly transcending the lines of grace and beauty, and a substantial, democratic plainness of feature, constitute the prevailing style in that august assembly.

The President, Mr. Fillmore, is a very handsome man, however, and Col. Benton is one of the most impressive men in the Senate, in person, air and manner. He looks the perfect embodiment of a great, inflexible, untiring will—a will which one can only doubt when the eye is turned to the other side of the chamber, where sits his watchful, skillful, irresistible opponent, with the old fire of his wondrous intellect unquenched, and the old strength of his Napoleonic will unbroken.

A most remarkable person is Mr. Soule of Louisiana. His figure is rather slight, but firmly and finely formed—his face wears a dark, dramatic style of beauty, which lights up most splendidly and effectively when he speaks. His action is exceedingly graceful, and his voice melodious, though he speaks with a marked French accent. I like to look from him to his political and natural antipode, Mr. Hale of New Hampshire. This senator has the appearance of one who takes the world kindly and easily. He is rather stout in person, but looks vigorous and active—in the form of his head and the outline of his face, he is strikingly like Napoleon, but the expression is more frank and genial. Personally he is, I fear, quite popular with all parties here, and politically he moves on in a straight and open course, not antagonistic in spirit, but most uncompromisingin principle.

Mr. Clemens of Ala., the youngest member of the Senate, and a gentleman quite well known of late for his unflattering estimate of Northern ladies, is one by himself—a decided individual. The length and disposal of his locks; and a certain ornate style of dress, bordering on the flashy, are remotely suggestive of a favorite character well known to Philadelphia play-goers. On the whole, I should say he was a gentleman likely to smoke vehemently, drive rapidly, and wear his hat with a one-sided inclination.

FEAT OF STRENGTH AND ENDURANCE.

We do not know that we have either heard or read of a more singular instance of strength and endurance in a horse, than is evidenced in the following incident furnished us by our friend, Capt. William A. Stephenson, of this county. In January last, Capt. Stephenson started South with a drove of mules and horses, and proceeded with them as far as the junction of the Big Warrior and Little Warrior rivers, where they form the Black Warrior, in Blount county, Alabama. Here he found the bridge across Big Warrior—the usual crossing place—had been swept away by the high waters, and the ferry boat entirely too small and frail to carry his stock over in safety. He at once determined to swim them across, as the only means left of enabling him to proceed with them promptly to his destination, and they were accordingly driven into the current, and started across the river. With great difficulty they landed safe, with the exception of a large chestnut sorrel, who, probably entering the stream too low, was swept gradually down by the force of the current till its depth and rapidity, and the steepness of the river bank, rendered it impossible to get him out. Capt. Stephenson followed him along the bank for several miles, from half-past two o'clock Monday afternoon, till late at night, when it became too dark to see him, the horse still swimming against the current, and breasting its whole force with the most determined resolution. On Tuesday, Capt. Stephenson offered a reward to any one who should get him out alive; a number of the neighbors watched the gallant swimmer, but without being able to make any successful attempt towards his rescue. Several times he made towards the bank, but its rocky steepness prevented his getting a foot-hold, and sent him back to buffet vainly against the sweeping current. At one time a heavy piece of floating drift-wood struck his back, and even with this heavy burden pressing upon him, he struggled upward as bravely but as ineffectually as before. The darkness of the night again hid him from their view, and none believed that he could survive the long and chilling struggle.

On Wednesday morning, however, the watchers on the bank again found the noble animal, some miles lower down, still with his head up stream, and bravely contending with the cold and powerful current. Through all that day he maintained his position against the stream, though still carried further down every hour, until towards night he neared a temporary island formed by a slue running over the lower grounds adjoining it. At this point a worthy old farmer of the neighborhood, Mr. John Porter, succeeded in turning him towards the island, which, with great difficulty, he succeeded in reaching. So soon as he saw him safely landed Mr. Porter procured a halter, and at great personal hazard, about eight o'clock Wednesday night, waded through the slue, supporting himself by the brush and undergrowth, until he reached the island, a distance of some seventy or eighty yards, from whence he soon returned with the gallant "swimmer," safely and successfully. Chilled, wearied, and worn down with the long struggle from Monday afternoon at 2½ o'clock, till Wednesday night at 8 o'clock, he was hardly able to walk; but the kind care and attention of Mr. Porter, in the course of a few weeks, has perfectly restored him to his wonted energy and life. Fifty-three hours' constant struggling, night and day, against the swelling current of such a stream as Black Warrior, without food or rest, is an exhibition of strength and endurance which we have never before known, and which a Williamson horse, like "Swimmer," we presume, could alone perform. The fact that it was done is incontestable.

Capt. Stephenson, the owner of the horse, is well known amongst us as a gentleman of correctness and integrity, and whose statements are both truthful and reliable. Besides this, the fact is still further confirmed by Mr. Porter, Mr. Alexander, Mr. Goldsby, Esquire Hufistuttle, and a number of other gentlemen of that neighborhood, all of the highest respectability, and eye-witnesses to the scene. We challenge either history or personal experience elsewhere to beat it. Capt. Stephenson rode the horse on his return home, swimming several streams with him, and he is now looking sound and well, and in as thriving condition as ever, though the mark of the heavy drift-wood on his back, and the sores on his knees, from his repeated efforts to climb the river bank, still remain to prove his powers of endurance, and mark his feat as one unequaled by his kind. [Franklin Western Review.

How to light all the Gas Lamps in a Town at once.—The Paris correspondent of the London Times says: "A rapid and scientific mode of lighting and extinguishing public gas burners has been invented by a person named Nilatte. The opening of the burner of each lamp is covered with a piece of soft iron, mounted upon a hinge. In connection with this is a wire extending from a galvanic battery the entire length of the service of the gas lamps, and close to the orifice of each burner is a small slip of platina. The soft iron, becoming a magnet when acted upon by the electric fluid, opens or closes the orifice according to the motion imparted to it; the platina ignites when it is necessary to light the lamps, and thus every lamp in a large town may be lighted simultaneously, or extinguished in the same way by a different action on this magnatized iron."

ANNUAL COMMENCEMENT OF UNION ACADEMY.

This commencement, occupying two days, was concluded on Monday evening, June 24, in the old Shiloh meeting house, which we understand is hereafter to be appropriated to the uses of this young and flourishing Institution.

Not being present on Friday, we are not prepared to speak of the exercises; however, if our ideas may be formed of them, by the character of those which were conducted on Monday, it certainly is no unmeaning compliment, to congratulate the Faculty, and those having the control of the Academy, on their complete success, in attempting to establish, at once, an Institution of learning, bearing the impress of maturity, and possessing in a high degree the attributes essential to efficiency.

Judging from the impartial and thorough manner, in which the several classes were examined in Algebra, Astronomy, Geometry, Latin, Trigonometry, Parker's Aid, French, and Physiology, &c., by their respective Teachers, we are satisfied that we have in the Preceptors of Union Academy, a rare assemblage of aptitude to teach, which must rank this school amongst the very first Academies of the country.

With respect to the pupils who were examined, we may say, that with scarcely an exception, they handsomely quitted themselves—to the joy of Parents and Guardians and the great encouragement of their Teachers.

Evening exercises were of a highly interesting character, but in our opinion were too protracted.

To attempt anything like a description of the exercises would require more time and space then we have at present to give the matter. The whole, however, was highly creditable to those engaged in the performance. Master Sheppard's speech on Aristocracy was very deservedly applauded. Its effect upon a pair of the would-be upper ten thousand was charming, for while it stilled their silly prattle, it saved the eyes of many—the brilliant reflection of their oft exhibited Jewelry. The Colloque of the Prodigal Son was a most charming affair.

The attendence was a perfect jam, and reminded one of the sale of Bank Stock in olden times. If we are to infer the amount of interest felt in the community, in this school, by the attendance of the masses through the day and evening; then may we bespeak for it the most liberal support. Amongst those in attendence we observed clergymen of different denominations, who we judge felt a common interest in the occasion.

There too were members of the other learned professions to unite their mite of countenance and support in consolidating and building up this Institution of learning amongst us.
SPECTATOR.

A SULTAN'S JOKE.

An incident, which occured soon after the accession of the present Sultan, shows that in some respects at least, he is not indisposed to follow up the strong traditions of his race. At the beginning of his reign, the Ulema was resolved, if possible, to prevent the new Sultan from carrying on those reforms which had ever been so distasteful to the Turks, grating at once against their religious associations and their pride of race, and which recent events had certainly proved not to be productive of those good results anticipated by Sultan Mahmoud. To attain this object, the Muftis adopted the expedient of working on the religious fears of the youthful Prince. One day, as he was praying, according to his custom, at his father's tomb, he heard a voice from beneath reiterating in a stifled tone the words, "I burn." The next time he prayed there the same words assailed his ears. "I burn" was repeated again and again, and no word beside. He applied to the chief of the Inmas to know what this prodigy might mean, and was informed, in reply, that his father, though a great man, had also been, unfortunately, a great reformer, and that as such it was but too much to be feared that he had a terrible penance to undergo in the other world. The Sultan sent his brother-in-law to pray at the same place, and afterward several others of his household; and on each occasion the same portentous words were heard. One day he announced his intention of going in state to his father's tomb, and was attended thither by a splendid retinue, including the chief doctors of the Mahometan law. Again during his devotions were heard the words, "I burn," and all except the Sultan trembled. Rising from his prayer carpet, he called in his guards, and commanded them to dig up the pavement and remove the tomb. It was in vain that the Muftis interposed, reprobating so great a profanation, and uttering dreadful warning as to its consequences. The Sultan persisted. The foundations of the tomb were laid bare, and in a cavity skillfully left among them was found—not a burning Sultan, but a Dervise. The young Monarch regarded him for a time fixedly and in silence, and then said, without any further remark or the slightest expression of anger, "You burn? We must cool you in the Bosphorus." In a few minutes more the Dervise was in a bag, and the bag immediately after was in the Bosphorus.

The Will of Sir Robert Peel.—After entailing Drayton Park, and the other large estates in Staffordshire and Warwickshire, it proceeds to recite sums, to the amount of nearly a quarter of a million, previously advanced to or settled upon his several children, (not including £9,000 per annum settled on his eldest son,) and then bequeaths about £600,000 more, making the portions of his five younger sons £106,000 each, and those of his daughters £53,000 each. He leaves to a chapel erected by him at Fazeley, in Staffordshire, £1,000, (afterward revoked because he had endowed it with lands,) and £6,000 to a school established by him in the said village; to the Infirmary and Lunatic Asylum in Manchester, and the Lying-in Hospital in Salvord, £100 each. The will is dated July 27, 1820. By a codicil of Feb. 11, 1825, the portions of his younger sons are increased to £135,000; and of the residue, which is said to have exceeded half a million, four-ninths were bequeathed to the late Baronet, and one ninth to each of his five younger sons. The personal property was sworn at what is technically called "upper value," which means that it exceeded £900,000, and was the first instance of the scale of duties extending to such a sum.

CARVING ON WOOD BY STEAM.

We spent an hour the other day, says the Editor of the New York Tribune, to witness the operation of a new and very ingenious machine for carving on wood which has lately been invented by Mr. J. M. Singer. The machine is so simple at first sight as scarcely to seem entitled to the name of an invention. Yet, on examination, it will be found that Mr. Singer has applied a new and beautiful combination to an old form, overcoming what has hitherto proved an insurmountable difficulty to all who have attempted the construction of a machine for carving. The simple instrument called the Pentagraph has long been in use for copying maps and drawings on a plane surface. By adding a vertical to the horizontal movements—the two being so nicely combined as to work with entire evenness and steadiness—Mr. Singer can produce every possible motion requisite in carving. Another important change is this: the cutting point is stationary. The block to be carved is fixed in a sliding vice, which is attached to the pentagraph (so to call it) and obeys every motion, lateral, vertical, forward or backward. The steel point used in cutting the wood is fixed to the extremity of a vertical cylinder, which, set in motion, revolves with great velocity, cutting a smooth and beautiful channel in the block below it. The plan of working is as follows: A model somewhat larger than the desired carving, is placed on the table, under the further end of the frame. At the junction of the levers composing the pentagraph, is an iron point, which moved (by means of a handle to the machine) over the model, occasions a corresponding movement in the block of wood under the cutting point; so that, in the space of two or three minutes, a block letter or a gothic ornament may be cut as neatly as the most experienced workman would do it in as many hours. By substituting other cutting points, or varying the size of the copy, twenty or thirty different kinds of letters may be made from one model. We saw some beautiful specimens, cut with a double swell to the sides of the letters, picture frames, saw and plane handles, ornamental moldings, cornices, &c. More elaborate pieces of carving are executed by parallel lines, on the same priciple as medallion engravings. Specimens of coats-of-arms, which were shown us, retained the exact lines of the original, needing only some slight finishing by hand. The uses to which this invention may be put are manifold. In addition to the numerous forms of wood carving of which it is capable, it answers equally well for cutting brass or steel. One man, with one machine, can cut four hundred block letters in a day, which, sold at one-third the present prices, would yield a hsndsome profit. The manufacture of wood carvings for churches, public edifices or private dwellings, will also be reduced in cost so that we have no doubt their use will become very general. Mr. Singer has patented his machine in the United States, Great Britain, France and Belgium. He has just completed a machine which will be sent to England in a few days. He will shortly establish a manufactory of wood carvings in this city.

IMPROVEMENTS IN PAPER MAKING.

The London "Patent Journal" gives an account of an improved process for the manufacture of Paper and Card-board, and for producing water marks thereon; as also in the apparatus and machinery to be used for such purposes. The patentees are enabled, by their method of making and constructing the molds, to produce sheets or pieces of paper bearing designs or devices as water-marks, to any extent of repetition required; and all such designs or devices are identical. This is effected by producing any number of the molds required, all identical—which effect it is an impossibility to accomplish by the old method of forming the molds by hand, where the only guide or security to accuracy and identity is the deviating eye and hand of the workman employed. The importance in this respect of providing a security against fraud and forgery is so immense, and generally acknowledged to be so great a desideratum, that it may be necessary to state some of the purposes to which the improvements are applicable for effecting that security to a very considerable extent, as the most elaborate designs of water-mark can be produced with equal accuracy and facility as the more simple ones—fac similes of autographs and signatures of individuals, and fixing the seals or devices of public companies, and like designs, hitherto perfectly unattainable in paper manufacture by the old description of molds. Among the principal purposes to which they are applicable may be named Bank notes, Treasury notes, Exchequer bills, and other Government papers, Customs warrants, Postage stamps, Post-Office money orders, forms of wills, ecclesiastical papers, law records, Government securities, stock receipts bonds, dividends, warrants, checks, railway scrip, journals and books for important entries, transfer books, promisory notes, bills of exchange, certificates of marriages, births and deaths, registration papers, and other or any papers requiring security.

Wonders of the Deep.—The U. S. steamer Monmouth, Capt. Freeborn, from Indian River, Florida, reports that Messrs. Clark and Burnham who had been induced by an offer from Mr. Barnum, of the New York Museum, to take the adventure, succeeded in capturing two beautiful specimens of the Manitoe genus, near Jupiter Creek, in Florida. One of these animals was about 14 feet long, weighed 1,500 pounds, and was killed in capturing. The other is 9½ feet long, and was secured without much difficulty to a skiff and towed into Indian River, whence it was shipped, via Charleston, for New York.

The Manitoe is what is commonly called the Sea-cow, and known in the Pacific, especially at the Phillippine Islands, as the Waldasses; there are two species, the Arctic and the Antarctic, which differ only in the color of the skin and hair. We remember having seen one caught some 18 years ago on the Northern coast, and another some years after was brought into Kingston, Jamaica, taken near the Bahamas. The physical formation was very similar, but the color was different, that of the Northern being darker, and the hair coarser.

They resemble a Seal very much, and doubtless belong to the same genus, having flippers and flukes, but instead of the separations of the tail, it is whole and spread like a fan. Its head is shaped like that of a cow, but longer, and having teeth only in the lower jaw, which resembles a dog.

These animals were known to the Indians in Florida many years since, and Col. Harney, during his campaign among them, was several times feasted on their flesh which he pronounced very choice.

Engraving upon Ivory.—The Revue Scientifique of Paris gives the following exposition of the interesting process of Ivory engraving:—

The process used to cover ivory with ornaments and designs in black, consists in engraving in the ivory itself, and then filling in the designs with a black hard varnish. To obtain finer and more regular designs, the ivory is to be covered with the common ground, and by means of a point the designs are engraved upon it. They are then eaten in by a solution formed as follows:

Fine Silver,	6 grammes.
Nitric Acid,	30
Distilled Water,	125

At the end of about a half hour, according to the depth to be given, it is to be washed with distilled water, and dried with bibulous paper. The design is then exposed for an hour to the solar light, and the layer of wax is removed by essence of turpentine.

The design has then a black color, or a dark brown which blackens entirely at the end of one or two days. Other colors may be produced, by replacing the solution of nitrate of silver by a solution of gold or platina in aqua regia, or of copper in nitric acid.

How the Nepaulese Treat the Crime of Adultery.—One of their laws regarding adultery is not only a very summary one, but often very gratifying to the feelings of an injured husband. Should such a crime be perpetrated, as it often is during the absence of the husband, and be detected, he, on his return, is duly informed of the stain on his honor, and is an outcast until the stain be removed. He is neither permitted to eat with, smoke with, or even visit, his friends and relations until he has avenged the disgrace. He accordingly sets to work immediately; but as the seducer, on the return of the husband, contrives to make himself scarce, the injured man has to await patiently his return, or the opportunity of meeting him. In this way sometimes years are spent. At length, perhaps, the wished for moment arrives. The wronged husband waylays his dishonorer, steals up to him as he would to a deer, quietly draws his kookery, rushes behind him, and with one blow severs his head from his body. Justice is now done; his honor is avenged; and he is admitted to caste. One little trifle alone remains; he has to cut his wife's nose off, which is soon done, to prevent any one falling in love with her again.

Variety.

It is a custom among the Chinese to have a tear-bottle. When two ladies, or two females of the lower rank, quarrel, they go before a magistrate. A tear-bottle is given to the individual who says she is aggrieved, and if she can fill it with tears, the magistrate says, "I perceive you have been harshly treated. I shall award a great punishment to the one by whom you have been oppressed." If she can only half fill it, the punishment is reduced to one-half, but if she cannot shed one tear, there is no punishment at all.

A British sea-captain, on taking command of his vessel, asked his men if they would grant him a favor. On their assenting, he told them that, as the commander of the ship, he wished them to let him swear the first oath on board. The men were astonished at the request, but as the captain pressed it, while his manner was full of good-nature, every man shouted, "Aye, aye, sir," giving at the same time three hearty cheers. The crew kept their promise, and as the captain was no swearer, no oaths were sworn on the ship.

Three hundred and fifty thousand acres of timber-land, situated on the Kanahwa river, Va., have recently been purchased by a company of Eastern men, with the view of opening a heavy lumber trade with Ohio. Fifty cents an acre was paid. The navigation of the Kenahwa is to be improved, in order to afford a proper channel of communication with the West. Forty New Englanders have gone forward to form a settlement.

It was stated at the recent London anniversaries, that "there are not less then ten stamped newspapers of an infidel tendency, whose circulation throughout the country is not less then 11,700,000. Of unstamped newspapers there ar six, whose circulation is 6,240,000. Of miscellaneous publications, of light and evil tendency, not less than 10,400,000. Of the worst class of all, a circulation of 525,000; making a total of nearly 29,000,000."

The whole number of persons convicted of crimes in the state of New York, from 1840 to 1848, inclusive, was 27,949. Of these, 1,182 were returned as having received a "common education;" 414 as having a tolerably good education, " and 128 only as "well educated." Of the remaining 16,225, about half were able merely to read and write; the residue were destitute of any education whatever.

The produce of the French Press, in 1849, is thus stated:—There were printed in France, in 1849, 8,276 works of all sorts—less by 170 then the number published in 1848, the year of the Revolution. Of this number, 7,378 were books in all languages, living and dead; 672 stamps, engravings and lithographs, and 226 musical works.

M. Niepce de St. Victor lately presented to the French Academy images of the sun and moon, taken by his photographic processes on a layer of albumen. These impressions confirm the opinion already promulgated by M. M. Fizreau and Foucault, that the center of the sun emits rays of a higher photogenic power than those emitted from the edges of that luminary.

A late translation from the French states that M. Nytterhaven has been successful in preparing plasters from Gutta Percha for medical service. They are made by dessolving the substance in sulphuret of carbon; and are said by the French to have been very serviceable in affections of the voice, and of the liver, etc.

The British government is constructing a harbor on the western coast of Englanda, t Holyhead, at the expense of $35,000,000. It is to be in the form of a crescent, with a width between the horns of three-fourths of a mile while the sheet of water will contain 316 acres.

DeRuyter Institute.

The Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

DeRuyter, July 8th, 1850.

Sabbath Tracts.

The American Sabbath Tract Society publishes the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce st., N. Y., viz:

No. 1 Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.
No. 2 Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.
No. 3 Authority for the Change of the Day of the Sabbath. 28 pp.
No. 4 The Sabbath and Lord's Day A History of their Observance in the Christian Church. 52 pp.
No. 5 A Christian Caveat to the Old and New Sabbatarians. 4 pp.
No. 6 Twenty Reasons for keeping holy, in each week, the Seventh Day instead of the First Day. 4 pp.
No. 7 Thirty-six Plain Questions, presenting the main points in the Controversy; A Dialogue between a Minister of the Gospel and a Sabbatarian; Counterfeit Coin. 8 pp.
No. 8 The Sabbath Controversy The True Issue. 4 pp.
No. 9 The Fourth Commandment False Exposition. 4 pp.
No. 10 The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed. 16 pp.
No. 11 Religious Liberty Endangered by Legislative Enactments. 16 pp.
No. 12 Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.
No. 13 The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.

The Society has also published the following works, to which attention is invited:

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pages.

The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet. First printed in London, in 1653. 60 pp.

An Appeal for the Restoration of the Lord's Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 24 pp.

Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to George B. Utter, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Christian Psalmody—Pocket Edition.

In compliance with requests from various quarters, the publisher of the New Hymn Book—Christian Psalmody—has issued a second edition, on lighter paper and with smaller margins, by which the bulk and weight of the books are reduced about one-third, rendering them much more convenient for carrying in the pocket. The price is also reduced 12½ cents per copy. Those wishing books, of either edition, can now be supplied. Price of the larger edition from 75 cents to $1 50, according to the style of binding. Price of the smaller edition from 62½ cents to $1 00. Orders should be addressed to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

THE RECENT PERSECUTION IN HAYTI.

Some three months ago we copied from the Independent an article setting forth that in Hayti religious freedom is constitutionally guarantied and generally enjoyed. One month later, we had occasion to prepare from letters written by a missionary at Port-au-Prince, an account of indignities offered to Protestants there, which contrasted strangely with former statements. In the Independent of last week we find an article by the author of that first mentioned, which we copy, as giving a very good idea of the unsettled state of things in Hayti.

PORT-AU-PRINCE, June, 1850.

In a conversation with the Rev. Mr. Thomson, missionary from Syria, soon after his late return to the United States, he spoke of the unsettled state of his field of labor, and the changes and revolutious he had been called to pass through, and said he had often told the Board in his communications, that things would not hold still in Syria until he could describe them. I quote this remark as most emphatically true of this island. I sit down and write a sheet full for The Independent. When I dispatch it, it is truth—every word truth; but by the time it has gone over sea and reached your readers, one half of it is perhaps downright falsehood. Let me illustrate. In a former letter I spoke on the subject of religious toleration; after mentioning some cases where the Constitution, which I quoted, had been sustained by the authorities, I remarked that the Emperor held enlarged and liberal notions upon this subject, etc. I did not, however, give the facts upon which I had based this opinion, though they had interested me very much. I had learned from a reliable source, that the priest had called upon the Emperor, and after speaking of the great strides that the Protestants were making, told him that if he did not interfere to prevent it, the entire island would become Protestant. The Emperor, after having heard him through, said: "And what complaint have you to make against the Protestants? Are any of them in the prisons or work-houses? Were any of them shot in the late insurrection?" To all of which the priest was compelled to give a negative answer. "No," responded the Emperor, emphatically; "you are obliged to say no. You never hear of their plotting insurrections, or committing any crime. They are industrious and peaceable; the best subjects I have. I would to God the whole island were Protestant." This is but one of several facts upon which my statement was based.

But events of an entirely different character have transpired since that time; so different that, instead of what I had written, your readers ought to have read this: "The Emperor is one of the most narrow-minded bigots, and cherishes the greatest hatred to the Protestant region." Thus in this land truth turns to falsehood, like sweet milk to sour in a thunder-storm in August.

The facts I stated in a former letter in regard to the spirit of persecution that has of late been manifested by the authorities, will have prepared your readers somewhat for the above. I will now give you an account of the late events, which I have watched with the most painful interest. The present year opened most hopefully for the cause of Protestantism, and promised richer results than any that had preceded it. During the first quarter there were more than twenty accessions to the Wesleyan church, and several to the Baptist; among whom were several that the priest was pleased to style "the greatest ornaments of the Catholic church." These things thoroughly aroused the priest, and he determined to spare no efforts to arrest the progress of this work. The public sympathies were altogether with the Protestants, and the current was strongly against him, but he stemmed it with a zeal worthy a better cause.

He commenced a series of lectures, in which he assailed with all his virulence the Bible as a book for the people, and the Protestant religion. Most strangely, as well as providentially, an agent of the American Bible Society arrived with a large supply of Bibles in the midst of these lectures, which circumstance added not a little to his heat. Of course I can undertake nothing like a report of what occupied him for several evenings. His arguments and appeals were addressed to all classes; and he seems to have felt the case so important as to be worth gaining at the sacrifice of truth, honor, and common decency. He knew what would be most likely to move the Emperor and the authorities, and hence he told them that the Bible was the cause of all the revolutions and upturnings in Europe, and that the object of the Protestants in sending the Bible here was to deprive him of his throne. He said that missionaries and Bible agents were under this cover acting as secret agents of their government, and that their government paid them a premium on all the converts they gained. The effect of such statements upon these ignorant rulers may be easily conceived.

Again, to reach other minds, he spoke of the efforts to circulate the Bible in a strain of affected ridicule. Said it was a matter of speculation; the Americans would as soon speculate on the Bible and their religion as anything else. The agent of the Bible Society who had arrived was the same sort of an adventurer as those who came here with codfish and soap. He spoke of the character of the Bible; said that it was obscene and unfit for general use; that the patriarchs and others were guilty of the grossest abominations; told the parents to read the first chapter of Romans, and other passages that he mentioned, and see if such a book was fit to be read by their children. He made other remarks in regard to the Bible, entirely too low to be repeated. Nothing could be more grossly vulgar. He spoke at great length of the United States as an illustration of the evil effects of the general distribution of the Bible. There they burnt up Catholic churches and nunneries, butchered Indians, committed adultery, murder, theft, and every possible abomination, with the Bible a justification of all these enormities.

I present these statements merely as a specimen of the harangues this priest continued to make, until, in the midst of one of his raving, bellowing efforts, he ruptured a blood vessel, and was compelled to desist. Since that time, though he has resumed his duties, he has been quiet upon this subject. He promises, however, another course soon.

No one familiar with the character of this government, and the mass of the people, will be surprised at the effects of such an onset upon the Protestant cause. Notwithstanding the high character the missionaries and the Protestants had sustained up to this moment, and the respect that has been shown them since their second establishment upon the island, every effort was now made to stigmatize them as the enemies of the country, to harrass them, and stay their progress. The first movement against them on the part of the government was to cause them to be "impressed" for service in their navy. The army service here is worse than any slavery I have ever read of, but the navy is far more dreaded than the army. This results from the almost total ignorance of the people in regard to the management of vessels, and the consequent certainty that in any engagement with their enemies they would be the sufferers. To be sent on board of their vessels is regarded as a greater punishment than to be sent to their horrible prisons. I think the first Protestant sent on board was a young man who was standing on the outer gallery of the Catholic church listening to the harangue of Mr. Cessans, the priest, against the Bible and the Protestants. After the services he became engaged in a discussion on the subject with some one who knew he was a Protestant, in the midst of which he was arrested and taken to prison. The next morning the Emperor himself came down and saw him sent on board, telling him that "the man who would desert his religion would betray his country." Not long after this affair a number of soldiers surrounded the Wesleyan Chapel during a Sabbath morning service, at which I was present, and as the young men came out, took them and marched them to "La Place," from where they were sent on board without an opportunity of bidding good-bye to their friends. Others, who did not happen to be present that morning, were sought out, taken from their families, and sent on board in the same summary and heartless manner. Among these were several teachers who were engaged in the Wesleyan Free Mission Schools, including the head teacher and two assistants in the large school in the city, which numbers three hundred scholars, and another the head of a school in the interior, so that these schools were both broken up. The director of the school in the city has, through the influence of personal friends connected with the government, been since released, and the school has been again resumed.

Several others have been released through the influence of family friends, who had no sympathy with the Protestants, but yet did not wish their relatives to suffer. Indeed a persecution of a decidedly serious character here would be a very difficult matter, inasmuch as the Protestants are extensively intermarried and connected, and many Generals or distinguished persons would interfere for their friends. Protestantism has gained so firm a hold upon the country, that I have no fears of any efforts to drive it from the land.

In some other parts of the island the spirit of persecution seems rampant. At Jèrêmie, where the Wesleyans were engaged in building a chapel, they were forbidden to complete their edifice, and after this a man who was at work upon some part of it in his own yard, was seized and put in prison. Mr. Bird, the missionary here, wrote several letters to the government in reference to another chapel they were commencing in the country. As they did not reply to any of his communications, he placed copies of them in the hands of the British Consul, and through him demanded an answer. The reply sustained the proceedings of the authorities at Jèrêmie, and prohibited their proceeding with the other chapel! Such is the posture of things at present. Whereunto they will grow no one can tell. The sympathies of the intelligent portion of the population are with the Protestants, and they strongly reprobate this movement against them. But unfortunately these are not the persons now in power. The present rulers represent not the intelligent, but the ignorant portion of the island. With such tools there is no telling what the priest may do. Thus far, however, he has not been able to accomplish much. The Gospel is still preached, and the Bible distributed without interruption, though for prudential reasons it is not done as publicly as formerly.

Such have been the efforts of a priest, not directly from Rome, but one [illegible] for several years has breathed the free air of the United States. I have been confounded by those developments. I have loved to think better things of the priests of my country. I have found it impossible to sympathize with many anti-Catholic movements of the day. I thought we had fallen upon better times—that the spirit of Ximines had passed away from the earth. But from what I have seen here I am compelled to believe that there are priests in the United States, and not a few, who, if circumstances would allow it, would rejoice to reënact the scenes that must forever disgrace the name and reign of the Spanish Cardinal. True it is—and thank Heaven for it—"morning" has dawned upon the earth, but there is terrible darkness yet to be penetrated and dispelled!

Yours, H. W. P.

In the poem entitled "The Year of Sorrow—Ireland in 1849," are some strains of melancholy sweetness—for example:—

"Once more the cuckoo's call I hear,
I know, in many a glen profound,
The earliest violets of the year
Rise up like water from the ground.

The thorn, I know, once more is white;
And far down many a forest dale,
The anemones in dubious light
Are trembling like a bridal veil.

By streams released that singing flow
From craggy shelf through sylvan glades,
The pale narcissus well I know,
Smiles hour by hour on greener shades.

The honeyed cowslip tufts once more
The golden slopes;—with gradual ray
The primrose stars the rock, and o'er
The wood-path strews its milky way.

From ruined huts and holes come forth
Old men, and look upon the sky!
The Power Divine is on the earth;—
Give thanks to God before ye die!

And ye, O children, worn and weak,
Who care no more with flowers to play,
Lean on the grass your cold, thin cheek,
And those slight hands, and whispering say,

'Stern mother of a race unblest—
In promise kindly, cold in deed;
Take back, O Earth, into thy breast,
The children whom thou wilt not feed.'"

FINANCES OF THE ROMAN CHURCH.

Correspondence of the Commercial Advertiser.

PARIS, Wednesday, July 10, 1850.

A journal published in the island of Malta, and entitled Il Catholico Christiano, contains a curious statistical article on the revenues of the Romish clergy. The article purports to be from the pen of an Italian priest, who passed many years as curate in the Romish States. I present its statements in an abridged form.

According to the public register, the value of the real estate in the Papal dominions is 195 millions of dollars. The population being three millions, the proportion of each inhabitant would be 65 dollars. The clergy, comprising priests, monks, brothers, nuns, and sisters, numbers 60,000, or one in fifty of the population.

The real estate of the clergy is stated on the public register at $45,000,000, equal at five per cent. to an income of $2,250,000. The cattle owned by them are valued at $2,000,000, equivalent to an annual income of $100,000. The clergy own $25,000,000 of State stock, on which they receive interest. These are the amounts actually in the hands of the clergy. But they have other sources of revenue which we will now consider.

Every family wishing to make one of its sons a priest must procure him a capital of at least $500. There are in the Roman [illegible] belonging as they do to the regular orders, are not required to have a patrimony. Of the 20,000 secular priests, suppose half are beneficiaries, the capital furnished by the other half is $5,000,000, which is equal to a revenue of $250,000.

The dowry of every girl who becomes a nun must go to her convent. This sum amounts to much more than ten millions; but we take this figure as the least.

The forty thousand priests say mass every day, and only gratis on festival days. The regular price of a mass at Rome is 20 cents, but the priests rarely content themselves with this price; the festivals, furnerals, burials, elevations, and particular chapels raise the sum to at least 50 cents, but as a mass in the country costs only 15 cents, we will place the average at 20. This gives a revenue of $2,726,000 a year. But deducting six hundred thousand for masses said gratis on festivals and other days by curates, the sum is reduced to $2,100,000 a year.

When a child enters the church at 24 hours old he commences paying. The births are about 90,000 a year. At each baptism a taper weighing a pound is left, and a gift in money for the curate. The average of these gifts must be much larger, but we will place them at 50 cents, which gives an annual sum of $45,000.

The confirmation succeeds the baptism, and is said to perfect it. The dying child is confirmed at home; the others go to the church. On this occasion each child should give to the Bishop a taper worth 30 cents; and supposing that only 60,000 do so, the annual revenue from this source is $18,000.

The marriages number about 25,000 yearly. Every body knows the expense of the acts of the Chancellor, the publications of the bans or dispensations from them, the permission to marry, the certificate of confession, the present to the curate, &c. But to avoid the appearance of exaggeration, we place the revenue from this source at $25,000 only.

In the Roman States, if a person wishes to get any employment under Government—to marry, to enlist, to teach, to get a passport, and in short to do a thousand other things, he must have his certificate of baptism to put on file. As he must procure for each occasion another certificate, the same person may be obliged to procure fifty of them. The price of them is ten cents for the poor, 30 for the middling classes, 50 for the nobles, and 100 for the princes. Putting the revenue from this source at the lowest figure, we have $9,000.

The certificates of confirmation, of decease, of marriage, are also necessary, but not so often as those of baptism. The price for them is the same. The annual revenue from this source cannot be less than $9,750.

Burial expenses are exhorbitant and obligatory. The long files of priests and friars, all paid to accompany the body, the wax given to all the members of the clergy, and the tapers which are lighted in great numbers around the body, and remain for the profit of the priests, occasion an enormous expense. At Rome the most economical burial of a man of the middle class costs at least 50 dollars, and those of the rich and of the nobility cost several hundreds; but the poor give little and some times nothing. Count then for each funeral seven dollars and a half, and we have for the eighty thousand yearly a revenue of $600,000 for the clergy.

The numerous begging friars, who travel the country asking alms, must receive from the people $1,825,000.

Collections are constantly made in all the churches. The bag is handed round the church at each mass, at each elevation, some times for one madonna, some times for another; some times for one saint, some times for another; to-day for one festival, to-morrow for another—so that one must have his purse constantly in his hand. But counting only the parish churches and ten collections a year, and suppose the receipts to average two dollars, we have in the 10,000 parishes a revenue of 200,000 dollars a year.

Preaching is paid for by townships and individuals, and forms also a branch of clerical commerce. This is not the case in many parish churches, but it exists in most of those directed by the friars. Suppose that this exists in only five thousand churches, each costing only thirty dollars yearly, we have a clerical revenue from this source of $150,000.

With the exception of a few of the principal towns, all parts of the Roman States pay tithes. The income from this source must be far above $150,000, but we place it at this figure. Add to this a revenue from the seminaries and colleges of at least $15,000.

Dispensations in marriage, indulgences, privileges, particular chapels and altars, and those innumerable articles sold at the churches, at the Dataria, at the secretaryship, of briefs, of indulgences, relics, &c., form one of the best sources of the revenue of the clergy; count this at $50,000.

The Sunday before Easter the priests bless the houses of the laity, each one of whom makes them a present either in money or produce. Count this at a cent for each, and we have a revenue of $30,000.

Supposed miracles or pardons received from different Madonnas or Saints, are paid in offerings of wax, of money, or of hearts or images in silver or gold, or in jewels which become the property of the church. The revenues from this source may be placed at $75,000 yearly, although this must fall far below the sum actually received. The gifts at Rimini alone in the last two months almost equal this sum.

When any one is sick, it is the custom to get a priest to say a triduo to some Madonna or Saint for his cure. Some times prayers are said every ninth day. Ceremonies are performed for the dead on the seventh day, on the thirtieth, and on the anniversary. The smallest tax for the triduo is fixed at $3, for the ninth day ceremony at $10, and for the anniversary at $3. Supposing each [illegible] the annual receipts would be $500,000.

The churching of women is another source of riches for the clergy. Each one must receive the benediction and make a present. Put the total of these at the low sum of $9,000.

We do not count the receipts of the clergy arising from scapularies, girdles, rosaries, heart of Jesus, heart of the Virgin Mary, medals, &c., nor those from benedictions at the death-bed, from visits paid to the curiosities in the churches, the amounts paid by priests for advancement and for holy water; nor for the tax paid by the Jews for the privilege of living out side of the Ghetts, nor from the benedictions of new houses, of nuptial beds, of country seats, &c., nor from a hundred similar sources; nor have we spoken of the immense sums levied on the people for the construction and repair of churches, or of the revenues of the ecclesiastics, from their civil and religions functions, for instance of the provincial legates, the nuncios, the priests, magistrates, and the cardinals. We have placed the sum derived from the few sources mentioned at the very lowest figure. They may be recapitulated as follows:—

Revenues of the Clergy in the Roman States.

From	Annual income.	Capitalized at 5 per cent.
Real Estate,	$2,250,000	$45,000.000
Cattle,	100,000	2,000,000
Taxes,	300,000	6,000,000
State Stock,	1,250,000	25,000,000
Patrimonies,	250,000	5,000.000
Dowries,	500,000	10,000,000
Masses,	2,150,000	43,000,000
Baptisms,	45,006	900,000
Confirmations,	18,000	360,000
Marriages,	25,000	500,000
Certificates of Baptism,	9,000	180,000
Other Certificates,	9,750	195,000
Burials,	600.000	12,000,000
Begging Orders,	2,325,000	36,500,000
Collections,	200,000	4,000,000
Preaching,	150,000	3,000,000
Tithes,	150,000	3,000,000
Seminaries,	15,000	300,000
Profits on Sales,	50,000	1,000,000
Easter Blessing,	30.000	300.000
Miracles,	75,000	1,500,000
Triduos, &c.	500,000	10,000,000
Benedictions,	9,000	180,000
Total,	$10,510,750	$210,215,000

By this examination, it appears that the annual receipts of the Roman clergy exceed in value the sum total of the whole value of the landed estate in the Papal dominions.

READING IN CHINESE TEA-SHOPS.

The great cities of China, says Rev. Mr. Farebrother, missionary at Shanghai, are filled with readers; but, as in our own land, a vast number of the books that issue from the press are decidedly of an infidel and dangerous character. Passing through the streets at night, you see the male population spending their evenings in the tea-shops. The wealthier classes have large and beautiful places, where tea is served up splendidly. There are richly-ornamented tables, and four gentlemen sit at each. We frequently find at the end of the room a man who, with a clear and distinct voice, reads some Chinese novel. When he comes to the plot of the story, he folds up his book, puts it under his arm, and says, "If you do not pay me for my trouble, I shall go away." They then make a collection instantly. He says, "That does not pay me; you must make another collection;" and when he has got as much as he desires, he finishes his story. We were one night passing along Shanghai, and saw one of our native converts reading a book. We listened; we thought, surely he is not reading a novel. What was it? It was our Lord's sermon on the mount, which he was explaining to the people. We caught the idea, and sent this man to the tea-shop with tracts; and there, night after night, you will find him reading one of your interesting tracts; and when it is finished, he distributes a few copies to the more respectable class around him.

BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS IN CHINA.

In a speech before the London Baptist Missionary Society, by Rev. W. Farebrother, missionary from China, he said:—

"When at Shanghai I heard of the existence of a foundling hospital, and paid a visit to that establishment, where I found as many as forty children being educated and provided for. I have a report of the institution, and a most singular and interesting document it is. The writer of it gives the history of the charity, from which it appears to have been founded originally by a wealthy merchant, some 140 years ago, but the income from the endowment not being sufficient to meet the expenditure, there is annually an appeal made to the benevolent for its support. Then it gives the rules of the institution, the number of inmates, and concludes with the following passage: 'Let every one act from benevolent motives; let there be no compulsion.' At the end there is a list of subscribers, headed, 'Account of the good and faithful who joyfully contribute;' and then, unlike most of our societies, it appears that there is a balance in the hands of the treasurer. On one occasion I went with Dr. Lockhart into a singular building in Shanghai, which, on inquiring, we found to be the Imperial Humane Society, for the recovery of drowning persons, and upon a black board within the entrance were inscribed the names of all persons who had been rescued by its officers. Taken into one room, we found a number of couches, upon which the patients were placed, in order that means might be taken to restore animation. In another room were found some coffins, and we were told that when persons who were drowned were not claimed within twelve hours, they are buried at the expense of the institution. No sooner did the missionaries establish their medical hospital than the rumor of it reached a large city in the interior, containing a population of three millions, and they banded together and established a similar institution, the report of which has recently reached me, from which it appears [illegible] physicians to attend to the maladies of their numerous inmates. The Chinese, therefore, ought not to be spoken of as a nation of barbarians. They possess institutions which might justly be the boast of any people."

THE AMERICAN UNION.

The maintenance of the integrity of the Union is to the people of the United States very like what the maintenance of the British Constitution is to ourselves. A hundred times over, in the jargon of parties, or the heat of battle, the Union has been dissolved, and the sun of the Constitution has set forever. But though this catastrophe is denounced as the inevitable result of every grand contest, in the one country as in the other—in the federal and in the constitutional monarchy—such results would be equally unwelcome and alarming to every part of the States.

The Americans use great license in what we must call amicable hostility; they fight with each other in all the ardor of the domestic passions; but they have too lively a sense of the incalculable benefits they derive from their Union to sacrifice that great political power to any accidents of occasional warfare. Nothing is more remarkable, or more creditable to the American people, than the fact that, in spite of their reckless and bold character, their wide and numerous divisions, and their unlimited freedom, these States have remained in peace with each other since the declaration of Independence. That is more than can be said of any other confederation known to history.

The Greek States of antiquity waged continual warfare with each other; the Italian States of the middle ages were incapable of a league; even in our own day we have seen one-third of the Swiss Cantons subdued by an army of their confederates; and the Germanic confederation presents a melancholy picture of an edifice in ruins. The United States alone have retained the sacred deposit of their nationul peace inviolate, under the sanction of a common respect for a supreme authority. That is their chief strength and their chief glory.

From the aggression or hostility of European powers they have nothing to fear; but if ever the evil time should come when local interests or passions prevail over the public law, and a disruption of the Union should ensue, it is not too much to predict that the whole face of the North American continent would be changed, the habits and necessities of war would predominate over those of peace, the institutions which now suit the people would become impossible or insufficient, and the New World would in time exhibit but a melancholy parody of the follies and errors which have so long afflicted the old habitations of mankind.

We have somewhere read an anecdote, which is too good to be lost, of an Irish peasant, who was advised by the priest to give up the Bible and study the fathers. "Who are the fathers? I never heard of the fathers," said the peasant. "Why," said the priest, "the fathers are St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and other saints." "I never saw them," said the poor man; "but I have the grandfathers. I have Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and I think the grandfathers are far superior to the fathers."

TWENTY QUESTIONS FOR EVERY CHRISTIAN.

BY A MISSIONARY.

1. Are not six hundred millions of our fellow men ignorant of the gospel?
2. Are they not in danger of perishing eternally for want of it?
3. Are they not dependent on us, under God, to supply them with this gospel?
4. Has not the Lord Jesus Christ, who died to provide salvation for us and them, directed us to convey to them the tidings?
5. Should we not be as willing to devote our lives to carrying or sending the gospel to those who need it, as Christ was to devote his life to making the provision?
6. If we refrain from many expenditures which fashion and taste plead for, will it cost us more than it did him to leave heaven and subject himself to contempt and insult, and a public execution with criminals?
7. Does he not wish us to be as benevolent as he was himself?
8. Does he not then wish us to seek the salvation of the world more than conformity to fashion, or even to comfort and convenience?
9. Dou you not commend the conduct of such men as Solomon Goodell, Normand Smith, and David Mack, who have denied themselves greatly, and given largely for benevolent objects?
10. Does not your sober reason tell you that you should imitate the conduct which you commend?
11. If you do not, and feel reluctant to do it, is it the new man or the old that is unwilling?
12. Which shall have dominion over you?
13. Is not the maxim of Howard a sound one? "Our pleasures should be sacrificed to the conveniences of others, our conveniences to their necessities, and our necessities to their extremities."
14. Would it be more painful for you to deny yourselves many comforts and conveniences for the sake of giving the gospel to the heathen, than for them to "have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone?"
15. Is not the indulgence of a desire for property, and of pride respecting dress, furniture, &c., a chief hinderance to the piety and efficiency of Christians in doing good?
16. If you do not deny yourself much for the sake of giving the gospel to the perishing, can you properly invite others to be followers of you, even as you are of Christ, in respect to your efforts to save men?
17. Do you not wish to be an exemplary Christian, so that you can invite others to fol-
18. Are you willing that any of the heathen should die without the gospel because you do not do all you properly can to give it to them?
19. Would it be wrong for you to act according to the answers you have returned to these questions?
20. Will you not act according to them?

COWPER'S CONVERSION.

At the age of thirty-two, Cowper's ideas of religion were changed from the gloom of terror and despair to the brightness of inward joy and peace. This juster and happier view of evangelical truth is said to have arisen in his mind while he was reading the third chapter of St. Paul's epistle to the Romans. The words that riveted his attention were the following: "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God." Romans 3: 25. It was to this passage which contains so lucid an exposition of the gospel method of salvation, that, under the divine blessing, the poet owed the recovery of a previously disordered intellect, and the removal of a load from a deeply oppressed conscience; he saw by a new and powerful perception how sin could be pardoned and the sinner saved—that the way appointed of God was through the great propitiation and sacrifice upon the cross—that faith lays hold of the promise, and thus becomes the instrument of conveying pardon and peace to the soul.

WANTED ABOVE.—A distinguished physician of Chester county gave the following beautiful story in a letter to a friend:—"At the commencement of my practice I was called to see an Irishman's child, who was laboring under a severe attack of pneumonia. The poor little fellow grew worse and worse for several days, until on one of my visits I found him very low, his breathing extremely difficult, and the extremities almost cold. The family saw and felt deeply the danger. When I left the house the father followed me out of the door, and as I mounted my horse he said: "Dochtor, dear, do you think little Jemmy will come out of it?" I replied, "The case is very doubtful, but there is some hope." "Shure, dochtor, an' I have no hope at all; none in the world, so I hav n't. His mother an' me have often been speaking about him, so we have, and we never expected to rare him. Such childer can't be rared, they never stay long." "Why?" said I. "Ah, dochtor, you wud n't believe what taken airs he has wid him. He's wanted above among the blessed."

MAHOMED'S PREACHINGS.—His definition of charity embraced the wide circle of kindness. "Every good act," he would say, "is charity." Your smiling in your brother's face is charity; an exhortation to your fellow man to virtuous deeds, is equal to almsgiving; your putting a wanderer in the right road is charity; your assisting the blind, your removing stones and thorns and other obstructions from the road is charity; your giving water to the thirsty is charity. A man's true wealth hereafter is the good he does in this world to his fellow man. When he dies poor people will say, "What property has he left behind him?" But the angels who will examine him at the grave will ask, "What good deeds hast thou sent before thee?" [Wash. Irving' Life of Mahomed.

TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE.

We are willing to bear renewed testimony to the general excellence of the commonly-received translation of the Bible. We suppose it to be, on the whole, the best extant, and (as we expressed ourselves on a former occasion) "better than any one denomination would be likely to produce." By this we do not mean to assert its faultlessness, nor that it is incapable of being improved. We are satisfied that it contains defects, from some of which, if not from all of them, it might be purified, without such mighty opposition as is sometimes imagined. A jury of learned men, from all denominations, would, in our opinion, bring in a unanimous verdict in condemnation of some important errors which now mar its beauty; and the result would be an improved, if not a faultless, translation. Let the experiment be tried. Let us see whether, after being impanneled, and sworn to bring forth, on the best evidence given them, an exact transcript of "the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth," they would dare to conceal their meaning, or pervert them to sectarian purposes. Indeed, they could not, if they would; their denominational jealousies of one another would prevent it. And, acting under such solemn responsibilities, they would not, if they could. They would feel that the Ark of God was in their presence; and though the Dagon of sectarianism might not be completely annihilated, (its stump still remaining in each one's breast,) its head and hands would be cut off, and it would lie prostrate till the great work was done. It is an instructive fact, that even individuals, who have got up translations upon their own responsibility, have felt a cautious dread of being warped by their denominational prejudices. How much more might we expect this to be the case with a college of translators chosen from different sects.

We are troubled with none of the fears which seem to distress some good people when a new translation is proposed. They cry out, as if the Word of God itself was to be altered, and as if the very foundations of Christianity were about to be undermined. This is nothing new. The same panic was raised, when Jerome undertook a new translation of the Bible into Latin. Among others, the noted Augustine protested against it as prejudicial to the authority of Scripture. The translator, however, persevered, notwithstanding the storm of opposition that beat against him. The version was made and published; and, as Doctor Campbell says, "those hideous bugbears of fatal consequences, which had been so much descanted on, were no more heard of." The result, at last, was that the old Italic version went out of use, and Jerome's new version was generally adopted. Even Augustine himself ceased his opposition, and often recurred to it for aid in explaining the Scriptures.

The idea that the present translation ought not to be meddled with, because it has been the means of accomplishing so much good, is not a very rational one. We wonder that intelligent men will advance it. Have not uneducated ministers, also, been the instruments of great good? Have not their labors proved a blessing to multitudes of souls? There can be no doubt of it. And the time was, when people made this an argument for keeping them uneducated. But that time has gone by. Now it strikes us, that it is an argument of the same kind, which is alledged against a new translation. The old one has been the means of "making wise unto salvation, through faith in Christ Jesus, a multitude which no man can number, who are now rejoicing in heaven, and is the guide of innumerable pilgrims who are now journeying thither." We suppose that no one doubts this; and no one doubts that it will have the same effect upon many more. But did its errors contribute any thing to such a result? No, verily. These have been the source of nothing but evil, and will continue to be so, as long as they remain. God honors no other instrumentality but truth in the conversion of souls. The common translation has, indeed, done much good; but it has done it in spite of its errors.

We desire to see the common translation supplanted by a new and better one. We did not desire to see it undertaken by the American and Foreign Bible Society, nor by any other denominational organization. The Baptist denomination, notwithstanding their numerical and intellectual strength, could not persuade all Protestant Christendom to receive their translation as the reliable one. Their success in that line would be commensurate with their success in converting others to their views. It could not reasonably be expected to be greater. Our wish is for a translation which shall be generally received, and we trust that the day which shall bring it about is beginning to dawn.

We have been led to these remarks by the perusal of the Constitution of the American Bible Union, which, together with some accompanying documents, has recently been placed in our hands. We discover nothing sectarian in this new organization. It seems to afford a platform sufficiently broad for all, of whatever denomination, who desire a pure translation of the Book of God. We have not examined the documents very thoroughly; we intend to do so, when we have a little more leisure. Our present impression is, that the Bible Union is the very institution that was needed. We wish it success in its efforts "to procure and circulate the most faithful versions of the Sacred Scriptures in all languages throughout the world." The following are among the resolutions adopted at the preliminary meeting, which, if adhered to, will make the Union just what, in our opinion, it ought to be:—

"Resolved, That it is our duty to form a voluntary association for the purpose of procuring and circulating the most faithful versions of the Sacred Scriptures in all languages.

"Resolved, That in such an association we will welcome all persons to coöperate with us, who embrace the principle upon which we purpose to organize, without regard to their denominational positions in other respects."

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 9.

Matters in the Church of England—The Sunday Postal Delivery, &c.

Glasgow, July 26th, 1850.

The bullying Bishop of Exeter has been completely beaten. He has at last sent into the Court of Arches the Presentation, and Mr. Gorham will, it is intended, be immediately inducted to the living, there to teach that baptismal regeneration is an ecclesiastical figment. Even at last the Bishop has yielded with but a bad grace. To the annoyance of the Judge, he had sent it in with a protest—no previous intimation of his design having been given. Dr. Fust refused to have any thing to do with this unwonted appendage; and as the Bishop had held out to the very last hour, Dr. Addams, who appeared for him, had to consent to the protest being disannexed, to save his client from the consequences involved in "a contempt of Court." Before it was dissevered, Addams pled hard to have the union of protest and presentation retained, blandly intimating that it was only explanatory. It would not, however, do; and, considering that this is the only one of the courts in which the Bishop had previously obtained a favorable decision, and that the only Judge in it is a layman sitting as the nominee of the Primate and [illegible] Dr. Fust showed more decision, and even appearance of temper, than was to have been expected.

The Bishop's Protest has been published in the daily journals, and is something more than "explanatory." A few such explanations might "unfrock" him, to use the language of a former female head of his church. It boldly declares, that any Archbishop, or Bishop, or any official of either, who shall institute Mr. Gorham, "will incur the sin of supporting and favoring the said heretical doctrines," and renounces and repudiates all communion with any one who shall do so. Now this seems altogether unreasonable. It would have been less inconsistent, if it had been sent instead of the presentation, but as an accompaniment to it, is wholly inexcusable. Why, any Archbishop, or Bishop who shall, either personally or by proxy, institute Mr. Gorham, will only be perfecting in his own department, what Exeter has, however reluctantly, prepared for him. Is it then reasonable, in one who has all his life manifested a readiness to fight, but who has on this occasion himself yielded rather than suffer, to turn round upon a more peaceable man, and say that unless he shall take the hazards the other has avoided, all communion with him shall be renounced and repudiated? It is indeed understood, that the Archbishop of Canterbury is prepared to dispense with Exeter's favor, if this must follow, by expediting the induction; while the Bishop, it is said, will again be called to the hateful task of presenting another heretic in his diocese—since he prefers doing so, even under protest, to resignation. The Crown, it is announced, has appointed to the valuable living of Stoke Climsland, another firm opponent of the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration.

In these circumstances, we need not wonder, in the present state of the Episcopal Church, that there should be many ready to sympathize with the Bishop of Exeter, and who see their cause to be in jeopardy. A public meeting was accordingly intended to have been held in London some time ago, but was postponed, it is understood, till the courts should have given a decision. This meeting took place on the 23d instant. More cards having been issued than the Hall could contain, a separate place was used for what may be called a supplemental meeting, at which the same resolutions were adopted, after speeches of similar tenor. Although the principal meeting was presided over by a London merchant, of no extensive fame in connection with ecclesiastical matters, it had one of the Bishops present, and the great majority of those attending were clergymen—circulars having been extensively addressed to country clergymen, calling for their presence, and offering or promising payment of their traveling expenses. The second section had a member of Parliament for chairman, and the notorious Dr. Pussey as one of the speakers. He quoted from statutes of the reign Elizabeth, which he asserted gave power to the church (meaning, of course, the heads of our unscriptural hierarchy,) to determine what is and what is not a heresy. The Romanizing dignitary may sigh for a return of the time when the Church had and exercised the power of imprisoning, burning at the stake, and hanging on the gibbet, those who spoke openly of her corruption; but those who love the law of the Lord, and prefer a "thus saith the Lord" to any canon of the Apostacy, will deprecate such ascendancy. These Tractarian meetings, like their favorite Bishop, "protest" against the decision which offends them; and they also petition the Queen, praying that questions of appeal touching the doctrine of the church of England may be referred to the "spirituality of the Church of England," and that ancient synodical functions may be revived. This seems to mean that the power which the English section of the church of Rome was permitted to exercise, but which was absorbed by the King when the Pope was rejected, may now be returned to the Episcopal church, independently of her acknowledged earthly head. Their protests and petitions united are not likely to procure them this in the present day. They ask for the coöperation of their friends and adherents, both in England and Scotland, to enable them to obtain this as the State Church, but give no intimation of a design to leave, even if they fail so to secure it.

One result of this case, and of its numerous appeals, is to give to the members of the Church, whether Evangelical, as the one party have styled themselves, or Tractarian, as the other party have been called by their opponents, a true knowledge of their position as a church in regard to the State. Their hands are absolutely tied against the power of reforming. Not only must each individual's faith be squared with this creed of the church, if he mean to be at all honest with himself; but the meaning of that creed, and the latitude allowed in regard to its doctrines, are to be determined absolutely by men who may neither know or profess to know any thing about religion. The Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council—chosen, we may believe, for other qualifications than their religious attainments—it is now ruled, form the Court of final appeal in cases involving the most vital truths. This is the unanimous opinion of all the Judges of the several courts whose decision Exeter has elicited. And as that Committee might sanction any doctrinal error, so also may they, as in this instance they have done, pronounce views of the most opposite character, and doctrines mutually destructive to be equally accredited in the church whose faith they regulate. We regard the Liturgy as, in great measure, if not entirely, bearing out the views for which these Tractarians thus contend; but whether this or the opposite be the truth, we may ask of what value such creeds prove in preserving the faith of the people adhering to them? And, accustomed as we have been to hear eulogies of the apostolical succession, we may wonder at the fulminations of the contending parties in this case, each regarding the other as heretics, with whom it is a duty to have no fellowship; yet bound they are to each other through their mutual connection with the State; and so bound they seem intending to remain. Even the sympathizers with the Bishop of Exeter give no indication of present disruption. One at least of the speakers at the meeting, apprehensive apparently of imprudence, urged the avoidance of what might tend to separation. The two parties, at deadly enmity to each other's views of divine truth, shall thus remain in fellowship, and both in connection with the State, which is distrustful of them both.

There is no deliverance yet by the Government upon the Sunday Postal Question, nor is this to be expected, in the circumstances, during the sitting of Parliament, which, however, is evidently progressing fast to a close. The Glasgow Free Church newspaper of this day intimates, however, that the churches here are sending Memorials to Lord John Russell, urging upon him a continuation of the present regulations; and the columns of the paper contain a letter by an Irish clergyman pressing all the churches there to do the same. On the other hand, the Times, two days ago, contains an advertisement giving the names of thirty-five gentlemen, (including nine Members of Parliament,) who "have consented to act upon the Committee for relieving the public from the late mischievous arrangements." A central public meeting, it is intimated, will be held next week, and provincial ones afterward, if necessary.

The Sunday Trading Bill has passed the second reading, some of the members who voted for this avowing their intention of proposing modification of details when it came into Committee.

A Lochlomond steamer having struck upon a sunken rock in that romantic fresh water lake, had well nigh occasioned again great loss of life. Another steamer being at hand, all were saved ere the vessel sunk. But eighteen lives have been lost by an explosion of "fire damp," in a coal pit near Airdrie, about ten miles east from Glasgow, occasioned, it is believed, by a want of the usual care.

Very contradictory accounts have recently been published respecting the state of the potato crop. Now it seems quite evident that the blight has commenced extensively in Ireland, and partially in both Scotland and England—another sore affliction.

EDUCATIONAL CONVENTION.

The New York State Teachers' Association held a two-days' Convention in this city last week, which was attended by about one hundred delegates from various parts of the State, and by numerous distinguished educators from other States. A prominent object of this Association is to perfect the organization of Teachers' Associations in every county in the State. Each County Association, on presenting a certificate of its organization, will become an auxiliary of the State Society; and it is made the duty of every such County Association to present to the State Association, at each annual meeting, a brief Report, stating the average wages of teachers, and such other items of information upon the subject of education as will enable the Association to judge of the practical working of our school system.

Besides a large amount of extemporaneous discussion, the Convention was entertained and instructed by several written addresses from persons previously appointed to deliver them. Mr. T. W. Valentine, of Albany, read an address or lecture on "The Peculiar Duties and Responsibilities of Teachers at the Present Time." Prof. Taylor Lewis, of Union College, lectured an hour on "The Synthetical and Analytical Modes of Teaching." And Address on "The Training of the Moral Faculties," was delivered by Prof. J. B. Thompson, of New York city. Mr. D. P. Lee, of Buffalo, gave a lecture on "The Profession of Teaching," which is highly spoken of. Hon. Ira Mayhew, late Superintendant of Public Instruction in Michigan, made some interesting statements in regard to the educational interests of that State. M. Henri Herzel, of Switzerland, who is visiting the United States for the purpose of witnessing the operation of our educational system, was also among the speakers. Several of the lectures, as well as full minutes of the proceedings, are to be printed for general distribution.

The following preamble and resolutions in regard to the Free School Law, were adopted by the Convention, after a good deal of discussion:—

Whereas, The blessings of education should be universally extended, especially in this highly-favored Republic, whose stability or downfall depends upon the proper use or abuse of the elective franchise; and whereas, an enlightened free system of instruction seems absolutely necessary in order to thoroughly accomplish so desirable a result, therefore,

Resolved, That this body recommend their fellow teachers in the State, and their fellow citizens generally, to give their ayprobation and support to the Free School Law again to be submitted for their decision.

Resolved, That an important principle is embodied in said law, viz., education for all; and hence, whatsoever defects may be found to be connected therewith should not be permitted to sacrifice a high educational principle, but should undoubtedly be remedied by legislation.

SCENERY ALONG THE LINE OF THE NEW YORK AND ERIE RAILROAD.

After being jolted and jostled over hill and dale in a stage-coach, I stepped on board the cars from the ashes of Corning in ruins. Soon the "Old Iron Horse"—thanks to the learned blacksmith, or some one else, for the name—gave a clear, shrill whistle, which is to say, "Clear the track for old Ironsides;" and, suiting the action to the word, we found ourselves moving rapidly forward. On the starting of a train, everything is instantaneously changed from dull monotony to rapid motion. Trees, houses, villages, vales, and mountains, go darting by with the celerity of thought. Every object forms a center around which all other objects seem to move in concentric circles. Partaking of the scene and movements around, one feels new life and animation. He breathes with a short, hurried breath; his pulse has a quicker beat. It would naturally be expected, that both men and beasts living along the line of railroads would be more active and energetic than those not privileged with the influence exerted by the quick prancings and fiery snortings of the iron horse.

A ride down the Chemung Valley, on a bright summer morning, is delightful. The broad plain, dotted with smiling farms, luxuriant with grain and grass waving in the breeze; the river meandering quietly along through field and grove; the snug little farmhouse, the stately mansion, the thriving villages—the whole skirted by majestic hills, swelling up on either side—present a picture at once rich and pleasing. As we dashed along, occasionally plowing our way through moraines, and slight inequalities of ground—for old ironsides abhors going up hill and down, as much as nature used to abhor a vacuum—the ever-changing scenery presented a most perfect panaroma. This is a rich farming valley. The shrubbery delighted me, being mostly of nature's own setting.

Such is the scenery until reaching Binghamton. Soon after passing this place, the vallies begin to contract, and we found ourselves fast ascending into more exalted regions. The gently sloping landscapes give way to dark ravines, dashing torrents, cooling breezes, and beetling mountains—scenery most fit for poets, orators, and painters, provided it is not so high up, nor so secluded, but what civilization can take root sufficient for the growth of such natural productions. One moment we were threading our way along a narrow defile—the next winding along the side of some craggy precipice; a yawning gulph far below on one side—trees towering far above on the other; anon we hung suspended over a deep, dark chasm, the diminutive tree-tops appearing far below. The iron horse seemed to give a louder whistle than ever, and to step with a prouder tread, and man himself, at such times, is almost led to exclaim, "How mighty are the works of man!" But before it fairly escapes his lips, he finds himself closely hemmed in by towering rocks, that look down upon him in silent grandeur, and he involuntarily exclaims, "What is man!"

The summit attained, we began to descend into the valley of the Delaware. With our descent the rain began to pour in torrents. The clouds capped the highest mountain peaks. On one side flowed the quiet river; on the other, rocks walled up far above us, whose time-worn, moss-covered brows mark the silent, solemn march of years. Cascades came leaping and bounding down the rocky steeps in the wild glory of sportive youth, dashing themselves into foam and spray long before they reach the bottom. It is at such times as these that one feels upon his soul the impress of the beautiful, the grand, the sublime. His spirit bows in humble reverence before the throne of Omnipotence. Communion with such scenes tends to assimilate the feelings and affections to the great prototype of all beauty. The man who has no love for the beauties of nature's scenery, has a spirit whose motions are dull and sluggish. His mind is imperfectly developed or miserably distorted. He is deprived of one of the grand charms of life. Nature never intended that man should pass among her woods, her vallies, and her streams, unmoved. She captivates with beauty, appalls with darkness, cheers with sunshine, moves with harmony, softens, subdues, wins him with emotions of wonder, reverence, and love. He feels that "to every atom of matter is added an atom of joy." The soul enchanted with such beauties involuntarily wishes that they might always continue, and feels an instinctive clinging to life; but, unbidden, there comes the chilling thought that, however long these beauties may remain, the eye that beholds them must soon pass away. He feels that—

"Yon sun, that now my bosom warms,
Shall shine—but shine on other forms;
Yon groves, whose choir so sweetly cheers
Me now, shall sound on other ears;
The joyous lamb, as now, shall play.
But other eyes its sports survey;
The stream I loved shall roll as fair,
The flowery sweets, the trim parterre,
Shall scent, as now, the ambient air;
But where the hand that trimmed it?—where?

The truths of religion—the Christian's hope, alone is able to remove the cold chill from the spirit—to point the struggling soul away to the joys, the splendor of heaven, of which those of earth, that now surround him, are only a faint foreshadowing. Animated by the hope that religion inspires, he becomes "an expectant of immortality." Joy thrills his soul at the prospect of passing from earthly to heavenly beauties.

After leaving the Delaware, we passed into a more level section of country. This was soon crossed, and we plunged into the deep, narrow gorges of the Highlands. Here nature is presented in a tumultuous aspect. Rivers, rocks, hills, and dales, are thrown together in indiscriminate confusion, presenting a scene wild and spirit-stirring. Passing rapidly through these, the old iron horse stood by the noble Hudson. He breathed easier. His day's work was done.

Another Martyr to his Faith.—An act of religious persecution in Sweden has just come to light, says the Watchman and Reflector. The established religion there is Lutheranism. By law, a person who abandons this for any other communion, is punished with confiscation and exile. A Baptist missionary, by the name of Frederick Olans Nillson, has been subjected to the above punishment for having freely avowed his convictions that infant baptism is merely a human institution, not commanded by Scripture, that baptism should only be administered to men arrived at a full knowledge of Christian doctrine; and then only by immersion of the whole body in water, and that the communion can only be received worthily by such. He was also accused in the Royal Consistory Court of having caused himself to be rebaptized at Hamburg, of having founded a society there, of having been received in Sweden as an elder and teacher of the Baptists, of having caused forty-seven or forty-eight persons to receive his doctrines, and form a separate congregation, and of having administered to them baptism and the holy communion. He was accused of having persisted in the dissemination of these doctrines after having been admonished by the Chapter of Gotheborg. For these manifold heresies against the Established Church of Sweden, and misdemeanors against the Code of Offenses, he was condemned to be banished from the kingdom.

Brown University.—At the adjourned meeting of the Corporation of Brown University, held August 1, 1850, the Finance Committee reported that $108,000 had been subscrib[illegible] toward the fund for enlarging the course of studies in Brown University. It is one of the conditions of the subscription, that nothing can be collected unless the whole amount ($125,000) be subscribed on the fifth day of September next. On the other hand, it was evident that unless the contemplated changes were commenced with the next collegiate year, the whole plan must be abandoned. The Corporation, therefore, resolved to proceed, relying solely on the liberality of their fellow citizens. The following officers were accordingly elected:

- Rev. Asahel Kendeick, D. D., of Madison University, Professor of Greek.
- William A. Norton, of Delaware College, Professor of Natural Philosophy and Civil Engineering.
- John A. Porter, of the Lawrence Scientific School, Professor of Chemistry applied to the Arts.

Baptism of a Jew.—On Sunday, July 21st, says the N. Y. Recorder, the Broadway Baptist church was densely crowded to witness the baptism of John Griffith, a converted Jew, by the pastor of the church, the Rev. Dr. Dowling. Previous to going down into the water, this interesting Christian Israelite gave a succinct account of his early history, and conversion to the faith of Jesus, the Messiah. His views of salvation by grace, and of justification by faith in the atonement and righteousness of our Lord Jesus Christ, were peculiarly evangelical and clear. The piety, humility and pathos that pervaded his address, gained him an entrance to the hearts of his hearers, and brought tears to many of their eyes. Mr. Griffith, who has enjoyed the advantages of the German Universities, and is a gentleman of finished education and fluent address, is now engaged as a missionary and agent in the service of the American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews.

Indian Missionaries.—The Monthly Meeting of the Children's Missionary Society, connected with Rev. Mr. Burchard's church, in 13th street, N. Y., on Sunday, is said to have been very interesting. The children were addressed by Miss Mary Powell, a Cherokee lady, who has acted as a voluntary missionary to various tribes in this country and Canada, for the past fourteen years. Her address was characterized by all the fanciful imagery peculiar to Indian eloquence. She was accompanied by Miss Now-ne-ke-she-joke, or the 'sun in the center of the sky,' niece to the renowned Chippewa Chief, Black Hawk. This lady had been converted to christianity but about eighteen months when she first began to learn the English language. She made a brief address in very good English, closing with two Indian airs in her native tongue. The collection for the day, $10,50, was given to them in aid of their efforts. They are about to visit the Chippewas on a missionary tour.

Female Medical College.—The first session of the "Female Medical College of Pennsylvania" commences in Philadelphia on the 14th of October next. The following named gentlemen compose the Faculty of the Institution:—

James F. X. McCloskey, M. D., Prof. of Institutes and Practice of Medicine.

C. W. Gleason, M. D., Prof. of Physiology and Surgery.

Josh. S. Longshore, M. D., Prof. of Obstetics and Diseases of Women and Children.

A. D. Chaloner, M. D., Prof. of Chemistry.

N. R. Moseley, M. D., Prof. of Anatomy, General, Special, and Surgical.

M. W. Dickeson, M. D., Prof. of Materia Medica and Therapeutics.

It is stated that gentlemen will not always fill these important stations in the College; but ladies, when fitted by medical education and talent, will occupy the chairs.

Public Schools in New Hampshire.—It appears from the Annual Report of Commissioners of Common Schools in New Hampshire, that the number of school districts reported is 2,167—the number of scholars above four years of age who attended school "two weeks or more," in the course of the last year, was 78,863. The amount of money received by the school districts for the support of schools was $174,517. This is equal to a cost of $2 21 for each pupil. In Portsmouth the amount of money is in proportion of $3 52 for each scholar. In Manchester $3 46; Nashua $2 1 5; Somerworth $3 02.

Riot in New York.—The tailors of New York have for some time past been on a strike for higher wages. One day last week a large number of them assembled around a house in 38th Street, and attempted to take away a quantity of unmade clothing which they alledged was to have been given out by sub-contractors at less than the rates. So much disturbance was created, that a strong body of police was sent among them, when a regular fight occurred, in which several persons were wounded, two of whom have since died. Thirty-eight of the rioters were arrested, most of whom have been committed for trial, in default of bail.

Denominational History.—In answer to numerous inquiries upon the subject, we take this method of repeating, that the Publishing Society contemplates issuing, as soon as practicable, a History of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Arrangements have already been made by the Board for the preparation of the work; but as much research will be required to render it complete in all points, it is not possible now to say at what time it may be expected to appear.

Neander Dead.—Johann August Wilhelm Neander, the well-known theological lecturer and ecclesiastical historian, died at Berlin, Germany, about the 15th of July, in the 63d year of his age. He was a Jew by birth, but was converted to Christianity when seventeen years of age, since which he has been a very decided and able advocate of evangelical doctrines.

The New Cabinet.—Several changes have been made in the Cabinet at first announced as having been appointed by President Fillmore. It is now full, and stands as follows:—

Secretary of State—DANIEL WEBSTER, of Mass.
Secretary of the Treasury—THOS CORWIN, of Ohio.
Secretary of the Navy—WM. A GRAHAM, of N. C.
Secretary of War—CHAS. M. CONRAD, of La.
Sec'y of Interior—THOS. M. T. McKENNON, of Pa.
Postmaster General—NATHAN K. HALL, of N. Y.
Attorney General—JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, of Ky.

Missionaries Sailed.—The ship Argo, from Boston for Calcutta, took the following missionaries:—Rev. H. G. Shaw and lady, Rev. L. G. Hay and lady, Rev. R. S. Fullerton and lady, Rev. D. E. Campbell and lady, Rev. I. H. Orbison, and a native Hindoo.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, Aug. 5.

After the consideration of other morning business, the Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Cass's resolution in relation to the exercise of civil authority by military officers except under act of Congress. Mr. Davis, of Miss., made a speech in opposition to the resolution, and then its further consideration was postponed.

Mr. Pearce, of Md., introduced a bill for the settlement of the boundary of Texas, proposing to pay Texas $10,000,000 for that portion of New Mexico claimed by her, and lying north of 30° 30′; the money to be appropriated by Texas to the payment of debts incurred by her in the prosecution of her war of Independence.

The California Bill was then taken up, and pending a motion for the engrossment of the bill, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House, after some unimportant transactions, went into Committee of the Whole, laid aside the California Bill, took up the Post Office Appropriation Bill, and talked out the day, but did nothing.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, Aug. 6.

Mr. Clemens's resolutions of inquiry into the propriety of conferring on Gen. Scott the brevet rank of Lieutenant General, was considered and adopted.

The bill relating to the settlement of the Texas boundary was taken up, and made the special order for to-morrow at 11½ o'clock.

The bill for the admission of California was taken up. Pending its consideration, a Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating the letter of Gov. Bell in relation to the Texas dispute, and a copy of President Fillmore's reply thereto.

Gov. Bell's letter states that in February last he dispatched a special Commissioner, with full power and instructions to extend the civil jurisdiction of Texas over the unorganized counties of El Passo, Worth, Presido, and Santa Fé, situated upon its northwestern limits—that said Commissioner has reported that the military officers employed in the service of the U. States, stationed at Santa Fé, interposed adversely with the inhabitants to the fulfillment of his object, by employing influence in favor of the establishment of a separate State Government east of the Rio Grande, and within the rightful limits of the State of Texas—that, therefore, he wishes to know whether or not the officer in question has acted in this matter under the orders of his Government, and whether his Proclamation meets with the approval of the President of the United States.

President Fillmore's Message sets forth his reasons for considering New Mexico as no part of Texas, and his determination to sustain the citizens of New Mexico against all attempts of Texas to usurp authority there. At the same time it urges upon Congress the importance of an early settlement of the boundary of Texas and New Mexico, for doing which it expresses the opinion that Congress is now in possession of all necessary facts.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Post Office Appropriation Bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and during its discussion the Message of the President was received and read, and after some rather spicy remarks from Southern members, it was ordered to be printed, and referred to Committee of the Whole.

IN SENATE. FOURTH DAY, Aug. 7.

After the consideration of morning business, the Senate took up Mr. Pierce's Bill for the settlement of the boundary of Texas. Mr. Underwood spoke in opposition to it. The bill was then laid aside without any progress, and the California Bill taken up, upon which Mr. Yulee, with occasional interruptions, spoke throughout the session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House passed a Resolution calling on the President to communicate to the House, if consistent with the public interests, the amount and nature of our claims against Portugal, and all correspondence relating thereto.

The Post Office Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and after adopting one or two unimportant amendments, the Bill was passed.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, Aug. 8.

Mr. Cooper presented memorials from the iron workers of Pennsylvania, praying for a change in the Tariff. The memorials were referred to the Finance Committee.

The Bill for the settlement of the Texas boundary was taken up, and several amendments offered and rejected; after which a Message was received from the President explaining an item in his Texas Message, and then the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Bissell, from the Select Committee on the memorial of Miss Dix, made a report, accompanied by a bill granting ten millions of acres of public land for the benefit of the indigent insane of the several States, to be apportioned according to the ratio of representation under the the next census. No action taken.

The Oregon Land Bill was then taken up and passed. It creates the office of Surveyor General of the Public Lands in Oregon, and provides for the survey and makes donations to settlers of the said public lands.

The Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was read, and Mr. Brown of Miss. made a speech on the President's Message, which lasted till the hour of adjournment.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, Aug. 9.

Mr. Pearce's Bill, fixing a boundary between Texas and New Mexico, and paying Texas ten millions for relinquishing her claim to the territory North and West of that line, was then taken up, and remarks were made by Messrs. Winthrop, Underwood, Clemens, Mason, Foote, Butler, and others; after which the bill was passed by a vote of 30 to 20.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A resolution was adopted calling on the Secretary of the Navy for all correspondence and information in regard to the visit of the U. S. ship Preble to Japan, for the release of 16 American seamen held in prison by the authorities at Nagasaki.

The house then went into Committee of the Whole on the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, and spent the session in wrangling about Slavery, Texas and New Mexico.

IN SENATE. SABBATH, Aug 10.

The Revolutionary and Naval Pension Bills were passed without opposition.

The California Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Yulee resumed his speech.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House, in Committee of the Whole on the Civil and Diplomatic Appropritaion Bill, listened to speeches by Messrs. Houston, Moore, and Harrolson.

European News.

The steamer Cambria, from Liverpool, arrived at Boston on the 8th, with news from Europe one week later.

The Portuguese Government having declined to accede to the demands of the American minister, he has demanded his passports, and advertised his household furniture for sale. The American Squadron was still in the Tagus, and Mr. Clay intended to leave Lisbon on the 19th. It remains to be seen whether our squadron in the Tagus will at once attempt hostile measures toward Portuguese commerce, or await further orders from Washington.

Actual hostilities have been recommenced between Denmark and the Duchies, the latter being declared in a state of blockade. An action took place between a Danish man-of-war and a German steamer, Bonne, on the 21st, in which the former suffered considerable injury, and was forced to retire. On land, the hostile armies were, at last dates, face to face; and as the King of Denmark intends severe coërcion, backed by the active support of Russia, and the passive support of the other great powers, including England, there remains no doubt that a severe conflict will ensue.

The news of the death of Pres. Taylor produced a great sensation in England. The leading journals devote much space to reviews of his character and exploits, in which they pay a just tribute to his worth and fame.

In consequence of the death of the President of the United States, the President of the French Republic will go into mourning for one month. A grand solemn service will be performed at Notre Dame, and for ten days the national flag will have crape attached.

The definite effect of the new Electoral Law of France is now known, and it has been ascertained that the number of electors in France, which in 1848 amounted to 10,500,000, has been reduced to 3,250,000.

A dreadful accident happened at Frankfort, July 17. A new and magnificent building, lately erected in the suburb of Sachsenhausen, devoted to public amusements, and known as the Felsenkeller, or cellar in the rock, fell in with a terrible crash, about 4 o'clock. Sixteen persons are known to be buried in the ruins.

Four Days Later.

The U. S. Mail Steamer Pacific, which sailed from Liverpool July 31st, arrived at New York on Sunday evening last, having made the voyage in 11 days and 7 hours, against constant head winds.

The Pacific brings four days later news. The most important item relates to a battle between the Danish and Schleswig-Holstein armies, in which seven thousand were killed and wounded. The account is as follows:—

On the 25th of July the two armies met, and after some skirmishing a regular engagement ensued, in which the Danes were victorious. The battle began at dawn of day and lasted eleven hours. The Danes attacked with about 25,000 men, and the insurrectionary army was about 20,000 strong. The center of the Schleswig-Holsteiners, under Gen. Willisen, occupied the village of Idstedt, a little distance north of the town of Schleswig. The Danes attacked both wings of their enemies, and after a combat, which continued for eight hours, brought all their disposable strength against the center of Willisen's troops, and at length forced him to return through Schleswig, toward Rendsburg. By dates from Hamburgh of the 27th, we learn that the killed, wounded, and missing, in the battle of Idstedt, are now stated at 7,000, of which the greater share has fallen on the Danes. The numbers in action are estimated at 40,000 Danes and 30,000 Holsteiners. The Boersenhalle states that Gen. Von Willisen refused to accept the Danish General's offer of three days' truce. On the 26th the Danes had advanced to within a few miles of the Eider, near Cropos. Of the sixteen guns at Ekenford, the Holsteiners carried off two and spiked and abandoned the rest.

From Turkey we have intelligence that a terrible and destructive conflagration has reduced the city of Samara, Government of Simtirsk, to ruins; 33 stone houses, and 486 houses built of wood, have been destroyed. The church, the residence of the ambassador, of the municipal and judicial authorities, the prison, the hospital, the post office, 126 corn magazines, &c., have been destroyed. Fears are entertained of the olive crop of Turkey proving in some degree deficient.

THE OVERLAND EMIGRATION TO CALIFORNIA.—A letter to the St. Louis Republican, dated Fort Laramie, July 1, says:—For a few days past the emigration has very sensibly diminished, but still the road is thronged, and a large crowd is yet behind. Up to last evening the number of names registered at this place was 38,312. The number of wagons 8,773. Making a small allowance for those who have not put down their names, we shall have about 40,000 for the number of those who have passed this point. The leading trains passed here two months since, and must now be in the vicinity of Sacramento. Between that point and this, there is one continuous line of gold-diggers dragging its slow length toward the Pacific. From the scarcity of provisions among many of the emigrants, there can be but little doubt that the suffering will be frightful in the California mountains. The sickness this season has been much more fatal than it was last. A gentleman just from the frontier, states that he counted no less than six hundred and forty-five new graves along side the road. Most of the sickness has been produced by inattention to diet, want of proper clothing, and drinking stagnant water.

Nineteen Days Later from California.

By the steamer Cherokee, which arrived at New York last week, we have news from San Francisco to July 1. The Cherokee brought about two and a half millions of dollars in gold dust.

A great excitement has existed throughout California on account of discoveries said to have been made in the vicinity of Gold Lake. The story proving a humbug, some of the pretended discoverers stood in imminent danger of being lynched. Marysville was almost depopulated by the means.

San Francisco is said to be rapidly recovering from the effects of the late fire. The burnt district will soon be covered with fire-proof brick buildings.

The assessment troubles were coming to a close without injurious results; many of the tax collectors having given up the attempt, being convinced that the tax is too high, and that it cannot be successfully collected. All agree that a lighter scale of taxation would have been readily assented to and paid by the great mass of foreign population.

But little is doing in the mines. The waters in the rivers and large gulches are yet too high, and in the small ravines too little, for successful operations.

With the exception of a number of frightful murders committed in the southern mines, we hear of but very little disturbance throughout the whole mining region.

Immigration is pouring into the country, through San Francisco, as rapidly as ever.

The mail received at San Francisco on Sunday, June 23, by the California, was, perhaps, the largest ever carried by one vessel at any one time. The whole number of large and well filled bags amounted to one hundred and sixty-one or two.

A robbery of $32,000 in gold was perpetrated on the Isthmus, while the mule train was passing from Panama to Chagres. The robbers made their appearance, and took possession of the mule which was laden with three boxes containing the above amount.

Previous to the sailing of the Cherokee from Chagres, the brig Nathan C. Ely was wrecked on a reef near Old Providence; the captain and crew left her in two boats, each of which contained five persons; but one of them succeeded in landing at San Juan. The vessel was a total loss.

HURRICANE IN THE WEST INDIES.—Capt. Loring, of the bark J. W. Blogett, from St. Martins, July 19, reports a terrible hurricane there, and in the adjoining Islands, on the 11th and 12th July. It commenced at 2 P. M. on the 11th, blowing with great fury from the North, causing the inhabitants to fly for refuge to places promising the greatest security from the elements. It raged until midnight, when it ceased for an hour, and all nature seemed profoundly silent; it then recommenced from South-west, and continued until 5 o'clock the next morning, when the ruins of a number of buildings were found strewn in every direction. All the shipping in the harbor suffered severely. Several English vessels were wrecked. The inhabitants have sustained considerable loss. It is supposed no salt can be made for four or five years. The depth of water in the salt ponds is nine feet, by reason of the rains. The former depth was fourteen inches. Salt has risen from 19 to 30 cents per bbl. Several lives were lost in the harbor. The Government of St. Barts have been obliged to contribute to the sustenance of the distressed. The loss at St. Barts is $40,000. Accounts from Antigua, St. Kitts, &c., state that they had the hurricane equally severe.

COUNTERFEIT LAND WARRANTS.—Thompson's Bank Note Reporter says that some twenty to thirty counterfeit Warrants have been sold in Wall-st. They are an imitation of the red check letter sheet, and purport to be issued recently. Most that we have seen are to B. F. James, of Shelbyville, and the assignments purport to be made and acknowledged in Indiana. The preparation for this swindle has been cautiously executed, and as the filling up and assignment of Warrants are easily varied, it is to be presumed that the counterfeiters are trying their hands in other places with varied emissions of the same kind. We have seen no fraud so dangerous for a long time.

SUMMARY.

Suydam, Sage & Co., heavy dealers in flour and provsions, failed last week owing, it is stated, to some large speculative operations in flour, which turned out unfavorably, and to extensive losses in the recent fire at Oswego. The amount of their liabilities is vaguely stated at about $2,000,000, The amount of their paper afloat in the street is reported about $300,000. One item of their assets consists of 250,000 barrels of flour, and another of 300,000 bushels of wheat, they being the largest holders in the market. Their loss at Oswego was $50,000.

A daughter, aged 12, of George Grissel of Rensselaer, Ind. committed suicide on the 23d ult. by hanging herself. She had accidentally broken a crock and was afraid of punishment. She dressed herself in suitable burial clothes, and telling her little brother that "she never would break another crock," she got upon the bed, tied a bridle to the joist, fastened it around her neck, and jumped off. Her brother succeeded in replacing her upon the bed, but she jumped off the second time, and before he could obtain assistance she was dead.

Owing to the protracted session of the Michigan Convention, the State Treasurer has suspended the payment of the certificates of members, beyond the first sixty days of the session, which expired on the 1st inst. The amount paid and payable up to that time will absorb all, and perhaps more than all the available means of the State Treasury that can be relied on before the meeting of the next Legislature.

On the 1st ult., the contractors for the U. S. mail service between Santa Fe and Independence, Mo., were to start their first stage from the latter point. A stage drawn by six mules is to leave Independence and Santa Fe on the first of every month. The trip through is expected to be made in from twenty to twenty-nine days. A strong escort is to attend each stage, and several stations have been prepared for relays and provisions.

A North-Western (Ohio) Teachers' Institute is called to assemble at Maumee City on the 26th inst., adjourning, after one week's session, to Perrysburg, where it will sit another week. More than one hundred teachers are said to have promised to attend. On the Board of Instruction, we remark the names of Teachers from Massillon, Sandusky City, Michigan, and New York.

In Canada the harvest has been got in generally in good order. In some localities the late heavy showers gave the farmer trouble, but did little injury to the crop. The yield has been very large, and the berry presents the finest appearance. There will be a large surplus to dispose of. The Spring crops of every discription are good—potaoes will be abundant and free from disease.

The American Pomological Congress will meet at Cincinnati, on the 11th, 12th and 13th of September next, the time of holding the Ohio State Fair. Ample arrangements are said to be in progress of preparation for the occasion, and fruit growers will be afforded an excellent opportunity for exhibiting specimens of their productions.

A resolution has been submitted in the Michigan Constitutional Convention, to inquire into the expediency of the formation of a Territorial Government for the Upper Peninsula, (on Lake Superior,) and its ultimate admission in the Union as a State, with the assent of the people of the State of Michigan and of Congress.

The Wheat and Corn crops of the West promise to be extremely abundant; and the reports from the Valley of the Genesee of the damage which has occured to the Wheat crop yet ungarnered, and which may affect the yield materially, have caused the best kind of Flour to be held more firmly. This, however, is but a small exception to the general reports of the crop now harvesting.

The carriage which is to be used at the coronation of the Emperor of Austria, says a letter from Vienna, was made in the reign of Charles, for the marriage of his daughter, Maria Theresa. Since that time it has been used for the coronation of the Emperors. The gilding alone cost 180,000 florins. The paintings on the door are by Rubens, and cost 60,000 florins.

Capt Wood, of the schooner Mary Elizabath from Port au Priuce, which place she left on the 19th of July, reports that a brother of the governor of that place was publicly shot on the day before Capt Wood left, for having "openly spoken against the preceedings of the President." The report sounds like an exparte statement.

On the 4th inst., a son of Mrs. Ruth Merrill of Hampstead, about 13 years old, snapped a pistol several times at a squirrel, but, not succeeding in discharging it, snapped it at his companions, who immediately fled. He then pointed it towards himself, and once more snapped it, when the powder took fire, and the contents of the pistol were lodged in his body, causing instant death.

Mrs. Rachel Datton, her son Nathan Datton, and a man named Slaughter, were killed by the same stroke of lightning at Ashton, [illegible] 4 P. M. on the 3d inst. They were attending an auction. Several other persons were prostrated, and some injured, by the shock. The house where they were was also injured.

The Twenty-first Anniversary of the American Institute of Instruction will be held at Northampton, Mass., on the 13th, 14th, and 15th insts. Interesting lectures and discussions may be expected, with free accommotdaions for ladies.

John E. Bean, whose arrest at Geneva, on a charge of robbing the Post Office at Geneva has been committed for trial in default of bail to the amount of $2,500.

The eldest son of Rev. Robert Baird of Yonkers was drowned in the river opposite that place on Tuesday evening while bathing.

Rev. A. G. O. Dwight and family have taken passage in the bark Stamboul, to sail from Boston for Smyrna.

The Watertown Jeffersonian states that within the memory of the oldest inhabitant the crops in Jefferson County, N. Y., never were better than at this time; it is estimated that the product of 1850 will exceed that of 1849 more than one-half.

Benjamin Wilcox, a drunkard of Tonawanda, Bradford Co., Pa., being intoxicated, killed his wife by stabbing her to the heart. When arrested he attempted to commit suicide.

A work-shop connected with the New York State Prison at Sing Sing was burned on Sixth-day last, and about $30,000 worth of property destroyed, of which some $12,000 is lost to the State.

On Sixth-day evening last, the locomotive, tender, and sprinkler, of a train of cars on the Hudson River Railroad, were dumped through a drawbridge at Yonkers, and nearly ruined. No lives lost.

The New York City Hospital has lately been much improved, and when the alterations now in progress are complete, will accommodate a much larger number of patients than at present. The number of inmates is now about 350. Out of 3,323 patients treated there last year, only 361 died.

At St. Louis, on the 15th ult., eleven men, working upon a sewer in Bridge street, were sun-struck, and five of them died instantly. On the 16th, nine more were struck, one dying instantly.

Littlefield, witness in the Parkman murder case, has, according to the Boston Daily Mail, been offered the sum of $5,000 to travel six months with an exhibition of a couple of full-length wax figures of the late Dr. Parkman and Prof. Webster.

A complete list of the letters lying uncalled for in the post office at San Francisco for the three months ending July 1, occupies four full pages of the California Courier.

The new law, excluding small notes of other States from circulation in Pennsylvania, goes into effect on the 21st of the present month.

The Standard estimates the population of Syracuse at 20,000 to 21,000. Five years ago the population was only 9,600.

Mr. Barnum announces that Jenny Lind, the Swedish Nightingale, will make her first appearance before a New York audience on or about the 18th of September.

Ex-Gov. Bibb and family, says the Toledo (O.) Blade, are in town, on their way to settle in Illinois. The Governor some years since made a purchase of a large tract of land between Chicago and Galena, for a friend, with a view of locating a Welsh colony. His friend, not liking the climate of that region, has exchanged with the Governor, who goes there with his family for the purpose of farming on a large scale.

The Menominee Indians are about to be removed from the vicinity of Green Bay, to a district North of the Crow Wing River. A delegation of the chief men of the tribe reached Lancaster, Wis., July 19, en route to the new country, for the purpose of locating their residences, selecting farms, &c. The nation numbers about 2,500, and has resided near Green Bay for 200 years.

From a private letter, dated Middle Fork, June 16, 1850, we learn (says the Jersey City Sentinel) that the prize fighter, Yankee Sullivan, has met with an untimely end at Sacramento City. The writer says that Sullivan assaulted a man by striking him a blow with his fist, when a pistol was immediately leveled at the bully by the assaulted, and fired, thus hurrying him into eternity.

Messrs. Maunsell, White & Son, of New Orleans, who have been Gen. Taylor's agents for 20 years, contradict the statements relative to his pecuniary affairs, and assert that he leaves in bank stocks and other valuable property to the amount of $200,000. He never gave a note in his life, and died without owing a dollar.

The cholera is decreasing in Mexico, though increasing along the Gulf. At Mexico the total number of cases from June 25 to August 6 was 2,000, deaths 1,234; 286 cases and 176 deaths per day. From the beginning of the epidemic till July 2, the total number of cases in that city was 15,000, and of deaths, a little more than 6,400.

A dispatch to the Rochester Democrat, dated Buffalo, August 7, 3 P. M., says, that the steamboat Lexington was run into last night off Coneaut by the propeller Allegheny. She was immediately towed into Coneaut Harbor by the propeller, where she soon after sunk. No lives were lost.

DIED,

At the residence of Deacon Nathan Maxson, in Milton, Rock County, Wisconsin, MAXSON GREEN, of Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 28th of July, 1850, and his wife, LYDIA, on the following day. Brother and sister Green were on a visit to their friends in Wisconsin, and the time of their intended sojourn was nearly expired, when, on the morning of the 28th, about 3 o'clock, they were both seized with diarrhea, he very violently, accompanied with cholera spasms. The aid of three of our best physicians was immediately called, but the physicians' skill, and all the care and solicitude of kind friends, were of no avail; life rapidly ebbed, and at 6½ o'clock the following evening Bro. Green's spirit fled, and left its former tenement a lifeless lump of clay. The attack on sister Green was not so violent, and did not assume an alarming character until she discovered that he must die; then her disease almost immediately assumed a deadly cholera character, and on the following morning, at a quarter before ten o'clock, the scenes of the present life closed upon her, and those on the other side of Jordan opened to her view. The physicians pronounced these cases cholera. It is believed that Bro. Green was about 63 years of age, and that his wife was in her 62d year. The writer is not acquainted with the time when they first consecrated themselves to the service of their Redeemer, but believes it was in early life. Of their exemplary piety and benevolence, it is superfluous to write, as "their praise is in all the churches." They were accounted pillars as well as ornaments in the Church of Alfred, where they were members. They were ready for every good work, and their house was the home of the pilgrim. The missionary cause was especially dear to them, and it is understood, that they designed that their property, after their decease, should be devoted to that cause. It is believed they died, as they had long lived, with full and unshaken confidence in the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ. S. COON.

MILTON, Wis., July 31st, 1850.

Notice.

To the Churches of the Western S. D. B. Association:

DEAR BRETHREN,—You are hereby notified, that your contributions to the funds of your Associational Mission are greatly needed, and you are desired to foward them as soon as convenient; and if an opportunity shall not sooner present itself, will you bring them in at the time of our Anniversaries in September

N. V. HULL, Secretary.

South-Western Association.

THE next session of the Seventh-day Baptist South-Western Association will be held with the Church at Jackson, Shelby Co, Ohio, commencing on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in October, 1850. Eld. Azor Estee is to preach the Introductory Discourse. A full delegation is desirable. It is expected that the churches will bear in mind, that the question of dividing the Association has been referred to that meeting, and that they will be prepared to act in the matter. WM. F. RANDOLPH, Secretary.

Notice.

THE Yearly Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches in Rhode Island and Connecticut will be held with the 1st Seventh day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I., commencing on Sabbath, August 31st, at 10½ o'clock A. M. It is earnestly hoped, that on the services of this annual convocation, the blessing of God may be invoked by the churches which compose it—that by it the bond of union and Christian fellowship among the churches may be strengthened, and the general interest of the Redeemer's kingdom promoted. Brethren and sisters, let us each labor to bring with us a sanctified offering to present before the Lord. 3t

A Valuable Farm for Sale.

THE subscriber offers at Private Sale his Farm, situate near Shiloh, Cumberland County, New Jersey, containing 107 Acres of Good Land, in a high state of cultivation, having carted on it within the last 4 years, about 1,000 loads of good shell marl, near 2,000 bushels of lime, besides ashes, guano, and poudrett without measure. There is on said Farm a new and substantial Dwelling House, built of the best materials and by good workmen. two stories high, with a good cellar. Size of the house 32 feet by 28 feet, with kitchen and bath-room attached, 17 by 28 feet, a good well of water, a cistern holding about 30 hogsheads of water, with a pump in the kitchen, very convenient for washing and supplying the bath-room. A large barn, stabling and hay house, wagon house, wash and wood house, and other out buildings. all fitted up within four years. Two Young Apple Orchards of choice fruit, besides an old orchard of natural fruit; also a variety of other fruit trees, such as peaches, pears, plums, &c. There are also two Good Tenant Houses, with good wells of water at their doors, newly fitted up, and so arranged on the Farm that it can easily be divided into two if desired

Said Farm is handsomely located, within half a mile of the village of Shiloh, N J., where is a post office, and the Greenwich stage running through regular to Philadelphia; within three miles and a half of Bridgeton, the county town, where the steamer Cohansey plies daily to Philadelphia, and within two miles and a quarter of Roadstown.

The Union Academy is located in its immediate vicinity, the design of which is to prepare students for college. Over a hundred were in attendance the first year, which has just closed. A large brick building is now being fitted up for its accommodation. There has been a large sum of money subscribed to procure apparatus and material for an Agricultural Department, and fitting up a Chemical Laboratory, which will go into operation this fall, the only institution of the kind all West Jersey.

The above advantages make the said Farm a desirable location. Property in the vicinity is rising in value constantly.

For further particulars, inquire of the subscriber on the premises. Terms made easy.

The Rabbit on the Wall.

BY CATHARINE ALLAN.

The cottage work is over,
The evening meal is done;
Hark! through the starlit stillness,
You hear the river run.
The cotter's children whisper,
Then speak out one and all,
"Come, father, make for Johnny
A rabbit on the wall."

He smilingly assenting,
They gather round his chair;
"Now, grandma, you hold Johnny—
Don't let the candle flare."
So speaking, from his fingers
He throws a shadow tall,
That seems, the moment after,
A rabbit on the wall.

The children shout with laughter,
The uproar louder grows,
E'en grandma chuckles faintly,
And Johnny chirps and crows.
There ne'er was gilded painting,
Hung up in lordly hall,
Gave half the simple pleasure,
This rabbit on the wall.

Ah! who does not remember
When humble sports like these,
Than many a costlier pastime
Had greater power to please?
When o'er life's autumn pathway
The sere leaves thickly fall,
How oft we sigh, recalling
The rabbit on the wall.

John Charles Fremont.

BORN IN SOUTH CAROLINA, JAN., A. D. 1813.

The feet of three men have pressed the slopes of the Rocky Mountains, whose names are associated for ever with those vast ranges: Humboldt, the Nestor of scientific travelers; Audubon, the interpreter of Nature; and Fremont, the pathfinder of Empire. Each has done much to illustrate the Natural History of North America, and to develop its illimitable resources. The youngest of all is likely to become as illustrious as either, for fortune has linked his name with a scene in the history of the Republic, as startling to the world as the first announcement of its existence. To his hands was committed the magnificent task of opening the golden gates of our Pacific Empire. His father was an emigrant gentleman from France, and his mother a lady of Virginia. Although his death left his son an orphan in his fourth year, he was thoroughly educated; and when at the age of seventeen he graduated at Charleston College, he contributed to the support of his mother and her younger children. From teaching mathematics he turned his attention to civil engineering, in which he displayed so much talent that he was recommended by Mr. Poinsett, Secretary of War, to Nicollet as his assistant, in the survey of the basin of the Upper Mississippi. Two years he was with that learned man in his field of labors, and won his applause and friendship. On his return to Washington he continued his services to the geographer for two years longer, in drawing up from his field-book the great map which unfolded to science the vast tract they had explored. Thirsting for adventure, he now planned the first of those distant and perilous expeditions which have given luster to his name. Having received a lieutenant's commission in the Corps of Topographical Engineers, he proposed to the Secretary of War to penetrate the Rocky Mountains. His plan was approved, and in 1842, with a handful of men gathered on the Missouri frontier, he reached and explored the South Pass. He achieved more than his instructions required. He not only fixed the locality and character of that great Pass, through which myriads are now pressing to California—he defined the astronomy, geography, botany, geology, and meteorology of the country, and designated the route since followed, and the points from which the flag of the Union is now flying from a chain of wilderness fortresses. His Report was printed by the Senate, translated into foreign languages, and the scientific world looked on Fremont as one of its benefactors. Impatient, however, for broader and more hazardous fields, he planned a new expedition to the distant Territory of Oregon. His first had carried him to the summits of the Rocky Mountains; Wilkes had surveyed the tide-water regions of the Columbia River; between the two explorers lay a tract of a thousand miles which was a blank in geography. In May, 1843, he left the frontier of Missouri, and in November be stood on Fort Vancouver, with the calm waters of the Pacific at his feet. He had approached the mountains by a new line, scaled their summits south of the South Pass, deflected to the Great Salt Lake, and pushed examinations right and left along his entire course. He joined his Survey to Wilkes' Exploring Expedition, and his orders were fulfilled. But he had opened one route to the Columbia, and he wished to find another. There was a vast region south of his line, invested with a fabulous interest, and he longed to apply to it the test of exact science. It was the beginning of winter. Without resources, adequate supplies, or even a guide, and with only twenty-five companions, he turned his face once more toward the Rocky Mountains. Then began that wonderful expedition, filled with romance, achievement, daring, and suffering, in which he was lost from the world nine months, traversing 3,500 miles, in sight of eternal snows; in which he explored and revealed the grand features of Alta California, its great basin, the Sierra Nevada, the valleys of San Joaquin and Sacramento, exploded the fabulous Buenaventura, revealed the real El Dorado, and established the geography of the western part of onr continent. In August, 1844, he was again in Washington, after an absence of sixteen months. His Report put the seal to the fame of the young explorer. . . . . He was planning a third expedition while writing a history of the second; and before its publication, in 1845, he was again on his way to the Pacific, collecting his mountain comrades, to examine in detail the Asiatic slope of the N. A. continent, which resulted in giving a volume of new science to the world, and California to the United States. We cannot trace his achievements during the war with Mexico, nor will future times inquire how many, nor how great battles he fought. After the conquest of California, Fremont was made the victim of a quarrel between two American commanders. Like Columbus, he was brought home a prisoner, over the vast territory he had explored; stripped by a court-martial of his commission as Lieut. Colonel of Mounted Riflemen, and reinstated by the President. Fremont need ed justice, not mercy, and he returned his commission. His defense was worthy of a man of honor, genius, and learning. During the ninety days of his trial, his nights were given to science. . . . . Thus ended his services to the Government—but not to mankind. He was now a private citizen, and a poor man. Charleston offered him a lucrative office, which he refused. He had been brought as a criminal from California, where he had been Explorer, Conquerer, Peacemaker, Governor. He determined to retrieve his honor on the field where he had been robbed of it. One line more would complete his surveys—the route for a great road from the Mississippi to San Francisco. Again he appeared on the far West. His old mountaineers flocked around him, and with 33 men and 130 mules, perfectly equipped, he started for the Pacific. On the Sierra San Juan, all his mules and a third of his men perished in a more than Russian cold; and Fremont arrived on foot at Santa Fé, stripped of every thing but life. It was a moment for the last pang of despair which breaks the heart, or the moral heroism which conquers Fate itself. The men of the wilderness knew Fremont; they refitted his expedition; he started again; pierced the country of the fierce and remorseless Apaches; met, awed, or defeated savage tribes; and in a hundred days from Santa Fé, he stood on the glittering banks of the Sacramento. The men of California reversed the judgment of the court-martial; and Fremont was made the first Senator of the Golden State. It was a noble tribute to Science and Heroism. . . . . His name is identified for ever with some of the proudest and most grateful passages in American history. His 20,000 miles of wilderness explorations, in the midst of the inclemencies of nature, and the ferocities of jealous and merciless tribes; his powers of endurance in a slender frame; his interpid coolness in the most appalling dangers; his magnetic sway over enlightened and savage men; his vast contributions to science; his controlling energy in the extension of our Empire; his lofty and unsullied ambition; his magnanimity, humanity, genius, sufferings, and heroism, make all lovers of progress, learning, and virtue rejoice that Fremont's services have been rewarded by high civic honors, exhaustless wealth, and the admiration and gratitude of mankind. Elisha K. Kane.

Our readers have already been apprised that an Arctic expedition, intended to search for the missing Sir John Franklin, has been fitted out by the munificence of Mr. Grinnell, a New York merchant, and has started under auspices of the general government; which, by authority of Congress, has consent ed that the officers of our navy shall lead the daring enterprise. Among these officers we observe the name of Surgeon Elisha K. Kane, son of Hon. John K. Kane, of this city, who volunteered for the service, and is now principal surgeon of the expedition. We saw the announcement of his name among the officers with surprise. He has long been suffering from a combination of infirmities, the result of a series of adventures, such as few men living have undergone, and such as still fewer would voluntarily embark in out of pure love of danger, and the spirit of seeing wonders and the peculiarities of other parts of the globe. Having enjoyed the acquaintance of this brave young man, we are able to state what follows of his career, even if we should use that which was communicated to us in semi-confidential interviews. No American of his age has ever seen so much of the perils of the world, or of the world itself.

He was surgeon of the American legation to China, and on his way to the celestial regions he spent some weeks on a foot-tramp through the orange groves of Brazil, and about a month in tiger-hunting near Bombay. Hence, after a dozen unsuccessful attempts to smuggle himself into the forbidden lands of China, he went over to the Phillippines, and by the aid of the good monks of the interior of Manilla, explored its fastnesses and volcanic wonders. He was the first man to descend into the great crater of the Tael, lowered down two hundred feet over the brink by a bamboo rope tied round his middle, and brought back a bottle full of its sulphur waters, burning off his boots in the lava cinders. Leaving China, after a second visit, in which he encountered ship-wreck, he passed to India as physician of the Dremendhar Dagore, and was palanquined for some three months through the wonders of its mountain architecture, the ancient glories of Candy, the stupendous passes of the Ghant country, visiting Madras, Pondicherry, and every spot that we have read of in the trial of Warren Hastings.

Next, to Upper Egypt and Abyssinia, crossing the desert on his camel to the basis of Jupiter Ammon, climbing at break-neck risk to the topstone of sounding Colossus of Memnon, and exploring the tombs of the Pharaohs for a fortnight or three weeks with Professor Lepsius and his associates. Wrecked again while passing down to Alexandria, he pushed across to Greece, and traversed every scene of classic interest, climbing to the Hippocrene Spring, and sleeping on the shore of Marathon. He returned by Italy, France, and England, only to rest a few weeks, before a cruise on the coast of Africa. Renewing here some acquaintances which had been formed in Brazil, he was allowed to inspect the entire machinery of the slave trade, and to pass up into the interior, under the firman of Desouza, the great intermediary between the chiefs of the slave-making districts and the Brazilian carrier.

The coast fever was his pay for this trip, and he was sent home by Commodore Read, an invalid. Imperfectly patched up from the effects of this visitation, he volunteered for service with the army in Mexico, and was ordered with dispatches on a dare-devil race, through the country our troops had left, to overtake Gen. Scott. Availing himself, at Perote, of a miscreant escort of jail birds that Gen. Worth had employed as a spy company, he got into a series of fights, in the last of which he received the swords of Gen. Gaona and Gen. Torrejon, and had his horse killed under him, and was himself desperately wounded, while protecting the lives of his prisoners against his own men. Since then he has been cruising, and practicing hydrography on the coast survey, up to the moment of receiving his telegraphic dispatch, accepting his urgent proffer of services for the Arctic expedition. He had the rice fever in the Canton river, the plague in Egypt, the yellow fever at Rio, the congestive at Puebla, and the African fever on the coast. These, and wounds, and an organic desease of the heart, which he has had from boyhood, have been his preparations for the hazards he is encountering now.

Altogether his history is eventful and thrilling for so young a man, and induces us cordially to hope that he may return from his last adventure with new honors and a restored constitution. [Phil. Pennsylvanian.

Tunnelling the Alps.

The Sardinian Government is devising means for introducing a railway communication with France and Northern Europe, by means of a tunnel through 'the everlasting Alps.' A railroad is already in progress, and nearly completed through a portion of the kingdom, to connect Turin, the capitol, with the port of Genoa on the Mediterranean, and the contemplated tunnel is only wanted to divert the internal trade and intercourse of Europe in that direction. The machinery referred to in the subjoined notice by the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, was invented expressly for the work by Chevalier Maus, a distinguished engineer in the service of the Sardinian Government:—

To give an idea of the nature of the great seven mile tunnel through the Alps, we are enabled to inform our readers, from descriptions given in English journals, that, in its progress, the tunnel must pass under some of the most elevated crests of Mont Cenis—one in particular, where there will be 4,850 feet of mountain, capped with eternel glaciers, overhead, at the middle of the tunnel; so that not only will the workmen and machinery in construction, and the passengers and trains in transit, be buried to that depth in the heart of the mountain, but all idea of shafts, either to facilitate excavation, or to promote ventilation, must be out of the question. The breath of life itself must be respired, from either extremity, with artificial aid, in the shape of currents of fresh air transmitted, and of foul withdrawn, by mechanical apparatus ever at work, at least during excavation; which is also itself to be effected by machinery of a new and simple nature, worked by water power of mountain streams, whereby the trains are also to be run through the tunnel, which ascends, from the northern or Savoy side, at Modena, all the way to its exit at Bardonneche, with a gradiant equal to 19 in 1,000. The machine, once presented to the rock, projects into it simultaneously four horizontal series of sixteen scalpels, working backwards and forwards by means of springs cased in, and put in motion by the same water power. While these are at work, one vertical series on each side works simultaueously up and down, so that together they cut four blocks, or rather insulate four blocks on all sides, except on the rock behind, from which they are afterwards detached by hand.

It has been already ascertained that each of the two machines at the opposite sides of the tunnel, will excavate to the extent of 22 feet a day, and it is estimated that the whole excavation will be completed in four years. The gallery to be perforated by the machines will be 13 feet wide by 7 feet high, and this once cut through, the bore will be enlarged by ordinary means to 25 feet in width and 19 feet in hight, and a double line of rails laid. The estimated cost of this great tunnel is only 13,804,942f., or about $2,700,000. It is to be immediatly commenced at the north entrance.

On the Use of Mules.

1. Mules, on a general average, live more than twice as long as horses. They are fit for service from three years old to thirty. At twelve a horse has seen his best days and is going down hill, but a mule at that age has scarcely risen out of his colthood, and goes on improving until he is twenty. Instances are recorded of mules living sixty or seventy years, but these are exceptions. The general rule is that they average thirty.

2. Mules are never exposed to diseases as horses are. Immense sums of money are annually lost in the premature death of high-spirited horses by accident as well as disease. This results from the next consideration, which is that—

3. Mules have organs of vision and hearing far superior to the horse. Hence they seldom shear, and frighten, and run off. A horse frightens, because he imagines he sees something frightful, but a mule, having superior discernment, both by the eye and ear, understands everything he meets, and therefore is safe. For the same reason he is surer footed, and hence more valuable in mountainous regions, and on dangerous roads. I doubt whether on the Alpine paths a mule ever made a misstep. He may have been deceived in the firmness of the spot where he set his foot, but not in the propriety of the choice, all appearances considered.

4. The mule is much more hardy than the horse. A pair of these animals, owned by a neighbor of mine, although small in size, will plough more land in a week than four horses. Their faculty of indurance is almost incredible.

5. Another very important fact is, that in the matter of food, a mule will live and thrive on less than one half it takes to keep a horse. The horses of England, at the present time, are consuming grain, which would save the lives of thousands of British subjects. In a national point of view, the agricultural interest is so great, that the greater the demand for grain of all kinds, the better for the farmer. But yet individual farmers, who are in debt, and whose land is not improved, would find it profitable, in the course of ten years, to have the labor of a full team, and save one half and more of the food necessary to keep it up, as might be the case in substituting mules for horses. [Farmer and Mechanic.

THE MECHANICAL LABOR ON A NEWSPAPER.—Few persons have any idea of the vast amount of mechanical labor, independent of the mental exertion, which is required in the production of a newspaper. The London Times, with its mammoth supplement, has 72 closely printed columns, which contain 17,500 lines, made up of more than a million pieces of type. Thirty-four thousand copies of this paper and supplement have been printed in about four hours. The greatest number ever printed in one day was fifty-four thousand, and the paper used weighed seven tons, the usual weight being four and a half tons. The surface printed every night (with a single supplement) is thirty acres, the weight of type in constant use is seven tons, and 110 compositors and 25 pressmen are constantly employed.

Trip to St. Peters River.

From the St. Louis Republican, July 26.

The steamer Anthony Wayne returned night before last from another voyage to the wild waters of the Upper Mississippi. During the excursion, with a large party on board, the boat ascended to the mouth of Blue Earth River, a tributary of the St. Peters, and distant more than two hundred miles from the junction of the Mississippi and St. Peters. The voyage is described as truly delightful at this season of the year, and the scenery was the most romantic that eye ever beheld. After proceeding as far up the St. Peters as it was deemed practicable or prudent to venture, a disembarkation was made a la Columbus, and the following inscription, painted on a neat sign board, was reared on a gigantic monarch of the forest, in honor of the discovery.

"Steamer Anthony Wayne, Dan. Able, master, July 19, 1850; 200 miles from the Mississippi, and about as high as steamboats usually go."

From this point the boat turned about, and made a rapid descent, reaching St. Paul on the 21st. The St. Peters and Mississippi were unsually high; and for several days there was more water in the former than had been known for twenty years. The Wayne took advantage of this, and was therefore enabled to reach a much higher point than a steamboat had ever gone before. A large party of ladies and gentlemen were on board from St. Paul, Mendotah, and Fort Snelling, and enjoyed the trip heartily. Beside, the boat had a considerable quantity of freight for the Six Villages, and other Indian towns, being the first ever shipped by steamboat up that river. The water was very high, the banks and bottoms being overflowed for miles, and the poor Indians came in for their share of trouble, having lost nearly all their patches of corn, potatoes, melons, &c., and by this calamity it is thought that much suffering will be entailed upon them during the coming Winter.

Remarkable Phenomenon.

We are indebted to Mr. John Spalding for the following interesting particulars of a singular phenomenon that took place at Two Heart River, on the southern shore of Lake Superior. About 11 o'clock in the day of the 18th June, Mr. Spalding's attention was attracted to a slight agitation of the water near the shore, and very soon he saw, with surprise, the land suddenly rising out of the water a few rods from the shore, and within a stone's throw of himself. The beach opposite was also raised up at the same time to a hight of some 12 feet. The new island is round and about 150 feet in circumference, and is raised above the water about six feet, and the rise on the beach, which is wide at this place, is of about the same size and looks like a hillock of sand. The new island was at first covered with sand and pebbles like the bottom of the lake, but the waves have dashed over it since and washed it down to a black clay. The water was about five feet deep where the island was formed, and a boat had passed over the very spot not five minutes before its formation. A few rods from the beach, back on the rise of ground, a great depression of the earth took place, as remarkable as the upheaving in the water. A circular spot of ground, some 50 rods in circumference, covered with trees, was suddenly sunk down to the depth of 20 feet below the surface. A number of Indians who were encamped near this place were very much frightened at this strange manifestation of the power of the "Great Spirit," and fled from the place in great terror, and could not be persuaded for some time to visit the spot. No agitation of the earth, or shock or noise took place, and the cause must have been much less powerful than the internal convulsions of the earth that usually attend such phenomena; and still it is worthy the notice and consideration of geologists and scientific inquirers after truth.

Russia and its Emperor.

This year, it is said, the Emperor Nicholas will either resign the crown or perish. Such a prediction, so positively asserted, might savor of childishness if uttered in the garb of prophecy, but those familiar with the secret history of Russia know well that beyond the period of 25 years no Emperor is allowed to reign in that land. There is, or at least has been hitherto, a power behind the throne which none of the sovereigns have been able to resist or evade. The dreaded family of the Orloffs are the hereditary ministers of that power. The unenviable distinction is theirs to be by proscriptive right the agents specially employed. Alexander occupied the throne for the restricted period—and perished. Diebitchz fell into disgrace. One of the Orloffs appeared in the camp. Soon after the General was reported dead. Who next? was the question in men's mouths. Duke Constantine died suddenly. Orloff still remained, and only departed when the Dutchess was announced as having suddenly died. The maxims of state policy which animate the ancient nobles of the Empire, impose upon Nicholas a duty he dare not despise—that duty is to resign or accept his fate. A few months will confirm a prediction not thoughtlessly uttered. [Tribune.

Kidnapping a White Man.

Our usually quiet little ves a vis, Aigiers, was quite stirred up by a curious affair which occurred on Saturday last, says the New Orleans Delta of July 23. A man named Hall, a negro trader, went across the river in pursuit of a light mulatto slave who had escaped from his master in North Carolina. On inquiring of some mischievous negro for a person of the description of him he was in pursuit of, Hall was pointed to an individual of dark complexion, who sat in the bar-room of Saliot & Rivoil. Approaching him, Hall asked, sportively, to see his wrist, and while making some remarks about his shirt sleeves, slipped a pair of handcuffs on his arms, and then commenced dragging him toward the river. The poor fellow, thus unceremoniously treated, who proved to be a well-known French or Creole citizen of Algiers, of the name of Hippolite Lieutand, immediately raised a cry for help, and a crowd gathered around them. "Come along," cried Hall; "I know you well; you belong to Colonel ——, of North Carolina." "Je ne suis pas un naigre!" exclaimed the poor Frenchman, quite lustily, appealing to his friends in the crowd to substantiate his averment. Here the crowd interfered, and a constable coming up, both parties, Hippolite and his would-be abductor, were lodged in prison. Hippolite, however, was released after a while, and Hall was retained, under a complaint for kidnapping, under the late act of the Legislature. This is certainly a strange affair, and ought to be investigated. People seem to think that there are no laws in this country, and that every man can make himself judge, jury, sheriff, and executive, whenever he desires.

CHARLATANISM.—Dr. F——, as soon as he arrived in a city where he was not known, began loudly to lament the loss of his dog, which had escaped from him on his way to the hotel, and he sent the town crier to announce with the roll of a drum throughout all the principal streets, that Dr. F—— offered a reward of twenty-five louis to whoever should bring back his dog. The crier took care to add all the academic titles of the doctor, and to indicate the hotel where he put up. Soon nothing was talked of in the town but Dr. F—— and his dog. "Do you know," said the gossips, "that a celebrated physician has arrived, and is staying at the Hotel ——? he must be famously rich, since he offers twenty-five louis reward for his dog." Thus his name passed rapidly from mouth to mouth, and from house to house; and although it did not bring him the lost dog, which he had never possessed, yet it brought him a goodly number of patients.

WATERING TREES.—In very dry seasons it is often important to water newly transplanted trees; but the common mode is very objectionable. When the water is poured on the surface, the soil is apt to crack, and let the moisture below escape through the openings, so that its utility may often be very doubtful. Latterly I have applied the water differently. Dig a hole near the tree so as not to disturb its roots, and pour in a pailful. Then draw in the loose earth till the hole is nearly filled, and cover up completely, so that nothing wet is visible, and no cracks will ever appear. A tree treated in this manner will not need watering again for a week in the dryest weather.

IMPORTANT INVENTION IN WEAVING.—The Norwich (Eng.) Mercury states that Mr. Richard Shaw, son of a prominent manufacturer in Norwich, has succeeded in accomplishing an invention, which gives the power to weave by hand two perfect pieces of goods, however varied in color, complicated in pattern, or fine in texture, by the same throw of the shuttle, and extremely little increase of labor beyond what is required in weaving a single piece. Several attempts, have, we believe, been made to accomplish the same end, and the great difficulty experienced has been to obtain the selvages of the separate pieces.

SELF-GOVERNMENT.—In a discourse before the College of France, on the Constitution of the United States, Professor Laboulaye draws this contrast:—

"In the United States, self-government means the right of each man to govern himself; in France, the pretension of every man to govern others, or all the world. Liberty with us is the extension of the agency and control of the State, to everything and everybody; in America it is the restriction of that agency and control, within the narrowest limits."

VIGOROUS OLD AGE.—The venerable Dr. Nott, of Franklin, Conn., in the 97th year of his age, was questioned in regard to his habits.

"Have you eaten animal food, Dr. Nott?" "Yes, through life." "Have you drank tea and coffee?" "Yes, sir, moderately." "Well, how have you succeeded in attaining so green an old age?" "I have nothing to say, except that I have always lived temperately, rose early, worked hard, and kept my mind easy."

A gentleman asked a country clergyman for the use of his pulpit for a young divine, a relative of his. "I really do not know," said the clergyman, "how to refuse you; but if the young man should preach better than me, my congregation will be dissatisfied with me afterwards; and if he should preach worse, I don't think he's fit to preach at all."

A Canadian priest, who has recently been making a tour of the States estimates the number of Canadions now in the States, at not less than 200,000; and he supposes that unless measures are adopted to check this emigration, there will be, in ten years, double this number in the United States.

There are in the prisons at Naples, at present, no less than 40,000 political prtsoners; and the opinion is, that from the crowded state of the jails, the greater number of those persons will go mad become idiots, or die.

From Cape Causo, Nova Scotia, to Galway Bay, in Ireland, the distance is said to be 2000 miles. Assuming the speed of steam vessels to be 17 miles an hour, the ocean will thus be crossed in five days' time.

During the past year the collections of the Free Church of Scotland for its various objects of benevolence, amounted to one million and a half of dollars. Since the year 1843, the amount of collections has been ten millions and a half.

An old pastor, whose peculiarities of preaching were proverbial, and who was blessed with a temper of great value, was one day told by a parishioner that he did not like his sermons. "Well," said the old man, "I don't wonder at it; I don't like 'em myself."

The Indiana State Sentinel says that the wheat crop throughout the State of Indiana is now harvested, and is unusually good; little, if any, affected by the rust. The Corn crop is backward, but the recent rains may bring it out. There is scarcely any old Wheat or Corn left in the State.

The total amount of gold received from California, since the first arrival, is $20,017,120, of which $19,750,000 was received at the Mint, Philadelphia, and the remainder at New Orleans. Of this amount over 17,000,000 has been received in two months.

The Newfoundland Seal Fishery of this season has resulted in abundant returns. Seals to the value of $350,000 are now being cured at St. John alone, and the arrivals at the different ports are computed at $150,000.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.

Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.

Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.

ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery; 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

DERUYTER, July 8th, 1850.

Sabbath Tracts.

The American Sabbath Tract Society publishes the following tracts, which are for sale at its Depository, No. 9 Spruce st., N. Y., viz:

No. 1 Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public. 28 pp.

No. 2 Moral Nature and Scriptural Observance of the Sabbath. 52 pp.

No. 3 Authority for the Change of the Day of the Sabbath. 28 pp.

No. 4 The Sabbath and Lord's Day A History of their Observance in the Christian Church. 52 pp.

No. 5 A Christian Caveat to the Old and New Sabbatarians. 4 pp.

No. 6 Twenty Reasons for keeping holy, in each week, the Seventh Day instead of the First Day. 4 pp.

No. 7 Thirty-six Plain Questions, presenting the main points in the Controversy; A Dialogue between a Minister of the Gospel and a Sabbatarian; Counterfeit Coin. 8 pp.

No. 8 The Sabbath Controversy The True Issue. 4 pp.

No. 9 The Fourth Commandment False Exposition. 4 pp.

No. 10 The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed. 16 pp.

No. 11 Religious Liberty Endangered by Legislative Enactments. 16 pp.

No. 12 Misuse of the Term Sabbath. 8 pp.

No. 13 The Bible Sabbath. 24 pp.

The Society has also published the following works, to which attention is invited:

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pages.

The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet. First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.

An Appeal for the Restoration of the Lord's Sabbath, in an Address to the Baptists from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. 24 pp.

Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to GEORGE B. UTTER, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No 9 Spruce-st., New York.

Christian Psalmody—Pocket Edition.

IN compliance with requests from various quarters, the publisher of the New Hymn Book—Christian Psalmody—has issued a second edition, on lighter paper and with smaller margins, by which the bulk and weight of the books are reduced about one-third, rendering them much more convenient for carrying in the pocket. The price is also reduced 12½ cents per copy. Those wishing books, of either edition, can now be supplied. Price of the larger edition from 75 cents to $1 50, according to the style of binding. Price of the smaller edition from 62½ cents to $1 00. Orders should be addressed to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

THE AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

Several weeks ago we noticed the formation of a Bible Society, which proposed to circulate a faithful version of the Scriptures in English, as well as in the foreign tongues. The principles upon which it is founded meet our hearty approval. To give our readers the means of becoming better acquainted with this new organization, we copy its Constitution and Address.

Constitution.

ART. I. The Association under this Constitution shall be called THE AMERICAN BIBLE UNION.

ART. II. Its object shall be to procure and circulate the most faithful versions of the Sacred Scriptures in all languages throughout the world.

ART. III. It shall be composed of annual messengers, life members, and life directors. Annual messengers may be sent by churches, or any other coöperative bodies, on the payment of TEN DOLLARS into the treasury of the Union; and they shall have all the privileges and powers of membership under this Constitution for one year. Life members shall be constituted such by the payment of ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS, and in addition to the rights of membership, shall be entitled to seats in the Board, with all the privileges of managers, except that of voting. The managers shall have the power of appointing such persons as may have rendered essential services to the Union, either members for life or directors for life.

ART. IV. The Union shall meet annually to celebrate its Anniversary, and hear the Reports of its Board and Treasurer; elect its officers and managers for the ensuing year, and to transact any other business that may come before it, connected with its legitimate object. The annual meeting shall be held in the city of New York on the first Thursday of October, unless otherwise authorized by the Union.

ART. V. A special meeting of the Union may be called at any time by the President, at the request of the Board, provided that a notice of the same shall be published at least six weeks previous to the meeting.

ART. VI. The officers of the Union shall be a President, two or more Vice Presidents, a Corresponding Secretary, a Recording Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Auditor.

ART. VII. The Executive Board of the Union shall consist of twenty-four managers; together with the officers of the Union, (who shall be ex-officio members of the Board,) except the Vice Presidents. The managers shall be divided into three equal classes, of which, at the organization of the Union, the first shall be chosen for one year, the second for two years, and the third for three years; and at each subsequent election eight managers shall be chosen for the term of three years.

ART. VIII. The officers and managers shall be chosen at the annual meeting of the Union, by a majority of members present, and shall continue to discharge the duties assigned to them respectively, until superseded by a new election; provided that the Board have power to fill all vacancies, occasioned by the death or resignation of officers or managers, when the Union is not in session.

ART. IX. It shall be the duty of the President to preside in all the meetings of the Union and of the Board; and to perform such other duties as devolve upon him by the provisions of this Constitution. In case of the President's inability, or at his request, one of the Vice Presidents shall perform the duties of his office.

ART. X. It shall be the duty of the Corresponding Secretary to conduct the correspondence of the Union, under the direction of the Board; keeping a copy of his official correspondence, at all times accessible to the managers. He shall also prepare the annual Report, and perform such other duties as may be connected with his office by the provisions of this Constitution.

ART. XI. It shall be the duty of the Recording Secretary to keep a record of all the meetings of the Union, and the doings of the Board, accessible at all times to the managers; and to furnish the Corresponding Secretary with a copy of such as may be needful in making out the annual Beport. He shall perform any other writing, connected with his office, that may be required by the Board.

ART. XII. It shall be the duty of the Treasurer to keep the moneys of the Union, and disburse them only by the order of the Board, certified by the Recording Secretary. He shall report at every regular meeting of the Board on the state of the treasury, and present to the Union, at its annual meeting, a Report of all the expenditures of the year, duly certified according to the provisions of this Constitution. His account shall be at all times open to the Auditor.

ART. XIII. It shall be the duty of the Auditor to examine the Treasurer's account at the close of each financial year, and in case he finds it correct, to certify the same to the Union in connection with the Treasurer's annual Report. He shall also examine and certify the same, at any other time, at the the request of the Board.

ART. XIV. The Board shall meet monthly, or oftener if necessary, at such time and place as shall be designated by previous adjournment. And in case no such designation is made by the Board, the time and place of meeting shall be fixed by the President, with the concurrence of five managers. A special meeting of the Board may be called by the President at the request of six managers, provided a written notice of the same is sent to each manager at least three days previous to the meeting. A majority of all shall be requisite to constitute a quorum. The minutes of each meeting shall be signed by the President and Recording Secretary.

ART. XV. The Board shall have power to employ agents, translators, and colporteurs; to fix the compensation of all the salaried officers of the Union; and to take such measures as they shall deem necessary in making known the character and claims of the Union; in the collection of funds; in obtaining the most faithful versions of the Holy Scriptures in every language; and in distributing them throughout all lands—subject always to the provisions of this Constitution and to the special instructions of the Union.

ART. XVI. The Board shall report through the Corresponding Secretary, at the annual meeting; giving an account of their operations during the year, and embracing such other matters of interest as they may think proper and important to lay before the Union.

ART. XVII. The Board shall make such provision and arrangements for the Anniversary as they deem best calculated to promote the interest of the Union; and cause the same to be published at least one month previous to the meeting.

ART. XVIII. All moneys or other property given for specified objects shall be appropriated according to the will of the donors or to their lawful agents.

ART. XIX. The Union and the Board shall each have power to adopt such By-Laws, or Rules of Order, as may be necessary for the regulation of their own proceedings, provided they do not conflict with any part or principle of this Constitution.

ART. XX. This Constitution may be altered by two-thirds of the members present at any annual meeting of the Union; provided only that no alteration shall be made in the Second Article, which defines the object of the Union, without an unanimous vote, and one year's previous notice.

Address.

The American Bible Union, to all who are Fellow-laborers in the Gospel of Christ, greeting:

DEAR FRIENDS,—It is in view of our relations to each other as men, and of our common obligations as servants of the Most High God, that we presume to address you at this time. Believing that the openings of divine providence, and the claims of our holy religion, not only justify, but demand the organization of a new voluntary Association for the translation and circulation of the Holy Scriptures, we have undertaken to organize such an Association under the above title, in which we cordially desire and invite your counsel and coöperation. Allow us briefly to lay before you what is proposed, as the peculiar province and fundamental principle of this Union, from which both the occasion and the importance of its formation will be manifest, and in which you may unite with us, laboring together for the good of souls and the glory of God.

The object of the Association, in its ultimate and most comprehensive aims, is, "to procure and circulate the most faithful versions of the Sacred Scriptures in all languages throughout the world." But it should be understood, that the immediate occasion of its formation arises from the existence of acknowledged remediable defects in our common English version. For there are other Societies already formed to circulate the Scriptures in every language; and some of these adopt the principle that "aid for the translating, printing, or distributing of them in foreign languages, should be afforded to such versions only as are conformed, as nearly as possible, to the original text." If then we had no regard to the correction of errors and the removal of obscurities, which, it is admitted, exist in our common English version, we should see no sufficient reason to form another Bible Association. But there is no Socicty in this conntry whose acknowledged province and duty permit them "to attempt on their own part, or to procure from others, a revision of the commonly received English version of the Scriptures." It is therefore with special reference to the application of this principle, THE BIBLE FULLY AND FAITHFULLY TRANSLATED, to the English Scriptures in common with all other versions, that we feel called upon in the providence of God, and, we trust, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, to undertake with you this responsible, but glorious enterprise of giving to all nations the word of life, translated as purely and plainly as possible into their vernacular tongues.

The incalculable importance of a faithful and correct version of the Scriptures in English, is to be inferred, not merely from the many millions who now use this language, but from the great and mighty nations among whom it is annually progressing, and from the powerful influence which such a version must necessarily exert over the minds of those who may hereafter be engaged in preparing or correcting translations in other tongues.

We love the Bible. No language can express the intensity of our affection for the precious volume. But we consider a translation to be THE BIBLE only so far as it is a transcript of the mind of God as conveyed to the inspired Hebrew and Greek.

We love the English Bible. Aside from our regard for the innumerable interesting associations with which it is surrounded, we see in it as a translation, much that calls forth our unfeigned admiration. But we do not, and we cannot, love or admire its errors or its obscurities. Nor do we think that it would please God to perpetuate or advocate them. To deny their existence, would be to impugn the testimony of the best scholars and the wisest men who have expressed themselves on this subject, in Great Britain and America.

We believe that defects and faults can be removed without impairing the excellence of the version; and we feel assured that, just in degree as they are removed without an unnecessary interference with the general style, in that degree will the book be improved and be the more worthy of love and admiration.

The more nearly a version is brought to the true standard, the more accurately will it express the mind and will of God. And this is the real foundation of the sacredness of the Bible. ANY REGARD FOR IT FOUNDED UPON THE DEFECTS OR FAULTS OF TRANSLATION IS SUPERSTITION.

In the consideration of this subject, some have endeavored to poise the whole question of revision upon the retention or displacement of the word "baptize." But this does great injustice to our views and aims. For although we insist upon the observance of a uniform principle in the full and faithful translation of God's word, so as to express in plain English, without ambiguity or vagueness, the exact meaning of Baptizo, as well as of all other words relating to the Christian ordinances; yet this is but one of numerous errors, which, in our estimation, demand correction. And such are our views and principles in the prosecution of this work, that if there were no such word as "baptize" or Baptizo in the Scriptures, the necessity of revising our English version would appear to us no less real and imperative. Our earnest desire is, to do whatever lies in our power to secure uniform translations of the word of God throughout tho world, or, as Dr. Carson has expressed the idea, "univocal" translations—that is, translations which in every language shall utter the same voice—a voice clear, distinct, unequivocal.

God is one. His word is immutable. The translation of tnat word ought in every land to have the same meaning. The only question should be "What has God said?" and when this is ascertained, no pains should be spared to express the idea in terms simple, intelligible, and definite. This principle, every where faithfully observed, must eventually produce uniformity of translations throughout the world, and these will lead to uniformity of views and practice.

We expect to prosecute Bible operations in all lands, as God may open the door of His providence before us, and grant us the requisite means; and we earnestly request in this great work your sympathies, your prayers, and your contributions.

LAST DAYS OF REV. E. BICKERSTETH.

BY SIR CULLING E. EARDLEY.

At the end of the last year, (1849,) nothing was farther from the thoughts of Mr. Bickersteth's own family than the probability of his death. His other friends had for some time perceived, as it seemed to them, a diminution of his wonted mental and bodily energy; but his return home was always the signal to him to throw off care, his irrepressible natural buoyancy making him the liveliest and merriest of his domestic party.

At the beginning of the present year his children were impressed with the feeling that their father "was growing old very fast;" he was indisposed for his annual walks, and languid in his manner of speaking. He had an engagement, of some standing, to be at Birmingham, for tho Foreign Aid Society, on January 21st; having mistaken the day, he was obliged to leave home very suddenly, and the excitement of this probably hastened the development of the secret mischief. On the following Sunday, January 27th, he preached for the last time, having chosen the singularly appropriate text, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, receive the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." He preached twice, and took the evening lecture in the school-room, besides paying a pastoral visit to a sick friend in the village; but his languor made his family uneasy. A measure of drowsiness began to show itself, for which he accounted to himself by saying that he was growing "an indolent old man." He still denied that he was in any respect ill, nor would he consent that any steps should be taken to alter his engagements at Torquay, and other places in Devonshire, where he had pledged himself to assist the Alliance and other societies, in the latter end of February. On Tuesday, the 20th, he consented to see his medical attendant, who took at once a serious view of the case, and believed him to be threatened with another paralytic stroke, though he hoped that rest and the use of means would, under God's blessing, avert it. Mr. Bickersteth at once submitted to the suggested restriction, and to the relinquishment of his engagements in the west of England; the remaining part of the week was past in his easy chair. Two or three times in that week there were slight symptoms of forgetfulness and incoherence.

Early on Sunday morning, February 3d, he complained of pain in his head, but went down to his study before breakfast, as usual. Feeling anxious after half an hour, Mrs. Bickersteth went to him, and her alarm was great to find that he had sunk down in his easy chair, quite unconscious. The active remedies restored a measure of consciousness, and by degrees his mind became still more unclouded. He said: "What a comfort it is not to have to seek salvation now; I can enjoy a salvation found. I know in whom I have believed; the Gospel is a reality; I find it so now." He added: "Salvation sought is with fear and trembling; salvation found is always ready."

"I have so many mercies," he said, "I ought to be full of praise; that is a sweet direction, 'In every thing give thanks;' there is more divinity in that verse than in all the fathers. It is a bit of gold which enriches. They talk of the gold of California, but the gold of that land is good."

On the 4th of February, his medical brother, Mr. Robert Bickersteth, came from Liverpool, in answer to a telegraph message. His visit seemed to give Bickersteth new life. He walked down stairs, and had about an hour's conversation with him about the Gorham case. This was, however, but a temporary appearance of strength, derived from excitement. He sickened rapidly again in the evening.

On Tuesday, February 5th, he asked one of his family, "What have you been reading?" "The Bible." "That is best," he replied. "What different aspects it has under different experiences! Passages read in a sick room come with more power than ever they did before. What part are you reading?" "Because Thou hast been my helper, therefore under the shadow of Thy wings will I rejoice." "That," he said, "is past experience leading to future joy and future faith. 'The shadow of Thy wings;' beautiful expression! Under the mercy-seat, like being under the parent hen, so near to Him, nestling in all his warmth and love." When one of his children brought him some refreshment, he said: "I will give you a cup of living water for your cup of tea; it is this—I have been thinking of it a long time: But, beloved, keep yourself in the love of God, building up yourselves in your most holy faith, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.' These may be pleasant rooms to dwell in," (mentioning many rooms in the house,) "but the best room of all to keep in is the love of God; and what a prospect we have from it, 'looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life;' what boundless mansions then of glory are these; 'keep yourself in the love of God.'"

On Saturday evening, February 9th, when most of his family were with him, he said, though every word was an effort: "I have no confidence in any goodness or merit of my own, I place my whole trust in the Lord Jesus Christ; on that account I am accepted. I believe I have faithfully preached His gospel." Then taking the hand of one of his children, he said: "Renounce every confidence but in the death of the Lord Jesus;" and in a distinct but hurried whisper added: "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? Thanks be to God who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. I am persuaded that neither life, nor death, nor angels, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus."

On Sunday, February 10th, he expressed a wish that the following request should be made to his congregation: "The prayers of the congregation are desired for the rector of this parish, not that he may be raised up again from his illness, but that he may glorify God by fresh exercises of faith, patience, and resignation, and that, when his work is finished, he may depart hence, to which he has ever looked forward as the highest consummation of a faithful minister." He also said to one of his children: "The Lord bless thee, my child, and make thee a blessing. If we honor our Savior and His truth, He will honor us; if we rally round His truth, He will make us strong to support." From this time he became so rapidly and decidedly worse that these words were treasured up, in the belief that they would be his last.

Soon after this he had a serions relapse, and one of his first words afterward was, "I am a poor heap of mortality; but Jesus is on board, and all will be well." He very much enjoyed draughts of cold water, saying, "I connect it with spiritual blessings: 'He that drinketh of this water shall thrist again, but he that drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst, but it shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life;' the excessive coldness of the water, its rich abundance and refreshment, typifying just what the soul wants; nothing seems to me so to resemble the pure, refreshing waters of salvation as this."

To his medical attendant he said, "You have a troublesome office, but it is nearly over now;" and when assured the trouble and suffering had been his, he replied: "Nothing compared with my deservings. I find all my principles confirmed by my last hours. I have believed in the Lord Jesus Christ, and He supports me now. I commend him to you as an only and complete Savior. You have done all you could for my poor body; it is right that I should commend Christ to you."

He spoke to his son of the premillenial advent, and of his duty, since he believed in it, to preach it, adding that he had never regretted the view of it which God had given him. He said to one of his family, "You never saw a death-bed before, did you?" And when told that they could not yet give up the hope of his being raised again, he answered: "That is not in the least likely, nor is it at all desirable: I desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better. What should I be raised up for, except for my family, and God will be with them; if I am raised up, it will be to a body of much weakness and suffering; if I am taken, it is to glory; the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be hereafter."

His mind ran much upon poor people and school children, wishing his family to distribute copies of the "Sinner's Friend" and "Simeon Willhelm" among them; and being very anxious that a voice of warning should be sent to the careless souls in the parish of Watton.

To one of his family he said: "I have finished my work, I am longing for my rest; my children must not detain me by their prayers." And subsequently: "I hope the faith of my dear children will not be weakened, but confirmed, by their father's dying hours." When his medical brother from Liverpool came to see him again, he said to others: "I have been talking with my dear brother as to whether this will be dying illness; he tells me he does not say there is no hope. Now what he calls no hope I call the most hopeful of all things—to go and be with my Savior." He added: "It would be so for me, but I must cherish the hope of life for my family, and my parish, and the church of Christ. Well, the comfort is, that it does not depend on our wishes; it is God's will that orders all."

The distracted state of the Christian church, and the means of uniting it, continued to occupy his mind in illness as it had done in health. He said on one occasion: "I have been thinking of the Evangelical Alliance. I do not want my name to be much spoken of, but I want that we should love one another more." He did not care for the means, provided the object was effected; and the more Christ, and the less men, were spoken of while aiming at that object, the more he would be satisfied. May we, his survivors, ever breathe the same spirit.

To his sister he said: "The great thing in love is to seek each other's spiritual benefit; remember that, dear sister, for yourself and your children; seek to glorify Christ yourself, and seek that your children may glorify him also." She answered: "Your prayers for them, dear brother, are a great comfort to me." He replied: "No prayer is lost; all our prayers live; they are, as it were, indented around the throne of God, and when God looks round He sees the prayers of his children through the sweet incense of the Savior's merits."

At another time, he said: "We are none of us exempt from affliction; nor can we wonder that if our blessed Savior was made perfect through sufferings, we should share in them." He asked one of his children to read him the 130th Psalm—"Out of the depths I have cried," &c.—and when it was finished, after the last part—"with the Lord there is plenteous redemption, and he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities"—he said: "Beautiful it is; that is your father's only ground of confidence;" and afterward he said: "How truly this is called the body of humiliation. Well! it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body."

On Tuesday, February 19th, when one of his children said she feared he was uncomfortable, "No," he replied, "I have had a pleasant dream, I thought I was in the green pasture with all the flock of Christ wandering beside the still waters, and resting in those cold green pastures; was not that pleasant?" When asked if he saw Jesus there, "Yes," he replied, "that was the delight of it, to be with Him; and while He was there, every want was supplied. 'The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want;' He supplies the wants of the whole world by the atonement He has made by His flesh and His blood. That is a wonderful thought, 'My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed;' while we have that, we cannot want."

During the night, he said, "Such a multitude of thoughts come into my mind, passages of my past life! I have had a busy life, and in the multitude of the thoughts within me, Thy comforts refresh my soul."

The next morning when the post was come, his son-in-law told him that Dr. Merle d'Aubinge sent his affectionate Christian remembrances to him: "Tell him from me, my heart is with him and the dear foreign brethren, and I hope the Lord will bless them greatly in their efforts to spread His truth among the foreign churches."

On Friday, February 22d, he said to his son-in-law, "I have been thinking of that precious promise, 'Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid; ye believe in God, believe also in me;' to believe in Jesus is the great comfort; we must try to be better ministers—the good of the people is the great thing; all beside is a passing dream."

On the evening of Friday, the 22d, he sank into such a deep and heavy stupor that his family never expected consciousness again to return; but on Monday evening, February 25th, when one of his children was holding his hand, she saw his eye suddenly lighted up with mind, as if his spirit had returned from the borders of eternity. "Dearest father," she said, "is Jesus with you?" His lips tried to move, but in vain. "If He is will you press my hand?" He did so most distinctly, looking earnestly upon her. "Have you no fear?" Again he tried to speak, but unable, gave the desired recognition. She asked a third question, but the momentary gleam had passed away. The intervals of consciousness afterward returned more frequently. The next day he gave her this blessing, "The Lord bless thee, my child, with overflowing grace now and forever."

At seven o'clock on Thursday morning, February 28th, he became much worse; his breath hurried, and the pulse quicker than could be counted. He continued in this state the whole morning; except for the labored breath, his appearance was that of a tired infant falling gently and wearily asleep. He was not conscious toward those around him, but seemed evidently conscious toward God; for his eye was clear and raised upward, reminding them of the motto he had chosen for the year, "Looking unto Jesus," and recalling to their minds those beautiful lines:

> "How sweet the hour of closing day,
> When all is peaceful and serene,
> And the broad sun's retiring ray
> Sheds a mild lustre o'er the scene!
>
> "Such is the Christian's parting hour,
> So peacefully he sinks to rest;
> And faith rekindling all its power,
> Lights up the languor of his breast.
>
> "There is a radiance in his eye,
> A smile upon his wasted cheek,
> That seem to tell of glory nigh,
> In language that no tongue can speak."

At a little before five o'clock, the breath, which had been drawn at longer and longer intervals, suddenly ceased; afterward, however, with one sob, life returned; and this was repeated several times. A shade of deeper solemnity, as at the approach of death, passed over his face, which then kindled with an expression of radiant joy. The breath became noiseless as an infant's; the eye, fixed upward, grew brighter and brighter till it was glorious to look upon, and he seemed enjoying visible communion with that Savior whom having not seen he loved.

> "One gentle sigh his fetters broke,
> We scarce could say he 's gone,
> Before the willing spirit took
> Its mansion near the throne."

Light lingered in his eye even after the faint breath returned no more, and his family scarcely knew the moment when the spirit returned to the God who gave it. May our end be like his!

FAITH.

"IN DUE TIME YE SHALL REAP, IF YE FAINT NOT."

Ye who think the truth ye sow
Lost beneath the winter snow,
Doubt not, Time's unerring law
Yet shall bring the genial thaw.
God in Nature ye can trust,
Is the God of Mind less just?

Reap we not the mighty thought
Once by ancient sages taught?
Though it withered in the blight
Of the mediæval night.
Now the harvest we behold;
See! it bears a thousand fold.

Workers on the barren soil,
Yours may seem a thankless toil;
Sick at heart with hope deferred,
Listen to the cheering word;
Now the faithful sower grieves—
Soon he'll bind his golden sheaves.

If Great Wisdom have decreed
Man may labor, yet the seed
Never in this life shall grow,
Shall the sower cease to sow?
The fairest fruit may yet be borne
On the resurrection morn!

RICHES FOR CHILDREN.

The late Post Master General of the United States, Mr. Collamar, was once a very poor boy; so poor, that he could ill afford a pair of shoes, without which "the master would not allow him to come to school." Our boyhood, says the Gambier Observer, was passed in the village in which were spent his earlier professional years. We remember once being in his company, after he had been elevated to the supreme bench of his native State, and hearing him make, in substance, the following statements:—

"I remember [said he] the first time I visited Burlington as Judge of the Supreme Court; I had left it many years before, a poor boy. At the time I left, there were two families of special note for their standing and wealth. Each of them had a son about my own age. I was very poor and these two boys were very rich. During the long years of hard toil which passed before my return, I had almost forgotten them. They had long ago forgotten me.

"Approaching the Court House for the first time, with several gentlemen of the bench and bar, I noticed in the court house yard a large pile of furniture, about to be sold at vendue. The scenes of early boyhood with which I was now surrounded, prompted me to ask whose it was. I was told it belonged to Mr. A. [we use fictitious initials.] 'Mr. A.? I remember a family of that name, very wealthy—there was a son, too; can it be he?' I was told it was even so. He was the son of one of the families ~~already alluded to. He had inherited more~~ than I ever earned, and spent it all, and now his own family was reduced to real want, and his very furniture was that day to be sold for debt.

"I went into the court room saddened, yet almost glad that I was born poor. I was soon absorbed in the business before me. One of the first causes called, was that of B. vs. C.—a case that had come up on appeal, but which (if we remember rightly) originated in a low, drunken quarrel. Mr. B., thought I, that is a familiar name. Can it be? In short, I found that this was indeed the son in the other wealthy family referred to! I was overwhelmed alike with astonishment and thanksgiving—astonishment at the change in our relative standings, and thanksgiving that I was not born to inherit wealth without toil.

"Indeed, all my experience has taught me that those fathers provide best for their children, who leave them with the highest education, the purest morals, and the least money."

DID CHRIST TEACH UNIVERSAL SALVATION?

On one occasion, during our Saviour's ministry, the question was put to him—"Lord, are there few that be saved?" If Christ had been preaching the final salvation of all men, it was strange that such a question should have been proposed to him. Yet he manifested no surprise at it. He did not refer him to his past teachings to learn that all would be saved. Nor did Christ then advance the doctrine of universal salvation. Never had he a better opportunity. The question was directly to that point, "Are there FEW that be saved?" What did he answer? Did he say, "All men shall be saved?" Did he even say, "MANY—the great majority of mankind—shall be saved?" Did he say, "A just and benevolent man, God will never punish any after life?" His answer, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate"—agonize to enter heaven, by an incessant warfare with sin—"for MANY I say unto you, shall seek to enter in and shall not be able."

Whoever may preach universal salvation, and upon whatever authority, certain it is that Christ preached no such doctrine.

LIFE IN GOOD BOOKS.

Good books give immortality to to the best thoughts of good men. "They are not absolutely dead things," says Milton, "but do contain a potency of life in them to be as active as the soul was, whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve, as in a vial, the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. A good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life." They garner up the wisdom and piety of the generation, and preserve it for after generations. They form a spiritual telegraph between the past and the present, along whose wires the sanctified thoughts and emotions of Isaiah, and Paul, and Baxter, and Edwards, may speed to our hearts, to quicken our faith and fire our zeal. Without them, the scholar and the divine are like the mechanic without his tools; with them the mechanic may become the scholar and the divine. They constitute the great storehouse of truth for the world.

THOS. B. STILLMAN, Rec. Sec.

The Committees on Education, appointed by the General Conference and the several Associations, are requested to meet at Alfred during the Anniversary season.
By request of several Members.

THE MISSION OF SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

It is unquestionably the duty of Seventh-day Baptists, in common with those of all other denominations who have "tasted that the Lord is gracious," to urge on the universal proclamation of Christ crucified. This doctrine is the world's only hope; the only power that can raise up fallen man to communion with his Maker. It would be unworthy of us, as disciples of Christ, to be forever discussing those subjects which distinguish us from other friends of the Redeemer. Such a course would indicate too truly, that our supposed zeal for the institutions of heaven was nothing more than the spirit of sectarianism. It is very easy to err on this point. It is easier to be controversialists than to enter into the spirituality of religion. It is easier to perform that service which calls merely for the exercise of the intellect, than it is to do that which indicates compassion for the souls of men. And when we have utterly lost all spirituality, it is still easy to keep up a flaming zeal for the shibboleth of our party; in the heat of which we often delude ourselves into the notion that we are "very jealous for the Lord of Hosts." But it ought not to be overlooked, that our denominational peculiarities become valuable only in proportion as they serve to make us more earnest in efforts to win souls to Christ. What is the Sabbath worth, if it does not by its opportunities warm us to ardor in the cause of our Redeemer?

Nevertheless, these peculiarities which divide us from other orders, are not to be lightly surrendered. If we are Sabbatarians, it is because some important principle is involved; and the world's welfare may depend, in part, upon knowing what that principle is. If we have received it from God, it is our duty to set it before men; for God gives no light that it may be kept under a bushel. Even if it is a very small light, it must nevertheless be placed on a candlestick. If it is not from God, if we have received it from some other source, it is still our duty to hold it up, that it may be put to the test by those who are instructed in the way of the Lord more perfectly, and that we may have an opportunity of casting off our error.

In the absence of any conviction that our distinguishing sentiment is an erroneous one, we maintain that we have much to do in bringing the world to the observance of God's holy Sabbath. Without a Sabbath, the gospel cannot be propagated in the earth; and if men are brought to keep one, it must be through the conviction that God requires it. That they can be made to believe that He requires them to keep the first day of the week, when the law of the Sabbath so plainly specifies the seventh, is so improbable that it might as well be given up as a forlorn hope. What has been accomplished in this line after centuries of trial? Mankind are only becoming farther and farther removed from such a belief, and are fast coming to the doctrine of no Sabbath at all. It is time that they were approached with the requisition to keep that day which God has expressly declared to be "holy." Conscience cannot be generally created with regard to any other.

But the doctine of the Sabbath involves the true doctrine of the divine law. The question between us and our opposing brethren respects not merely the difference of a day, but it respects the integrity of God's law. It is a question as to what is God's law, and what is not—what portion of the Old Testament Scriptures constitutes the code of moral duty, and what is of a different character—whether the law is at all binding upon Christians as a rule of duty, or whether it is completely set aside, and some new rule substituted—whether man is a sinner by the same law that Adam was, or whether by some new and entirely different law. These are the questions that unavoidably come up in the course of the Sabbath controversy, and they are questions which have a most important bearing upon the whole system of revealed religion. They are questions which, though they have been discussed in view of other subjects, have yet to be discussed again in all the light which the Sabbath question sheds upon them. Some of our readers will scarcely credit it, (but it is a fact,) that many, who long ago professed to have exploded the antinomian doctrine, are found going back to it when the Sabbath controversy presses them. Rather than yield to the claims of the fourth commandment, they will embrace a most pernicious error. Many, many such cases have we known, and they are repeatedly occurring.

In these respects the mission of Seventh-day Baptists is far from being an insignificant one. On the contrary, it is one of the most important ever devolved upon a people since the Reformation. It is one among the number of those which have been found necessary to perfect the Reformation.

But are we truly awake to our responsibilities? Do we underetand the position which we occupy? What a meek, pious, praying, self-sacrificing, benevolent people ought we to be, in order to fulfill our destiny! What reformation there ought to be at home, even among ourselves! What awakenings among the ministry, what earnest labors, what sufferings, what cultivation of the martyr spirit! O that the Most High would breathe into us all the spirit of life!

CHRISTIANITY AMONG THE ESQUIMAUX.

The Sailor's Magazine for August furnishes an account, copied from a Moravian paper at Labrador, of the wreck of the Graham in Hudson's Bay, and the dangerous excursion of a portion of the crew to the Moravian Mission Station among the Esquimaux, on that dreary coast. The humanizing influence of the gospel on savage life, is well illustrated by the following:—

"The account says, after the loss of a part of the company, the rest of the crew still pushed on their way, a distance of eight hundred miles, amid extreme privation, and with the loss of two men, until they approached one of the outermost islands in the Bay of Okkak, called Igloksoaktalik, where two Esquimaux approached them very cautiously in their kayaks. The sight of these strangers at first inspired alarm; but on the captain assuring his companions that their countenances were not like those of the northern savages, they ventured to approach. As soon as the Christian Esquimaux perceived the distressed condition of the people in the boat, they immediately gave them a large cod which they had caught, and invited them on shore, where four Esquimaux families had their temporary dwellings. The poor sufferers, who had not the remotest idea of the existence of a mission on this coast, and who were still haunted with the apprehension of being plundered, or even murdered, by the natives, did not, however, venture immediately to accept the invitation; but when at length the few who were able to walk proceeded on shore—when they heard the melodious voices of the women chanting a hymn of praise to God for their deliverance—when they afterwards saw some of them occupied in washing their clothes, and others preparing a meal of fish and seal's flesh for their refreshment—their hardy spirits were overcome, and they burst into tears. They experienced the hospitalities of the missionaries for some weeks, after which they were brought by the 'Harmony' to England, where they arrived in October last."

ARREST FOR AIDING SLAVES.

Wm. L. Chaplin, Esq., formerly editor of the Albany Patriot, has been arested, and is now in jail at Washington, on the charge of aiding the escape of two slaves of Hon. Mr. Toombs, and two of Hon. Mr. Stephens, of Georgia. It seems that the slaves had been missing for several days, and suspicion fixed on Mr. Chaplin as in some way connected with their disappearance. On Thursday night last, Aug. 8, a carriage was seen leaving the suburbs of Washington, which was followed by several officers and slave-catchers until they concluded that their suspicions were well founded, and then one of the party "chocked" with a fence-rail the wheels, while another simultaneously caught the horses' heads.

Pistols and bowie-knives at once came into requisition, as the riddled condition of the carriage in which Chaplin and the slaves are alledged to have been found shows. One of the slaves is said to be severely wounded, though he escaped. Another was wounded in the back. One of the officers had his arm grazed with a bullet. Chaplin is unhurt. He is described as having fought bravely till the last, it requiring four or five athletic men to subdue and tie him. He rallied the slaves to fight to the death. The officers charge him with having fired the first shot. This statement of course must be taken with allowance. The affair has created a good deal of excitement at Washington, and an attempt has been made to connect Mr. Chaplin's name with the National Era newspaper.

The foregoing was prepared for our last week's paper, but omitted through an oversight. The accounts which have since come to hand give a somewhat different coloring to the affair. Two or three of those at first represented as "officers," are now said to be as slave-catchers, who were not officially but personally interested in the matter. It is also said that Chaplin not only did not fire the first shot, and that he never fired at all, but that the shooting, on the part of the assailed, was done by the slaves, there being much less of it on their part than on the part of the assailants. Chaplin had not time to use a pistol. Simultaneously with the "chocking" of the wheels and seizing of the horses, he was stricken a heavy blow, which Butts (one of the slave-dealers or catchers) confesses, or rather boasts, that he inflicted. The next moment he found himself on the ground, throttled and belabored by two or three of these men, in the most ferociously brutal manner—so much so that he had good reason to apprehend that their intent was murder outright! It is believed that they would have murdered him if he had not appealed to Capt. Goddard, who interfered. Mr. Chaplin is a "peace" man, and therefore the story of the resort to violence on his part has done him great injustice.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, who signs himself "A Southerner," says:—

It is stated in the Union, I see, that Chaplin "enticed" the slaves in question, whereas it will turn out, that he did not see them untill they got into his carriage, (if indeed he could be said to have seen them at all such a dark night as that on which this affair occurred,) and that he had no communication with them, and had no knowledge that they were the slaves of anybody. This I understand to be his position. I do not believe that in one instance in a hundred, where slaves have escaped, there has been any enticement at all, on the part of the aider. The desire to escape will sufficiently account, in most cases, for the escape of slaves. But, where enticement has been resorted to, it would be seen if the circumstances were revealed, that the party furnishing facilities of escape had no agency in the production of the disposition for escape. This is generally confined to domestic associates—perhaps kinsmen who are already in the enjoyment of liberty.

The latest notice of the affair is from the Nat. Intelligencer, which says that "a requisition from Gov. Thomas, directing the delivery of Chaplin, charged with an assault with intent to kill Mr Richard Butt and Mr. Wm. Smithin, in Montgomery County, was placed on Wednesday in the hands of officer Handy. We learn, however, that Chaplin will have first to be tried in our Criminal Court for abducting Allen and Garland, the two runaway slaves found in Chaplin's carriage on the night of the 8th inst."

SABBATH SCHOOLS—THEIR UTILITY—No. 2.

It is obvious, that religious instruction should be imparted to all. In nature, the mind is encaged until by education it gains its liberty. And if religiously educated, its taste is refined. Though from society and the fashions of the age the religiously educated may have lived secluded, yet there is a refinement that shows they have passed the hand of the polisher, and possess what religion alone can give. Religious education exalts the faculties of the soul, and makes them strong and buoyant, soaring above those trifles that satisfy only the vulgar. The narrow field of time they have traversed by faith, and they find there no resting place; they have looked into eternity, with its broad domain; it has become to them a subject of interest, and on its glories and its realities they delight to dwell. Man has been made to occupy a nobler sphere than this. By sin he has been debased, and by the discipline of religious culture he is prepared for that exalted station for which he was designed in his original creation.

Religious Education secures enjoyment. Happiness is the pursuit of all men, and generally, while pursuing sin, the pleasure is in the pursuit, not in the possession of the object. Not so with those whose minds have been properly stored with religious knowledge. It begets a taste for reading. A small library of choice books is collected, and the time spent in the perusal of these books is the happiest time, and the untold benefit derived remains. Such persons are not associating with the vicious and the profane, and spending their time at the gambling house and grog shop; books and the family constitute the society they most enjoy. And when necessity requires that they should leave them to attend to ordinary business, they are in haste again to return. The society of such persons is desirable. A Christian spirit always begets sociability and cheerfulness; hence, in the conversation of such there is always something that dispels gloom, and we always feel benefited by being in such a person's society. Despondency and gloom are often the fruits of ignorance and unbelief. In the Bible we learn that man was made for society—not to be a blank—not to spread over society a cloud of darkness—but to be a burning light. And what could we desire more than to be one of that favored number, lighted up by God's Spirit? The place that such occupy is a place much to be desired; but it can only be obtained by being properly taught in the things of God.

A Sabbath School in a neighborhood serves not only as a beacon light, but exerts a salutary influence all around. The little girls and boys become living ministers; the truths they learn are as swords and spears to pierce the hearts of the unconverted. The Sabbath day, once the most dreaded of the seven, becomes a day of enjoyment to them, and the Bible has become their frequent companion. Their former habits of sin look odious, and many of their former associates have been forsaken. It is now their pleasure to go to the house of God. What has made this change? In a great many instances it may be attributed to the Sabbath School.

A Sabbath School is encouraging to the church. Ignorance is the originating cause of most if not all of the difficulties with which the church has been afflicted. Under this she groans, being burdened; but we are looking for a brighter and a better day to come; and that will be when those who are pupils in our Sabbath Schools become the ministers, deacons, and leading members of the visible church, being a generation better educated than we their predecessors have been.

A Sabbath School is encouraging to the minister. An intelligent congregation will appreciate the labors of a good man among them. If he reproves in justice, they give heed to it. If he instructs, they are benefited. With him they are fellow laborers. He is grieved when he meets with and sees the evil consequences of ignorance as militating against the cause. Such a people are too wise to make any important change in their domestic arrangements, either in location or business, where the cause of God and the honor of the church is involved, without consulting their pastor and the church. One of the great lessons of religious instruction is to learn that the interest of others is identified with our own; and for any to indulge the thought that it is their own business only, is a sad mistake. We are to seek "not our own but another's welfare." Such a church we hope to see. It would be a model church.

Children of the Sabbath Schools, you are living in a favored age, when the mists of ignorance and superstition are rapidly passing away. This being our motto, "The Bible is the religion of Protestants," we go forth into the vineyard of the Lord, desirous to teach the world the truths of this precious book, that the children may become wise unto salvation, furnished to every good work. Let the minister, the teacher, and the parent, take a suitable interest in the Sabbath School, that it may become what it should be—a nursery for the church of God.

NOTICE.

The Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society gives notice, that he will not be able to visit the churches of the Central and Western Associations previous to the Anniversaries in Alfred, so much of his time being occupied in the preparation of the Annual Report. As it will contribute greatly to the interest of the meeting to have the money for the Shanghai Chapel all made up by that time, he suggests that the pastors of the several churches make an effort, each one within his own circle, and that the money, or pledges for the same, be forwarded by the delegates who may attend. Perhaps the expense of the agency may be entirely avoided in this way. One thousand dollars yet remain to be made up.

Purgatorial Masses.—The Dublin Gazette informs us that Anne Bayley has bequeathed to sundry Roman Catholic institutions and priests sums amounting in all to £2,775, amongst which are no less than ten sums of £20 each for ten different priests "for masses to be offered up by them respectively for the repose of the soul of said testatrix." This lady was resolved to have her £200 worth of masses said as speedily as possible, in order that she might the sooner escape the flames of purgatory. At 2s. 6d. a mass, each priest will have to offer "the body, blood, soul, and divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ" 160 times, in order that the requisite number may be made up. Each priest will of course have to work three or four months, so as to deliver the good, charitable lady out of her horrible place of punishment as soon as possible.

Interesting Church Statistics.—On Sunday morning, August 4, Rev. Gardner Spring, pastor of the Presbyterian church in New York known as the Brick Church, preached his fortieth anniversary discourse, in which he made some interesting statements relative to his congregation. The numbers added to the communion of the church during the forty years of Dr. Spring's ministry have been 2,092; the numbers baptized, 1,361; the number of couples married by the pastor 875. Of the number of deaths no authentic record has been kept until within a late period. The number of sermons preached by the pastor has been 6,000; of which above 4,000 were written discourses, while in the intervals of his other labors, he has found time for the publication of eleven octavo volumes. Of his own family, eleven children, including the dead and the living, are enrolled as members of the Church. As regards the length of ministerial service, Dr. Spring is now the oldest pastor in New York

Fruit of Affliction.—Not long ago the Oglethorp University, in Georgia, was made a place of mourning by the death from lightning of two of its students. The following paragraph from the Southern Presbyterian shows that this severe chastisement is working the peaceable fruit of righteousness:—

"Several of the students are indulging a hope that they have passed from death unto life, and a considerable number more are deeply serious. A daily prayer-meeting, for an hour after breakfast, has been held by the Faculty and students together for some weeks past, which is attended with deep solemnity by nearly all the members of the College, and great hopes are entertained that God has rich blessings yet to bestow."

A Preacher of the Amistad Negroes.—Those who saw the Amistad Africans in this country ten years since, and witnessed their examination in reading, arithmetic, speaking, &c., will never forget the intelligent and interesting youth, then eighteen, who was called Kin-na. Many prayers were offered up on his behalf, and many wishes cherished that he would become a Christian, and be a herald of salvation in his native land. After his return to Africa, he plunged for a while into the heathenish customs of that country, but was subsequently converted, and is now a preacher of the gospel in connection with the Mendi Mission.

Baptists in Africa.—A Mr. Brooks, in writing from Sierra Leone, gives the following information concerning some Baptist churches he found there:—

"I attended meeting this forenoon at a Baptist church, and learned from one of the congregation that they had never had a missionary; that their society originated in some colored emigrants from America; that they had two churches and two houses of worship, and that they greatly needed schools and teachers, of which they were entirely destitute. They appered to be very ignorant of the doctrines of the Scriptures, yet were devoted and anxious to learn. They present a fine field for a good Baptist missionary."

Wedding at the Five Points.—The success of the Mission at the Five Points is most decided. The attendance at the meetings and Sunday Schools last Sunday was very good; in the evening the exercises became exceedingly interesting. Several addresses were made with good effect by the pastor and others; several signed the pledge at the close of the meeting, which wound up with a wedding between two of the residents. The interesting ceremony was performed by Rev. Mr. Pease, in the presence of several invited guests.

The Wisconsin Liquor Law.—The Iowa correspondent of the Independent furnishes the following refreshing paragraph. The advocates of temperance need occasionally the stimulus afforded by such a fact as this, to cheer them in their trying enterprise. The writer says:

"The liquor law of Wisconsin is working wonders. It requires every retailer of ardent spirits to give bonds to make good any damage which may be proved to have resulted from the traffic. It has been enforced in some cases. At Southport, some time since, a Mrs. Keyser recovered $100 of one Heath, the whole amount of damages claimed, for furnishing intoxicating liquor to her husband. The effect has been to diminish vastly, and in some places to abolish, the sale of ardent spirits. In Lancaster, the shire town of the adjoining county of Grant, one of the most populous in the State, I am told there is not now a retailer of liquor to be found. In Plattville, a large village in the same county, I believe there is but one. A man under the influence of intoxicating drinks recently committed suicide there, and, I understand, efforts are being made to compel the man who furnished it to pay all the funeral expenses. In the last Home Missionary is an interesting account of a severe and successful struggle to enforce the law in one town. Why is not the principle of this law correct, and if universally adopted would it not ultimately put a stop to the sale of ardent spirits? The West may yet set an axample of salutary legislation which the East may well imitate."

Punishment of Imposture.—A case of some importance was definitively judged on the 15th, of June at Casale, Piedmont. It appears that a priest, named Don Grignachi, had succeeded in secretly persuading some females and priests that he was either Jesus Christ himself or directly inspired by him. This doctrine used to be imparted to the neophites as a secred mystery, and demonstrated by visions and miracles. The matter having at last called the attention of the authorities, Don Grignaschi was prosecuted, together with his dupes or accomplices, on the counts of swindling and immorality. An able defense was made by Advocate Brofferio, the well-known Deputy, who founded his arguments on the facts that Grignaschi did not teach his doctrines publicly; that he did not attack religion, since his assertions were founded upon it; and that his principles were not contrary to those of the Church, since they were the same as those of the Millenary and St. Simonian sects, which had been professed by Bishops and Saints, and never before condemned by the church. Notwithstanding this defense, Don Grignaschi was condemned to ten years, exile; five priests accused of complicity, to exile and imprisonment, varying from eighteen months to three years; two woman to two years' imprisonment, and a notary and another person to a month's imprisonment. Two other persons were acquitted.

Hope for China.—Rev. Mr. Bridgman writes to the Missionary Herald from Shanghai, and alludes to changes and prospects in China in hopeful language. He says:

More than twenty years have now passed since the first messengers from the churches in America reached the land of Sinim. When "the beloved Abeel" and myself arrived here, there was, in all this wide field, only one Protestant missionary, and only limited access to the people at one port. To propagate Christianity, on the part of the foreigner, and to embrace and practice it, on the part of the native, was alike, in either case, a capital crime. In these twenty years what changes have we seen! Morrison and Abeel have gone to their rest; and many others, who came subsequently to China, are also gone; yet nearly one hundred laborers, men and women, preachers and teachers of Jehovah's blessed gospel, are now in the field; and we have free access to millions of the people. The first fruits of a great and glorious harvest begin to appear. All this is a token for good. He who has done so much will do still more. All the inhabitants of Sinim shall come to the Lord, even to Jesus our Savior.

The Manner of Mungo Park's Death.—The Rev. George Chapman, at Kumasi, met with an old Moor, from the interior, who declared that he had been at the scene of Mungo Park's death, and described it thus:

"Mr. Park was making his way down the Niger in his boat, and parties of the natives running along the banks watching their progress. They were approaching very dangerous shallows, and the natives cried out several times to warn them; but they were not understood, and at last, fearing the boat would perish, several rushed into the water to save them. This was mistaken for a hostile movement; they were fired on, and some killed or wounded; in return for which they murdered the whole party, and rifled their boat and persons."

Flayed Alive.—A statement was copied into the newspapers, that a man belonging to a party bound for California, having declared that he would shoot the first Indian that he met, deliberately shot a Squaw, and, being taken by a party of Indians, was skinned alive. The report was contaradicted. We learn, however, that a letter has been received from one of the party to which the man belonged, which was a company bound to California overland, giving the details of his crime and its punishment in the manner stated. Soon after his cold blooded murder of the Squaw, the party, about twenty in number, was surrounded by three hundred Indians, and threatened with instant death unless they disclosed the perpetrator of the atrocious deed. After consulting together, they determined to point out the murderer, who was at once seized by the Indians, bound up to a stake, and his skin peeled from him even to his toes. The operation lasted two hours, and the victim survived two hours after it. The company, among whom was his own brother, were compelled to form a ring around the stake and witness the terible torment of the wretched man. Four or five of the party, and among them the one who called down upon himself such a terrible punishment, went from Troy in Maine.

Sailing of Missionaries.—Rev. William and Mrs. A. Sanderson Ashmare, missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union to the Chinese of Siam, sailed on Second-day last in the ship Channing, Capt. Johnson, for Hong Kong. Rev. E. Bannister and family, Rev. S. D. Simonds and wife, Rev. F S. Hoyt and wife, Rev. M. C. Briggs, and Rev. John Flinn, will sail in the Cherokee, on the 13th of September, for the Methodist Missions in California.

Arrears of Ministers.—The Episcopal Convention of Pennsylvania are in the habit of reporting for their annual statistics, the amount in which each church is in arrears for the salary of its minister; and it is worthy of notice, that the aggregate arrears thus reported, is, as might be expected, exceedingly small.

New Religious Sect.—A new religious sect has arisen in Persia, in consequence of the preachings of a man named Bab, who has written a new book to take the place of the Koran. He is said to have already made several thousand proselytes; and eighteen of these Babees, as his followers are called, have been publicly beheaded by order of the Shah.

Missionaries Arrived.—Rev. A. H. Fletcher, lady, and three children, Missionaries, late from Ceylon, arrived at New York on the 15th inst., in the packet ship American Congress from London. Mr. F. and family were from Boston.

Cassius M. Clay addressed an audience of 4,000 citizens of Brown County, Ohio, near Ripley, on the 1st inst., being the Anniversary of West India emancipation. The meeting was attended by men of all parties. Mr. Clay spoke for two hours, and when he concluded, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we will oppose the propagandism of Slavery at all times—at all places—by all honorable means—against all odds—without compromise—and to the last extremity."

Duties of Postmasters.—A case of gross carelessness and unjustice on the part of a distant Postmaster, who suffered a copy of our paper to come for years to his office, after its discontinuance by a subscriber, induced us to inquire of the Postmaster General whither there was any right or wrong on this subject, as recognized by the Department. A prompt answer informed us that an imperative law required every Postmaster to give immediate notice to a publisher when his paper is not taken out of his office, and also to frank his letter giving such notice. We may state, as an indication of the feeling in the Department on this subject, that the Postmaster in the case referred to was promptly required to show cause why he should not be removed. [N. Y. Evangelist.

The Industrial Exhibition of 1851.—Gov. Fish, in compliance with the request of the Central Committee of the National Institute at Washington, has appointed a State Committee for New York, to act for such of our citizens as may desire to forward articles to London. The gentlemen named are:—Hon. Luther Bradish, New York; Ezra P. Prentice, Albany; Hon. Jas. Tallmadge, New York; Adoniram Chandler, do.; B. P. Johnson, Albany; Anthony Van Bergen, Coxsackie; William Buel, Rochester; and Chas. Henry Hall, New York. The State Agricultural Society has appropriated $400 as prizes to such members of that Society as may be competitors—the decision to be made by the Executive Committee.

The Dead of 1850.—The list of persons of note who have deceased during the first half of the present year embraces many distinguished names. We notice some of them: John C. Calhoun, Franklin H. Elmore, Sargeant S. Prentiss, Daniel P. King, Matthew L. Davis, Jacob Hays, Gen. Zachary Taylor, Brig. Gen. Mason, Com. Jones, J. Newland Maffit, Adam Ramage, S. Margaret Fuller, Emperor of China, Sir Robert Peel, Duke of Cambridge, President Boyer. [Alb. Register.

Paul Kean has petitioned the Canadian Legislature for aid to enable him to complete and publish a very valuable work on Northern and Western America. He represents that he has spent five or six years in traversing the region of country to which his labors refer, having in that time made more than 500 sketches of the scenery, inhabitants, Indian chiefs, costumes, curiosities, &c. &c. accompanied with notes of explanation.

Among the recent arrivals in this city, was a widow lady named Mrs. Bowden who was the proprietor of a hotel in the town of Urlingford, Kilkenny, during the revolt of 1848. During the flight of Smith O'Brien, she harbored him in her house, and twice prevented his capture, using all the means in her hands to relieve him. Had it not been for the interference of others, she would have succeeded in effecting his escape.

Rev. Mr. Raymond, Pastor of the Abyssinian (colored) Baptist Church in Anthony st., N. Y., has been blind for two or three years, and notwithstanding his infirmity he continues to officiate from week to week. His church numbers nearly four hundred members.

The number of deaths in New York during the week ending August 10, was 451, of which 71 were men, 70 women, 176 boys, and 134 girls. No cases of cholera, but 91 cases of cholera infantum, 45 of dysentery, and 29 of diarrhœa. The deaths in the corresponding week last year were 1,011.

The Hempstead (L. I.) Inquirer publishes a list of the members of the congregation of Rev. Z. Greene, in Suffolk county, N. Y., who are over 70 years old. It includes the names of five persons over 100, eighteen over 90, fifty-one over 80, and forty-five over 70 years of age.

The Fort Smith Herald says that for every hundred persons who have left Arkansas for California, a thousand persons have come in to fill up the vacuum, and that the emigration to that State, the past season, has been immense.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, Aug. 12.

After disposing of morning business, the Senate took up the Compromise Bill, which was, after various attempts to push it off, ordered to be engrossed, by a vote of 33 to 19. The question then coming up on its passage, Mr. Davis, of Miss., rose to make a speech against time, when the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

An ineffectual attempt was made to introduce a resolution for the adjournment of Congress on the second Monday of September.

The Appropriation Bill then came up, and furnished the occasion for several speeches, which were by no means confined to the subject under discussion. A resolution was adopted closing debate upon this bill on Sixth-day.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, Aug. 13.

The bill distributing the public lands among the States in which they lie for the use of actual settlers thereon, was taken up, and Mr. Walker made a speech in its support, after which it was postponed until Monday.

The California Bill was then taken up, and after remarks by several Senators, it was passed—yeas 34, nays 18.

The Bill establishing a Territorial Government for New Mexico was made the special order for to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A long time was spent in arguing about a change in the rules intended to prevent useless talk. Then the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was taken up, and Mr. Sedden reviewed the President's recent Message in relation to New Mexico.

IN SENATE. FOURTH DAY, Aug. 14.

An extended debate arose on the reception of the Protest of ten Southern Senators, against the passage of the California Bill. Messrs Davis and Winthrop of Mass., and Mr. Baldwin, of Conn., opposed the entering of the document on the journal as an unnecessary thing and a bad precedent, while Messrs. Shields and Cass favored it; finally the subject was laid over.

Then the bill organizing New Mexico was taken up, and Mr. Foote moved to amend, that when New Mexico comes to be admitted as a State, it shall be either with or without slavery, as her Constitution may provide. Mr. Chase then moved to add the Jefferson Proviso against Slavery, which was lost by 20 yeas to 25 nays. Finally, the bill was reported and ordered to be engrossed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The report allowing five minutes after debate is closed to the Member moving an amendment and five to one other Member in reply and no more talking on that amendment, was adopted, 112 to 47, ultra Southern Members voting Nay.

Then the Appropriation Bills were taken up, and speeches made on slavery and things in general.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, Aug. 15.

The Senate made the Fugitive Slave Bill the special order for Second-day next; laid on the table the question of receiving the Southern Protest against the admission of California; passed the New Mexican Territorial Bill, and adjourned to Second-day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House took up the Appropriation Bill. Mr. Duer, of New York, made the first speech, defending the President's Message and responding to Messrs. Seddon, Toombs, and Stephens. Then Messrs. McLane, Venable, and Ashe freed their minds touching the Boundary, the President, Texas, New Mexico, Southern Rights, &c. An evening session was held, which lasted from 7 till 10 o'clock, in the course of which Messrs. Sackett, Marshall, and McKissock gave their views of the Texas Boundary and kindred questions.

SIXTH-DAY, August 16.

The Senate was not in session.

The House spent the whole day in Committee upon the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill. Most of the time was occupied in making comments upon and proposing amendments to the first section, which provides that the highest charge of a Member of Congress for coming to and returning from Washington at any one session hereafter shall be $1,000 if he represents a District this side of the Rocky Mountains, and $2,000 if he come from Oregon, Utah, or California, and that no constructive mileage shall be paid or allowed henceforth. The House adjourned without making any amendments or taking any decisive vote.

SABBATH, August 17.

No session of the Senate.

The House had under consideration again the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill. After talking a long while to no purpose on the subject of mileage, attention was turned to books, and an amendment proposed appropriating $80,000 to purchase books for members. Without disposing of the subject, the House adjourned.

Melancholy Accident—Thirteen Lives Lost.

On Fifth-day afternoon last, a melancholy accident occurred at Lynnfield, Mass., by which thirteen lives were lost. It seems that a large party, mostly connected with the First Christian Church in Lynn, went out on a pleasure excursion. After having taken their dinner in pic-nic style, in the beautiful grove which skirts the Lake, they obtained a paddle boat and amused themselves by cruising around the shores and the island in the pond. Several different companies of the party had made excursions in it with safety, but the last company met with a most terrible catastrophe. Twenty-five persons were on board the boat when it left the shore. As they approached the island, the paddle threw some water on one side the deck; the company then passed to the other side; this caused that side to be wet; they then crossed back again. This was done several times. By this sudden change of position, they set the boat rocking. Some of the party becoming frightened, got up on the seats; this made the boat dip more. They now became panic-stricken, and as one side went down into the water some of the passengers sprung upon the wheel-house, which was in the center of the boat, when, unfortunately, the boat was completely capsized bottom up. Mr. Jonathan Tarbox succeeded in getting on the bottom of the boat, and although he could not swim, he succeeded in saving a number of lives. A man and boy who could swim, stripped themselves and swam to the shore. Although the boat was near the shore, in a quiet cove of the island, thirteen lives were lost!

The following are the names of those lost: Robert Shurtliff and wife, (recently married, and on a visit to friends in Lynn;) they belonged to Medway. Mrs. Mary Howard and daughter Mary Jane; the mother and child were taken from the water clasped in each other's arms. Miss Catharine L. Adams, 19, belonging to Boston; Miss A. Johnson, of Lynn; Miss Eliza Young, of Marblehead; Mrs. Mehittable Alley, of Lynn, 58; 2 children of Mr. John J. Garland, of Lynn, aged 6 and 2 years; two daughters of Mr. Ephraim Brown, of Lynn; Miss Maria Cheever, of Lynn.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Niagara has arrived since our last, with European news three days later than that brought by the Pacific.

The latest intelligence from the seat of war is, that the retreat of the Schleswig army at the battle Idstedt, was more owing to a want of ammunition, than as the result of a hard fought field; and no doubt exists but that the army will speedily be ready for action as at first. The Danish report of the battle is published, from which it appears that they lost 12 officers killed, and 74 wounded, 104 privates killed, and 2,300 wounded. Gen. Willisen does not state his loss, but regrets the large number of officers killed and wounded. The Schleswig Government has issued a proclamation in which it declares that its army, though compelled to fall back, is not beaten. The courage of the army is undiminished, and the troops stand prepared to renew the fight. Nothing is yet lost, and the Fatherland expects every man to do his duty. There has been no change in the relative positions of the hostile forces since the 27th. The Holsteiners are making every effort to bring the army again into condition to recommence operations, and every battalion of the reserve has been called in; martial law has been proclaimed for the Dutchy of Schleswig.

The exciting topic in the British House of Commons continues to be the admission or non-admission of Baron Rothschild to his seat in Parliamnt. On Thursday evening the debate was again resumed, but on an intimation from the Attorney General, that he had some definite resolutions to propose, the discussion of the question was further adjourned. In the course of the sitting the Attorney General gave notice that he would, on Monday next, move the following resolutions:

First, "That Baron Rothschild is not entitled to vote in this House, or to sit in this House, during any debate, until he shall take the oath of abjuration in the form appointed by law."

Second, "That this House will, at the earlies opportunity in the next Session of Parliament, take into its serious consideration the form of the oath of abjuration, with a view to relieve Her Majesty's subjects professing the Jewish religion.

A serious forgery on the Austrian Bank of Vienna has just been discovered in London. It appears that a person named Hill had been apprehended with forged notes on that Bank to the amount of £15,000.

A man named Jones has been brought up at the London Police Office for having in his possession a letter threatening the death of Lord John Russell. The fellow told the policemen that he found the letter, but the more probable circumstance appears to be that he concocted it with the view to a little unenviable notoriety.

The Ottoman Porte has notified the refugees at Schumla, that such of them as may be willing to emigrate to America will receive passports and a sum of 1,000 piastres, about £10, in aid of their journey.

The celebrated Liebeg is about to visit the United States for the purpose of lecturing on Chemistry.

An awful railway collision recently occurred at Glasgow, by which a number of persons lost their lives.

The weather continues favorable for the growing crops. The accounts from Ireland relative to the potato crop are extremely conflicting, but the general tone of the Irish papers is favorable.

MYSTERIES OF GAMBLING.—It appears that a few weeks since, two gentlemen, who were on a visit to New York, for the purpose of buying merchandize, were introduced to the company of two gamblers, by a friend, also a merchant, but doing business in this city. The strangers, unsuspicious of foul play, were induced to play at hazard with dies, at a hotel in the Fourth Ward, which has been heretofore considered highly respectable, when at various sittings they lost to the tune of $3,000. Last Saturday night one of them commenced playing, and played until he lost all the money he brought with him, beside having to give bills for the remainder. On telling their misfortunes to one of their friends, a watch was set, and suspicion being aroused, the case was laid before Justice Mountfort, who ordered the dice to be seized, when it was found they were loaded with quicksilver. A warrant was issued for the arrest of the parties implicated in the transaction; and as they are known, there is no doubt but that they will soon be taken and held to answer.

NEW STEAMBOAT.—A new steamboat, called the "Reindeer," is soon to commence running on the Hudson River. In point of size and splendor, she will rank with the first. She is about 300 feet in length, and 900 tuns measurement; her engine is large and unusually powerful, and as she draws but 3 feet 8 inches, she will no doubt fully compete in speed with any boat on these waters. She is to be commanded by Capt. Albert DeGroot, well known as the former commander of the Niagara and Roger Williams, under whose superintendance she is now being furnished in the most gorgeous style. The great improvement in her arrangement is that the upper cabin is made the dining saloon, and the passengers will have the advantages of fresh air and light at their meals.

POISONS—VINEGAR FRAUDS.—[illegible] well known, that articles of food are [illegible]metimes adulterated, but this is generally done by mixing some harmless substance with the article of consumption—as water with milk. But it may not be well known that under the name of Vinegar, deadly poisons are sold in large quantities in New York. The mode of this dangerous swindle is to manufacture a spurious article from vegetable or mineral poisons, to wit, of Sulphuric acid, or of Nitric acid, or Citric or Tartaric acids. A sufficient quantity to give to a barrel of Croton water a sharp pungent acid taste. This colored with sour beer or burnt sugar, is sold for "Cider Vinegar," or is sold uncolored for "White Wine Vinegar." Sulphuric and nitric acids by their common names of "Oil of Vitriol" and "Aquæ Fortis," are known by all to be deadly mineral poisons, and the others, though to a less degree, highly injurious. A mock article called Vinegar can be manufactured of any of these materials at an expense of ten cents per barrel, exclusive of the cost of the barrel.

RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.—About 9½ o'clock, on Thursday night, says the Courier and Enquirer, as the express Western passenger train on the New York and Erie Railroad was within a short distance of Ramapo, the locomotive came in contact with a bull, and threw him some 30 feet, killing him instantly. The collision caused the engine, tender, baggage-car, and two passenger cars, to be thrown from the track. A stream of hot water spouted from the boiler upon the fireman, and scalded his body severely. Immediate relief was procured for the unfortunate man, but his sufferings were intense. None of the passengers were injured.

Another accident occurred yesterday, on the Ramapo Railway, between Patterson and Sufferns, (connecting point of the New York and Erie Road.) The locomotive and several cars were thrown off the track by coming in contact with a number of cows, and many of the passengers were precipitated into a bank near by, but fortunately no person was hurt.

A CAVE DISCOVERED AT SHARON.—A correspondent of the Springfield Republican, writing from Sharon, remarks that two men digging a drain last week about half a mile from the Springs, came to a large fissure in the rocks, which led them into a cave; "that they entered the openings and soon reached an offset of 15 or 20 feet, which they descended, and after proceeding a short distanceto another offset similar to the first, which they descended in like manner, and at once found themselves in a room some 20 feet square and 60 feet high with a funnel-shaped roof; that a little further on they discovered another room of about the same dimensions as the first; that they found a succession of such rooms of different sizes; and that they thus went on for the space of three hours, traveling at least a mile under ground. They stated that the, found the cave on every side hung with large and brilliant stalactites. In one place they observed a waterfall which, so far as the sound and the light of their torches would enable them to judge, must have been 60 feet high."

SUICIDE AT BOSTON.—The Boston Times says that the body of Mr. Francis Dillaway, master carpenter, of Boston, was found on Saturday afternoon in the belfry of Chancy Church, (of which he was sexton.) His head was badly mutilated, and in his hand a pistol was found, with which he made way with himself. It appears that the family of Mr. Dillaway are residing out of town, and for some time past he has been residing with a friend. On Wednesday last he appeared somewhat depressed, and the last that was seen of him, was about five o'clock on that day, when it was supposed by his friends that he had gone to visit his family. On Saturday afternoon the family were heard from, but they had not seen him, when search was at once commenced, and resulted as above. He was rich, and this melancholy event is attributed to dejection caused by the loss of a law suit in which he was involved to the amount of some $1,500.

TERMINATION OF THE FLORIDA WAR.—The delegation of Seminoles sent to Florida from Arkansas by the U. S. Government, with the intention to induce the Florida Indians to emigrate, have entirely failed in their mission. Some old and superannuated and some few degraded Indians alone have left for the West. The remainder have steadily rejected all overtures to emigrate, and probably will be allowed to remain in Florida, restricted to the boundaries the Government shall see fit to make out for them. Thus terminates the last Florida war.

TRIP UP THE ST. PETERS RIVER.—Captain Harris, of the Yankee, says that his boat ascended one whole day of diligent steaming above the mouth of Blue Earth River, and at the point where he turned back it appeared to be navigable, as below. The stream appeared to be at a medium height, and has the muddy color of the Missouri. Capt. H. also ascended the Blue Earth River for a short distance. He speaks with the same enthusiasm of the beautiful appearance of the country and rich character of the soil as the others who have preceded him in time, on other boats

Henry A. Schoolcraft, of Sacramento, California, is now on a visit to his relatives in Albany county. He is about twenty-five years of age, and went out to California as a private soldier in Col. Stevenson's Regiment. After his discharge from the U. S. service, he obtained employment as book-keeper for Capt. Sutter, and has since accumulated an estate valued at $350,000. While in Capt. Sutter's employ he had at one time the paying off of 600 clerks and surveyors, not one of whom received less than $13 per day. He states that during his stay with Capt. Sutter, $15,000,000 of that gentleman's money passed through his hands.

Some idea may be formed of the extent and magnitude of the United States Hotel at Saratoga, kept by the Messrs. Marvin, from the following list of provisions consumed daily. There are now about 700 guests at the House, to which may be added 100 children, and 300 servants, making 1,100 persons to feed daily. They consume, beside many other articles, the following each day: 500 lbs. Beef, 500 do. Mutton, 500 Chickens, 150 Ducks and Turkies, 2,500 Eggs, 600 lbs. Butter, 1,500 Rolls for breakfast, 4 barrels of Flour.

SUMMARY.

By the late order of the Russian Government, all marraiges are forbidden, except where the parties first obtain the consent of the parish authorities, which must in every case be withheld, unless the persons asking it are capable at the time of supporting families, and also furnish a strong probability that such capacity will continue to the end. The increased number of individuals falling a burden on the State during several years past, is the reason given for this edict.

Four courses ef Lectures will be delivered the coming season before the Lowell Institute, Boston. One is to be on Political Economy, by Prof. Bowen, of Cambridge; another course on Natural Religon, by Rev. Dr. Blagden of Boston; another, by Professor Agassiz, subject not known; and the fourth, on the Comparative Physical Geography of the United States, and the race that will shortly inhabit these States, by Prof. Guyot.

The Pittsburgh Gazette, on data furnished by the census takers, estimates the population of Pittsburgh and surrounding towns at 87,760 persons, and of the county 142,730. This is an increase of some 80,000 in ten years for the whole county. It says it will no doubt be seen, when the results are finally settled, that the increase of the city and environs will be at least one hundred per cent in ten years.

The Mayor of Pittsburgh having on Friday committed a number of vagrants to jail, the Sheriff refused to receive them, and the Mayor arrested and held him to bail, the sum of $50,000 to answer to the charge of misdemeanor. He refused the prisoners under the advice of the city physician, who said their reception would be dangerous to the health of the more permanent sick.

From Montserrat advices to 12th ult., have come to hand, representing that Island to be still reduced to the lowest ebb of misery and wretchedness. Famine, pestilence and death, stalk through the length and breadth of the land in the most hideous shape; half the inhabitants are starving, and the other half have not the means of relieving them.

An altered note on the Farmer's Bank of Reading has appeared. The principle vignette is three human figures and a nondescript animal. On right end, two human figures, and on left the figure 5 in a large die. The name of the Bank and the words State of Pennsylvania and Readiug inserted.

Officer W. H. Stephens of the New York Lower Police Court, assisted by officer Leighton of Massachusetts, arrested a fugitive from Springfield, named Addison Ward, who stands charged with having embezzled funds belonging to the Western Railroad Corporation to the amount of $75,000.

Galveston dates of the 7th report continued Indian depredations—200 attacked Capt. Forbes's camp, at San Antonio Diego, and took several horses. They also attacked Davis's rancho, and captured a train of mules. Afterward they attacked a party of Mustangers, killed 7 and wounded 9 men.

JENNY LIND, on her way to this country, was to give two Concerts at Liverpool on the 17th and 19th insts. at $2,500 per night. For these Concerts Tickets were selling freely at the last advices at $25 each. Thirty of the principal nobility had written down from London to secure seats for both nights.

In the Cherokee Nation, on the 12th ult., opposite Fort Smith., Moses Vickory was killed by Chas. Tickaneesky, both Cherokees. A feud has existed between the families of Thompson and Vickory for some time past, and it is said that not a male member of either is now left alive. Tickaneesky married a Miss Thompson.

MICHIGAN will choose three Judges of her Supreme Court, three members of Congress, Auditor General, State Treasurar, Attorney General, School Superintendent, twelve Senators, an Assembly and County officers at her State Election on the 2d of November next.

The Convention for revising the Constitution of Michigan has resolved not to alter the present law abolishing the punishment of murder by death. There was nearly a unanimous opinion in favor of the law as it stands.

Thomas P. Shallcross, special Agent of the post office Department, arrested Thomas H. Burge, on the 31st of July, at Woodworth, N. C. for stealing letters from the United States Mail. A number of letters, drafts, &c. were found in his possession.

Negro boy Tom Fisher, imprisoned in the Centerville (Md) jail for advising slaves to run away from their masters, broke the door of his dungeon on Friday morning last and escaped. A slave confined with him escaped at the same time.

The case of Thomas Kanouse and Levi Cole of Paterson, charged with robbing the Phenix Bank at Westerly, R. I., of $16,000 in December last, came before the Grand Jury of Washington County, R. I., last week.

The Captain of the bark Ferucia, from Genoa, was arrested in crimianl and civil complaints, charging him with having brought into this port, on said vessel, 36 more passengers than the law, in proportion to her tunnage, allows. He brought between 160 and 170, which was an excess as above. He was held to bail on the criminal charge in $1,800, and on the civil in $600, and the vessel libeled and taken into custody by the United States Marshal.

The directors of the Bain Telegraph Line, between New York and Boston, have made a reduction in their tariff of prices. Dispatches will hereafter be transmitted on their wires at the rate of two cents a word. The regularity with which this line operates has attached to it a large share of business, which the proprietors have turned to good account in making the reduction.

The Detroit Tribune says that President Fillmore has two brothers who have for some time resided in Washtenaw County, Michigan—one a house carpenter and the other a blacksmith by trade. He has a sister in Michigan, the wife of Mr. Harris of Coldwater, a lawyer by profession, and another sister married in Northern Indiana. He visited them all last Summer.

John Murphy was arrested in New York, on Friday afternoon at 5 o'clock, by officers Barange and Craff, of the Eighth Ward, for stealing $570 from the safe of Sheldon & Seaver, No. 3 Pine-st. The money was stolen on Friday morning about 8 o'clock, and at 5 o'clock $360 and the thief were locked up. Rather quick work.

The number of vessels entered at New Bedford Custom House, from April 1 to June 30, 1850, was 48—all in the whale fishery. Estimated value of cargo $422,558. Total estimated value of oil and whalebone imported into the district during the quarter, $2,270,212.

Some workmen were last week employed in digging a well at the new village of Abbottsford. After digging through about twelve feet of loam, they came to a deposite of leaves and brush about two feet thick. The leaves and brush were in a perfect state of preservation. After passing through this formation the soil was a bed of sand.

The act passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania prohibiting the circulation in that State of the notes of the Banks of other States under the denomination of $5, goes into operation on the 21st of August next. It is very severe in its penalties.

The New Orleans papers of the 6th inst., tell of the stampede of a whole family of slaves—Kitty, her husband Parsons, Henry and Georgiana—the property of John Watt, of New Orleans. The negroes were the confidential servants of Mr. Watt, and had been in his family for many years. Two hundred dollars have been offered for their capture.

The Boston Mail states that Bristol Bill, sentenced to the Vermont State Prison, for counterfeiting, has been lately flogged twice by the Warden for making attempts to escape and insubordination. A key fitting the door of his cell was found upon him.

A line of mail stages has been established from Independence, Mo., to Santa Fe, to run monthly. The stages are got up in splendid style, each conveying eight passengers. The bodies are made water-tight with a view of using them as boats in ferrying streams. The team consists of six mules to each coach. The mail is guarded by eight armed men.

"The Buffalo Courier and Morning Express, the only morning papers in Buffalo, have decided to issue their usual Monday morning papers on the previous Saturday night, in order to avoid Sunday labor."

Three negroes belonging to Hon. Mr. Colcock, S. C., absconded from him six weeks ago and were concealed until Monday, Aug. 12, when two were found by Capt. Goddard at the residence of Richard A. Coxe, in Washington, concealed under the floor of the kitchen. They were committed to prison.

All the factories in Alleghany City have been stopped, throwing hundreds of men, women, and children out of employment.

MARRIED.

At Berlin, N. Y., August 1, 1850, by Eld. James H. Cochran, Mr. POTTER KENYON, of Petersburg, to Mrs. POLLY SAUNDERS, of Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y.

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 11th inst., by Eld. C. M. Lewis, Mr. ROWSE CHAPMAN, of Westerly, to Mrs. SARAH E. KENYON, of the former place.

DIED.

In Shiloh, N. J., August 9th, Mrs. ANN ELIZABETH, wife of Bro. Hosea A. Davis, in the 25th year of her age. Sister Davis professed religion some eight years ago, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Shiloh, N. J. She bore her last illness with much Christian patience, and longed for the time to come when she should leave the tenement of clay and dwell with her Savior. She has left a husband and one child, besides many relatives and friends, to mourn her loss.

In Hopkinton, R. I., very saddealy on the 8th inst., Mr. ELIJAH CRANDALL, aged 27 years.

Notice.

To the Churches of the Western S. D. B. Association:

DEAR BRETHREN,—You are hereby notified, that your contributions to the funds of your Associational Mission are greatly needed, and you are desired to foward them as soon as convenient; and if an opportunity shall not sooner present itself, will you bring them in at the time of our Anniversaries in September

N. V. HULL, Secretary.

South-Western Association.

THE next session of the Seventh-day Baptist South-Western Association will be held with the Church at Jackson, Shelby Co, Ohio, commencing on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in October, 1850. Eld. Azor Estee is to preach the Introductory Discourse. A full delegation is desirable. It is expected that the churches will bear in mind, that the question of dividing the Association has been referred to that meeting, and that they will be prepared to act in the matter.

WM. F. RANDOLPH, Secretary.

Notice.

THE Yearly Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches in Rhode Island and Connecticut will be held with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I., commencing on Sabbath, August 31st, at 10½ o'clock A. M. It is earnestly hoped, that on the services of this annual convocation, the blessing of God may be invoked by the churches which compose it—that by it the bond of union and Christian fellowship among the churches may be strengthened, and the general interest of the Redeemer's kingdom promoted. Brethren and sisters, let us each labor to bring with us a sanctified offering to present before the Lord. 3t

A Valuable Farm for Sale.

THE subscriber offers at Private Sale his Farm, situate near Shiloh, Cumberland County, New Jersey, containing 107 Acres of Good Land, in a high state of cultivation, having carted on it within the last 4 years, about 1,000 loads of good shell marl, near 2,000 bushels of lime, besides ashes, guano, and poudrett without measure. There is on said Farm a new and substantial Dwelling House, built of the best materials and by good workmen, two stories high, with a good cellar. Size of the house 32 feet by 28 feet, with kitchen and bath-room attached, 17 by 28 feet, a good well of water, a cistern holding about 30 hogsheads of water, with a pump in the kitchen, very convenient for washing and supplying the bath-room. A large barn, stabling and hay house, wagon house, wash and wood house, and other out buildings, all fitted up within four years. Two Young Apple Orchards of choice fruit, besides an old orchard of natural fruit; also a variety of other fruit trees, such as peaches, pears, plums, &c. There are also two Good Tenant Houses, with good wells of water at their doors, newly fitted up, and so arranged on the Farm that it can easily be divided into two if desired.

Said Farm is handsomely located, within half a mile of the village of Shiloh, N. J., where is a post office, and the Greenwich stage running through regular to Philadelphia; within three miles and a half of Bridgeton, the county town, where the steamer Cohansey plies daily to Philadelphia, and within two miles and a quarter of Roadstown.

The Union Academy is located in its immediate vicinity, the design of which is to prepare students for college. Over a hundred were in attendance the first year, which has just closed. A large brick building is now being fitted up for its accommodation. There has been a large sum of money subscribed to procure apparatus and material for an Agricultural Department, and fitting up a Chemical Laboratory, which will go into operation this fall, the only institution of the kind all West Jersey.

The above advantages make the said Farm a desirable location. Property in the vicinity is rising in value constantly.

For further particulars, inquire of the subscriber on the premises. Terms made easy.

Miscellaneous.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

The Colored People of Jamaica.

KINGSTON, Feb., 1850.

It will be sixteen years next August, since slavery was abolished on this island, and the apprenticeship system, which took its place, was abolished four years later. Since that period, the laws have recognized no distinctions of color among the inhabitants. The black people have enjoyed the same political privileges as the whites, and with them have shared the honors and the patronage of the mother and the local governments.

The effect of this policy upon the people of color may be partially anticipated, but one accustomed to the proscribed condition of the free blacks in the United States, will constantly be startled at the diminished importance attached here to the matter of complexion. Intermarriages are constantly occurring between the white and the colored people, and their families associate together within the ranks to which by wealth and culture they respectively belong, and public opinion does not recognize any social distinctions based exclusively upon color. Of course, cultivated or fashionable people will not receive colored persons of inferior culture and worldly resources, but the rules of discrimination are scarcely more rigorous against these than against whites. They are received at the "King's House"—it is thus the governor's residence is styled—and they are invited to his table with fastidious courtesy. The wife of the present mayor of Kingston is a "brown" woman—that is the name given to all the intermediate shades between a decided white and decided black complexion—so also is the wife of the receiver general himself, one of the most exalted public functionaries upon the island.

A circumstance occurred shortly after I arrived, which may be interesting to some in this connection. It was proposed by some of the officers stationed near Kingston, and gentlemen resident in and about the city, to give a public ball. They proceeded to engage the theater for the occasion. Some Jews, who as a class incline to indemnify themselves for their exclusion from the society of the whites by striking an alliance with the people of color, circulated among the latter a report that the committee on invitations to the ball had resolved that "no colored person, Jew, or dog," should be invited. Of course the story produced considerable excitement among those most concerned.

The theater belongs to the city. The committee "on the theater" in the Common Council, composed of a majority of brown men, quietly turned the key of the theater, and excluded the artisans sent to arrange it for the festival. The ball had to be postponed in consequence, and finally took place at the Camp, a much more desirable place in every particular. I was assured by members of the ball committee, that the Jews' report was false altogether—that they had resolved upon no such exclusions. They did not propose to invite the Jews, because there had heretofore been no social intercourse between them and their respective families, nor did it appear that either party desired any; but they said invitations had been sent to the daughters of the receiver-general, and of the mayor—all, as I have before mentioned, browns. Before the ball took place, I believe the colored people became satisfied that they had been deceived, for a brown gentleman spoke to me with some bitterness of a determination formed by the committee on invitations, as he professed to know of his own knowledge, to invite to the ball no persons who had ever been behind a counter; but he made no allusion to the other report. * * * *

One unacquainted with the extent to which the amalgamation of races has gone here, is constantly liable to drop remarks in the presence of white persons, which, in consequence of the mixture of blood that may have taken place in some branch of their families, are likely to be very offensive. I was only protected from frequent contre temps of this kind, by the timely caution of a lady, who, in explaining its propriety, said that unless one knows the whole collateral kindred of a family in Jamaica, he is not safe in assuming that they have not some colored connections.

One of the most distinguished barristers on the island is a colored man, who was educated at an English university, and ate his terms at Lincoln's Inn, as must all barristers who wish to practice here; the judicial authorities of the island having no power to admit any one to practice the law in any of its departments. This circumstance, by the way, has given to Jamaica a bar of rare culture and talent.

It so happened that the Surry Assizes was sitting in Kingston when I arrived, Sir John Rowe presiding. I availed myself of the courtesy of a professional friend, and accompanied him one day to the court, while in session. Though the room contained a crowd of people, there did not appear to be twenty white persons among them, the court and bar inclusive. Two colored lawyers were sitting at the barristers' table, and the jury-box was occupied by twelve men, all but three of whom were colored, and all but two, who were negroes, were Jews. Two witnesses were examined before I left the room, both of whom were colored and both police officers. All the officers of the court, except the clerk, were also colored. I was assured that more than seven-tenths of the whole police force of the island, amounting to about eight hundred men, are colored. Judging from the proportion that fell under my observation, this estimate cannot be far from correct. But what will the southern readers of the Evening Post say, when I add, that in the legislative assembly of Jamaica, composed of fifty-six or fifty-seven British subjects, some ten or a dozen are colored men? Nay more, the public printers of the Legislature, Messrs. Jordan & Osborn, are both colored men, and are likewise editors of the leading government paper, the Kingston Journal.

It was my privilege the other day to make the acquaintance of one of the most highly cultivated men I ever met, upon whose complexion the accidents of birth had left a tinge which betrayed the African bar on his escutcheon. He is a brown man, about forty-five years of age, I judged, and was educated in one of the English universities, where he enjoyed every advantage which wealth could procure for his improvement. His appearance and address both indicate superior refinement. He enjoys an enviable reputation as a naturalist, and has published a volume on the birds of Jamaica, illustrated by his own pencil, which displays both literary and scientific merit of a high order. He is one of the stipendiary magistrates of the island, upon a salary of £500 sterling per annum. * * * * *

While the entente cordiale between the whites and the colored people is apparently strengthening daily, a very different state of feeling exists between the negroes or Africans, and the browns. The latter shun all connection by marriage with the former, and can experience no more unpardonable insult than to be classified with them in any way. They generally prefer that their daughters should live with a white person upon any terms, than be married to a negro. It is their ambition that their offspring should be light complexioned, and there are few sacrifices they will not make to accomplish that result, whether married or not. Color, with them, in a measure, marks rank, and they have the same fear of being confounded with what they deem an inferior caste, that is so often exhibited by vulgar people, who have no ascertained or fixed social position.

It was in consequence of this state of feeling, which I have described, that Soulouque, the Emperor of Hayti, who is utterly black, recently commenced his terrible system of persecution against the browns. Upon the pretence that they were conspiring against his government, or contemplated offenses, he issued warrants for the arrest of all the prominent brown men within his empire. They were obliged to abscond, precipitately, to save their lives. Many of them took refuge in Jamaica.

I visited one who cultivates a small plantation of about twenty acres, near Kingston. Nothing about him but his complexion and his hair indicated African blood. He had a fine intelligent countenance, and good address. His grounds were under admirable culture, and displayed skill, industry, and thrift. His tobacco beds were his pride, but around them the rarest tropical fruits and vegetables to be found upon the island were growing in luxuriant perfection. He had been stripped of most of his property by the Emperor, but he was living here in apparent comfort and respectability. Upon the walls of the room into which my companion and myself were shown, were suspended two portraits, one of his wife and the other of his daughter, who, he informed me, is now in Paris, at school. If the likeness be correct, the original must be exceedingly beautiful. The paintings were both of superior merit as works of art.

His wife had not been permitted by the Emperor to join him, nor did he enjoy very frequent opportunities of hearing from her. He alluded to his domestic sorrows with great feeling, but, with a Frenchman's hopefulness, he looked for a time when justice should be done to him, and the tyrant through whom he suffered. * * * *

It is difficult to convey any satisfactory idea of the state of political parties here, for they can hardly be said to have any state. They are not arrayed upon any of the issues which classify the inhabitants of the mother country; upon the questions agitated in the British Parliament, in which they have any interest, they are for the most part agreed. Colonial assistance of any kind all desire, and all are hostile to free trade. The appointees of the present government have prudence enough not to proclaim their sentiments upon the housetops, but even they do not disguise them at the fireside. It is to free trade they ascribe their ruin, not to the abolition of slavery. I did not find a man upon the island, and I was assured by numbers perfectly informed upon the subject, that there was not in their opinion a man residing at Jamaica who would restore slavery, if it was in his power. They say that if they only had the protection on the staples of the island which they enjoyed with slavery, they would prosper. It was the removal of that protection, added to the advanced price of labor, occasioned by the emancipation of slaves, which compelled them to surrender their accustomed markets to the cheaper slave-grown productions of Cuba and Brazil.

Learned Birds.

This would seem to be scarcely the place for a notice of a display of the intelligence of birds which we have lately had the opportunity of witnessing; but there is something so unique in the exhibition, so little of the commonplace, and so much that provokes curious and interesting thought, that it really falls within the province of art, and that of no ordinary kind. We cannot describe the details of the exhibition better than they have been given in a notice which appeared in the Chronicle. We would premise that the exhibitor is a young Belgian lady, Mdlle. Vandermeersch, and that there appears to be no trickery or charlatanism in the extraordinary influence she exerts, or in the means by which she displays it, over the grateful little creatures who obey her slightest suggestion.

"The young lady, who is strikingly handsome, lady-like, and not more than seventeen years of age, enters any saloon where her attendance may have been desired, with a cage containing four compartments, in each of which is a bird—a cardinal, a goldfinch, or some other variety. The cage is simply placed on a table. In front is placed a little trough, in which are ranged some hundred and fifty or two hundred cards, exactly similar in shape and color. These cards are closely serried, their ends being visible. Each card bears on its surface some inscription, either the ordinary court and common cards, or a letter of the alphabet, the numbers simple and compound, the days of the week, the months, the seasons, and others we do not remember. These inscriptions, are necessarily hidden while the birds are making their selections. Mdlle. Vandermeersch does not touch the cards or the birds during the performance. She approaches some individual in the company and asks the time by his watch. He tells her sotto voce. She then approaches the cage, speaks to one of the birds aloud, and requests him to tell the time. The door of the cage being opened, the little bird hops out and jumps along the platform of cards, apparently deliberating. At length he fixes on one, which, after immense tugging, he pulls up from the pack. Suppose the time to be a quarter past three, this card would be inscribed with a "three." Again the little fellow is set to work, and after a similar display of reflection and physical strength, out he tugs a "fifteen," which he tosses in an amusingly cavalier manner on the platform, and then hops back to his cage. Should he by accident turn the card with its face downward, he is made to come back and present it in due form to the spectators. The tricks of which this is a specimen are very numerous. Following the same manner, the birds tell you the day of the week, the month, the season of the year, any letter you may pick out of a book, any day, month, season, or year you may choose to name, any court or common card you may fix upon, and, what is stil more extraordinary, if you think of a word, either of these birds will spell that word for you, letter by letter, always provided that any one letter is not repeated in the word chosen. Of course you communicate to the young lady what it is you fix upon. This brings the exhibition out of the range of conjuring into the more interesting field of the practical. As Mdlle. Vandermeersch does not touch either the cards or the birds, and as her address to the birds is made aloud, it is puzzling in the extreme to conceive what is the nature of the influence by which she exercises such a singular control over these little animals. The exhibition excites surprise wherever it is seen. From the description we have given, it will be seen that there is nothing of commonplace trickery in the exhibition, but that it appeals to a higher kind of taste."

All this is strictly true and stated without the least exaggeration. [London Examiner.

River Thieves in New York.

A report recently presented to the Mayor of New York by the Chief of Police, gives the following information relative to the operations of a class of depredators called river thieves:—

The vessels that suffer most from the depredations of river thieves, are those that belong to foreign ports, and seldom visit our harbor. These vessels are boarded at night by one of the gang, who noiselessly casts into the water small anchors, heavy bound blocks, small chain cables, hawsers, logwood, pig iron, and any other article that will sink; and after the vessel has left the port, the articles are raised again by means of grappling irons, and sold with the most perfect impunity.

Boats engaged in bringing produce to market suffer to a large extent from the depredations of these men. Barrels of beef, pork, and cheese, and firkins and pails of butter, are stolen from the tow and canal boats; produce of all kinds is carried off in large quantities, especially when it is piled upon the docks, and should the policemen detect them while at their work, they have only to jump into their boats and bear off their ill-gotten gain, while the policemen are utterly unable to follow after them. In this way ship-yards are robbed of the tools used by the workmen; of iron bolts, spikes, and copper, and frequently those thieves land in the neighborhood of new buildings, which they also strip of everything moveable. Instances have come to my knowledge where they have butchered swine, sheep, and calves while penned up to the end of the docks, and carried them off without being detected. They frequently make excursions to villages and towns situated on the East and North Rivers, and rifle stores of their contents, which they carry away in their boats, so that the amount of property stolen by river thieves is incalculable. A number of juvenile thieves are in the habit of assisting the river thieves in a manner that clearly indicates a perfect knowledge of the mystery of crime. Merchandise having been landed from a vessel, and piled up on the docks, is watched, and, at a favorable opportunity, rolled over into the river, when the river thief quickly transfers the article to his boat, and the spoil is divided between them.

At other times, the vagabonds will contrive to get up a sham fight on the dock, in the neighborhood of the vessel intended to be robbed, and while the attention of the hands on board is directed to the fracas, the river thieves slip stealthily on board and carry off many articles before the people return to their work; and they operate in the same manner to divert the attention of the men from one side of the deck to the other, to enable them to remove articles into their boats unperceived.

They are also assisted by persons who go around in boats, for the ostensible purpose of buying old rope, and others that go on board of vessels for the purpose of buying slush, who convey information to their confederates, to enable them successfully to carry on their operations.

To show with what dexterity and skill they manage their operations, I would state that on one occasion they went on board of the ship Harbinger at night, and removed the large bell and carried it away without making the least noise, or alarming the persons on board, who are always readily awakened at the least sound of the bell.

Cases have been known where private watchmen have been employed to watch liquor, and while lying on the docks, the river thieves have gone underneath the bridges of the dock at low water, and, by boring holes through casks, have emptied them of their contents without being detected. In this way they steal oil, molasses, and other liquids, and sometimes coffee, especially when they have found holes in the flooring of the bridge.

WONDERFUL PRESERVATION.—On Friday, says the St. John (N. B.) News of July 29th, a lad about 13 years of age was driving his mother (Mrs. Humphrey) and five small children, with the nurse, and when at the Lake, this side of Torryburn, the horse rushed into the water, the bank being very steep, and they were all engulphed beyond their depth. The mother, with her infant in her arms, supported herself for an instant, but sunk, when feeling her foot touch something, by exertion she rose to the surface, and grasping a branch held to it until taken out by some men who Providentially by this time were present. The lad seized two of his sisters, but finding them heavy, called for help, when a plank being thrust out, he was dragged on shore, he being the only one who could swim.

He again struck out, and seeing another of his sisters in the wagon, at the bottom of the lake, went down and caught her by the bonnet and rescued her in time, though she was insensible, to preserve life. One more child was still floating on the water, supported by its clothes; the noble boy again dashed in, and succeeded in restoring the fourth one by his courage and exertions. The nurse was saved by grasping a stick held out by the men on shore. Thus a lad of thirteen years of age saved the life of four children. The horse was drowned.

A Slave Case.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Express, writing from Washington under date of Aug. 7, says that the runaway slaves have been so numerous of late, that the owners of this species of property have become very much alarmed, and hence are disposed to remove them to safer parts of the United States, or to sell them to slave traders. A cruel incident of this kind is exciting great sympathy in Washington at present. The family of William Williams, the coachman of Presidents Polk, Taylor, and Fillmore, were suddenly seized by a slave trader, and taken from their homes off to Baltimore, to be sent to New Orleans. His wife, over fifty years of age, three daughters, and three grandchildren, were thus snatched from him in an hour to a fate worse to him than death, to be sold South to the highest bidder, and separated from him and each other. The poor man wrung his hands, rolled on the ground, was nearly crazed in fact, by the dreadful parting. After many years of toil, he very recently purchased his own freedom, but his family were owned by some one in New Orleans.

The President, feeling deeply for his distress, gave him money, and let him go to Baltimore to see them again. Williams found the trader would take the sum of $3,200 for them, and returned with the hope of raising that amount to redem them. A petition was drawn up, and circulated about the city and House of Representatives, setting forth the fact, and asking for assistance, which was so promptly rendered that the prospect is, in the language of Williams himself, "very fair." The President, Mr. Webster, Gen. Scott, and a number of Senators, Members, and citizens, have contributed sums from $5 to $50. Mr. Corcoran gave $200, which was the price asked for the aged wife, and he made her "free" at once. Beside doing this, Mr. Corcoran has purchased one of the women, who has lived in his family for some years, Mrs. Com. Patterson another, and Mrs. Gen. Towson a third, who lived with her some years past. So the children, for whom $1,500 was asked, only remain to be purchased by their grandfather, and he is in a fair way of raising this money.

An Executioner Killed by his Son.

The Gazette des Tribunaux has the following communication from Bois le Due in Holland:—"Among the degrading punishments provided by the penal code of the Netherlands is the one which is called the brandishing of the sword, and consists in the culprit being placed on his knees on the scaffold with his eyes blindfolded as if he were about to have his head cut off. The executioner then whirls several times over the culprit's head the sword which is used for the decapitation of criminals. The application of this extraordinary punishment took place in our town yesterday, and was attended by a fatal accident. On this occasion the executioner had caused his son to take his place, a young man of 22, whom he is instructing to the exercise of his functions. The young man had posted himself behind the individual to be operated upon, and the executioner stood behind his son—doubtless in order to give him the necessary directions. The apprentice executioner then graspled the sword and brandished it about a dozen times over the head of the culprit; but in bringing it back again towards himself he unfortunately struck his father on the lower part of the head, and inflicted a fatal wound. The young man has been arrested. He stated that his arm had grown weak in the act of whirling the sword, which is a very heavy one, and that, having lost his command over it, the sword had fallen on his father. The truth of the explanation is doubted by no one, as the young man bears an excellent character.

A MORMON COLONY.—The editor of the Chicago Journal has conversed with a gentleman who has just returned from a visit to Beaver Island, at the head of Lake Michigan, upon which the Mormon Colony is located, headed by their prophet, James Strang. They number about six hundred, and have a farm on the Island, which is cultivated by them. They have also engaged to a limited extent in taking white fish and trout, which constitute their chief means of subsistence. The Temple, 100 by 60 feet, is in progress at their settlement, one sixth of the labor of the Colony being required upon it weekly. At present this labor is diverted to the building of a printing office, the press and materials for a weekly paper being on the ground. Semi-occasionally the portion of the Temple which is finished is used as a theater!—Mr. G. J. Adams, one of the leaders, acting as manager. This room is also used for a ball-room, where the faithful chase the giddy hours, and also as a place of worship on Sundays.

COWS HAVE POWER TO HOLD UP THEIR MILK.—It is known to many farmers that, when young cows first come in, when the calves are taken away, they will hold up their milk for a short time, and some will almost dry themselves before they will give it down. A few years ago, I bought a young cow which proved to be very wild, and when I took away her first calf, she would not give down her milk. I had heard it remarked that putting a weight on a cow's back would make her give her milk down. I accordingly drove her into the stable, got a bushel of grain and put it on her back; but not being heavy enough, I took it off and put my elbows in the center of her back, and bore on until she hollowed in her back. While she was kept in this position, she had no power to hold up her milk; for it came down freely. After doing this a few times, and afterwards putting my hand on the back of the cow, it would give way, and she would immediately give down her milk. [Am. Agriculturalist.

THE MARRIAGE RELATION IN HAYTI.—In the official part of a late number of the Moniteur Haytien, is a document giving the number of births, deaths, marriages, and divorces, in fifteen towns situated in the provinces of the West, North, and South. In these towns the whole number of children born in three months was 1863, of whom 1700 were born out of wedlock, and only 163 were legitimate! Such a monstrous disproportion between these two classes of children exists in no other country, we venture to say, on the face of the earth, where the marriage institution is recognized. In the same towns the deaths in that period were 406; 65 marriages, and one divorce. In Port-au-Prince alone, the capital of the Empire, there were 413 children born, and only 29 of them in marriage; 77 deaths, and 20 marriages.

Variety.

Prof. Forshey, in an essay on the physics of the Mississippi, just published, proves by the result of observations, kept up through a great number of years, that the channel of the Mississippi River is deepening, and, consequently, the levee system will not necessarily elevate the bed of the river, as has been feared. On the contrary, he thinks confining the river within a narrow channel, will give it additional velocity and serve to scrape out the bottom; while opening artificial outlets, by diminishing the current, will cause the rapid deposition of sediment, and thus produce evil to be guarded against.

A French paper says: "In England, where there are no professors of Socialism, and no persons who demand a forced association, there exists 14,000 societies for mutual assistance, possessing an annual revenue of 70,000,000f., and an accumulated capital of 100,000,000f. In France, where Socialism has its doctors, its apostles, its journals, and its tribune, there are about 30 associations of cooks, not very united, and possessing only borrowed sauce-pans and numerous debts."

M. Poitevin made a second balloon ascension on horseback on Sunday from the Champ de Mars, and an immense crowd assembled to witness it. The same horse was used as on a previous occasion. He displayed no alarm as the strings, &c., were affixed, and when raised from the ground appeared quite accustomed to this singular way of traveling. To prove to the public that he was in no way fixed to the saddle, M. Poitevin, when about 100 yards high, stood on the horse's back and saluted the public.

It is supposed that the number of persons who make a trade of thieving in London is not less than 6,000; of these, nearly 200 are first-class thieves, or swell mobmen; 600 "macemen," and trade swindlers, bill-swindlers, dog-stealers, &c.; about 40 burglars, "dancers," "garreteers," and other adepts with the skeleton-keys. The rest are pick-pockets, "gonophs," mostly young thieves, who sneak into areas, and rob tills, and other pilferers.

The editor of the Freeman's Journal says that of every hundred Roman Catholic children educated in the public schools of the United States, ninety-eight may be set down as a clear and certain gain to the devil! Such are his words—nothing more and nothing less.

A work has just been published giving an account of the sums derived from legacies or donations by different charitable establishments in France during the 46 years. The total amount is 122,500,000f., without including sums not exceeding 3,000f.

Great preparations are making throughout France for the English exhibition of 1851. Government has introduced a bill for a grant of two thousand pounds towards the expense of the exhibition.

It is stated that there are 2,300 licensed drinking houses in New Orleans, which would extend thirteen miles were they placed side by side. The amount of money annually expended there for intoxicating drinks is estimated at $12,000,000. We fear that a census of New-York would reveal equally appalling results.

It is estimated that the aggregate loss by fires, in New York, during the past twelve years, amounts to $16,000,000. Since the introduction of the Croton water into the city it has been found that the fires are one-third fewer, and not half so disastrous as previously.

The tunnel on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad is one of the greatest works of civil engineering now going on in the world. It is a few miles from Morgantown, West Virginia, and passes through a mountain a mile and a quarter wide.

Prof. Rogers, in his recent geological lectures at the Smithsonian Institute, says that the Mississippi drains an area of 300,000 square miles; and that the total amount of water discharged per annum, in cubic feet, is 8,092,118,940,000.

An infidel remarked, within the hearing of a little girl of thirteen, that all things came by chance, and the world, like a mushroom, sprang up in the night. "I should like to know, sir," she asked, "where the seed came from."

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF A TOURIST—No. 4.

Paris, July 14th, 1850.

A journey of little more than twenty-four hours carries one from London to Paris—from the strong-hold of Monarchy to that most irrational of all false doctrines in political economy, hereditary rank, the Dei Gratia nonsense—to the hot-bed of liberalism. For, let what will be said of certain objectionable peculiarities of the Parisians, it cannot be denied, I think, by a candid and truth-seeking as well as unprejudiced mind, that the French philosophers have made a greater advance in the principles of political and social economy than any others, however it may be with regard to their practice of those principles. In spite of the obloquy sought to be thrown on her on account of that bugbear of the Times and the English conservatives—Socialism; in spite of her extravagances and mistakes in some instances, the politicians of every school must learn much from France before they set the world with its best foot foremost. As it is, they begin to have a consciousness that love is the only power by which the few can rule the many long, and every opportunity of calling into exercise the patriotism of a people on behalf of their governments is eagerly embraced. Thus, after the recent attack on the Queen of England, she visited the Opera, and was greeted with the most unbounded enthusiasm, a demonstration uniting all the chivalrous and manly feelings of Englishmen with their regard for their Queen—the whole being heightened by the carefully circulated reports, exaggerating a simple though certainly brutal outrage on Victoria, into an attempt at assassination. Such an event is a perfect godsend to a government like the English. Not that they particularly need to have their bonds strengthened, but such a thing would have more effect on them than on some other nations.

This may seem to have little to do with Paris; but comparisons are inevitable to a man passing from one country into another; and having relieved myself of my lecture on political economy, I will return. Leaving New Haven by the Dieppe steamer, after a voyage of a few hours, according to the usual formula, we entered the port of Dieppe about [illegible] the basin is an opening in the chalk cliffs, through which a small river empties into the sea. Being fairly moored, we were in the hands of the police and custom-house officers; and delivering our passports and baggage, we were permitted to make our way through the crowd of hotel agents on the quay, all of whom were jabbering away, as they do elsewhere, to the great annoyance and confusion of the lady passengers, and the utter bewilderment of some of the Johnnys, who didn't understand one word of all that was said. A few could speak English enough to mention the name of the hotel. "Will you go to de Hotel de Nord, sir? c'est un tres bon hotel;" "Hotel de l'Europe, un grand hotel—magnifique," and a half dozen other different cries, filled my ears. I brushed them all aside, and as I had determined to go to the first-named house, I collared the first man who announced himself as the agent of it, and gave him to understand that we would go with him. Leaving the ladies at the hotel, I went to the custom-house to pass the baggage. I found the officers very obliging and pleasant, and after a merely nominal examination, the trunks were resigned to me, and I left with a very pleasant impression resulting from my first official intercourse with Frenchmen. Next morning I rose and rambled out into the town before breakfast. It is a quaint old place, apparently having little trade or manufactures, and of not much importance, save to its inhabitants. I passed through the fish market, on the open quay, and stopped to look at the fish, strange to me, mostly—skates, conger-eels, which with dog-fish were the principal articles in market. The market-women, dressed in plain colored woolen skirts, and waists of a different color, with high conical white caps on their heads, were gathered in gay groups, chatting and laughing with the fishermen and other young men who lounged about the market-place in considerable numbers. As I approached near the entrance into the harbor, I passed a cross, about 15 feet high, on which was an effigy of Christ, with the Virgin below on a little pedestal. The figures were of wood, rudely carved and painted, and about half the size of life. A similar one was placed on the opposite side of the entrance. In returning to the hotel I visited the fine old Cathedral. It is very large, though not in very good repair. I entered, and found the priests engaged in matins, with a small congregation, and walked around looking at the old pictures and the carvings, when I heard a loud voice begin to sing a hymn, and a small procession came down the aisle, headed by a priest bearing a crucifix elevated before him. Observing the people bow as it passed, and not knowing but my refusal to do the same might subject me to unpleasant consequences, I left the church; but I had hardly got outside the door when the procession passed me. It consisted of two priests, a woman carrying a little coffin under her arm, and one or two other persons. They passed through the square in front of the church with a rapid step, the bystanders slightly saluting the crucifix, or not, as they felt devotionally or otherwise inclined. The hymn died away in the distance ere I moved from the place where I stood, when, having finished my survey of the cathedral, I returned to the hotel in time for an early breakfast.

Leaving Dieppe at 11 A. M., we proceeded to Paris by railroad, the road lying mostly through the beautiful valley of the Seine. We reached Paris at about 4 P. M., and finding a friend waiting with whom we were to stay, we took a carriage directly for her residence, in the little village of Champ Peret, just outside the walls, and near the banks of the Seine. Our little cottage stands amid grain-fields and vine-yards, sufficiently retired for quiet, and yet within a comfortable walk of the attractive part of Paris. The day after, we walked into the city when the heat of the day was over. We passed the massive walls which surround the city, as the people commonly say, to defend, not so much Paris from the country, as the country from the Parisians. Passing under the triumphal arch of Napoleon—a stupendous work, covered with bas reliefs, commemorative of his battles, and symbolical groups of figures, some of which are very beautiful—we entered the Champs Elysees, the fashionable drive of Paris. There is perhaps no other place that gives you so great ideas of magnificence and taste as that between the Champs Elysees and the Tuileries, including the glorious Place de Concorde, with its fountains and the stately edifices around it, and the gardens of the Tuileries, with groves beneath whose dense foliage you may find at midday the darkness and coolness of twilight. Standing in front of the hall of the National Assembly, you may see the whole—the palace of the Tuileries, the public offices, the obelisk of Luxor, and the long avenues of trees on either side, while in the distance is the church of the Madelaine, begun by Napoleon as a temple to the memory of the great men of France. But to attempt to describe the objects in Paris worthy of notice, were to write a book, and even then it would convey no adequate idea of the place. To see this part of Paris in the evening is worth the trouble of coming here. Through the groves along the Champs Elysees are restaurants with pavilions, where are placed bands of music and singers, around which, in the open air, sit hundreds of the gay and light-hearted people, over their wine, or whatever else they choose to call for, enjoying, as in Paris only they can be enjoyed, the freshness and coolness of a summer's evening. The avenues are brilliantly lit up, and the fountains sparkle with an almost magical effect in the light, and here and there a merry party come along singing in chorus some popular song. All seems freedom and happiness, and the old man who plays away independently at the foot of one of the fine old trees, seems to care less about the sous he occasionally receives, than he does about playing and being heard. Let us take a seat within the chain which defines the precincts of one of the musical restaurants, and calling for a bottle of wine, beer, sherbet, or what you most fancy, we may sit for hours listening to passages from the opera songs, comic and sentimental, interspersed with instrumental music from a small but fine band. The singers here are paid generally 200 francs per month, and some of them sing very well. Every pleasant evening the people gather here in great numbers, while on Sunday and fete evenings there are fetes champetres in the gardens which are found in every part of the city and its vicinity. I attended one on Sunday last at Asnieres, a former chateau and park just across the Seine from Champ Peret. The chateau had been a splendid mansion, with extensive grounds, but after the revolution was rented as a restaurant. There is a long avenue of trees leading to the park, lit by colored lamps suspended from cords stretched across from one tree to the opposite. This avenue is perhaps the eighth of a mile or more long, and introduces us into a circular place in front of the chateau, surrounded by fine old trees, and lit up with a fairy-land splendor. The trees are hung full of globe lamps of every color, and on lines running over head are chandeliers, the lamps of which are covered with colored designs of various kinds. The moon was up, but its light could not be distinguished for the brilliancy of the lamps. In this open space were little tables, at which were gathered those who felt disposed to indulge in the grosser pleasures of sense, and under the trees or through the walks which ran off in every direction, wandered couples and small parties of those who cared more for social pleasures. Taking the course which most of them seem to follow, we come to a large saloon formed by the long lines of trees which, growing close together, are the only walls, and are joined together overhead in an arched canopy, which still preserves its greenness in the light of the thousands of lamps festooned in every way overhead. On the smooth hard ground, forming the floor, are hundreds of dancers whirling through the mazes of the polka, waltz, quadrille, or other dance, at the pleasure of the band which performs in a pavilion at the end. At the side are seats rising one above another for the convenience of those who prefer looking to dancing, and who, between the pauses of the dance, join in the promenade, or chat with the gentlemen who come to seek partners for the next set. I witnessed here a notable instance of the enthusiasm of Frenchmen even in the most trivial things. The band struck up a favorite and beautiful polka, the most important part of which was given by the leader on a cornet—a most beautiful and difficult piece of instrumentation. At every repetition of the passage, the applause increased—the dancers and spectators throwing up their hats, waving their handkerchiefs, clapping and cheering, till at the conclusion he was pulled down from his place and borne around the saloon on the shoulders of the delighted Gauls. At ten o'clock there was a display of fireworks, and at eleven the fete broke up. The life of Parisians is a succession of such pleasures, and one of themselves remarked to me, that a Frenchman will work hard all day, being on the move from morning to evening, and then go to a fete or ball, and dance all night, day after day. There is but one night in the year in which there is not a ball or several of them in some part of Paris. On Good Friday they limit themselves to concerts of sacred music. Sunday is the general fete day, the magazines or stores being open till afternoon, when the whole population betake themselves to some of the many fashionable places of resort, to enjoy their Sabbath. This seems to me quite as meritorious as, and much more rational than, the irksome and custom-compelled observance of the same day in London. The French have the true appreciation of Sunday, and don't care to clog their enjoyment by hypocritical pretensions for a regard they do not feel. One thing is sure, I shall make all the amends in my power for the Sundays I have lost immured in London.

"LET ME GO, FOR THE DAY BREAKETH."

GENESIS 13: 26.

Let me go, the day is breaking,
Earthly scenes are fading fast;
Joys that were my heart awaking,
Hopes and fears are with the past.
Earthly visions now are darkling,
And the City's golden glow
Gleams before me, pure and sparkling,
In the distance—let me go!

Angel hosts resplendent shining,
Wait me at the river's side,
And my eager heart is pining,
But to meet them on the tide.
I can see the life-founts gushing—
I can hear their silvery flow;
Joys a countless throng are rushing
On my spirit—let me go!

He, the wounded, the forsaken,
In the death-hour sore dismayed,
All my grief and fear has taken,
All my debt of sin has paid.
I can see his God like brightness
Through the form he wore below,
On a throne of dazzling whiteness;
And he calls me—let me go.

Friends, the early loved, the cherished,
Parted from our paths like dew,
With the mortal have not perished—
I behold them pure and true,
Lovelier in that far dominion,
E'en than when we loved them so;
And they stood with drooping pinion,
To enfold me—let me go!

Lay me gently on my pillow,
Weary are my thorn-pierced feet;
Christ has calmed that boisterous billow,
And the rest beyond is glorious vision,
Ye would not detain me so;
Now the homeward gales Elysian
Woo my spirit—let me go!

DEATH OF NEANDER.

Correspondence of the Boston Traveler.

Berlin, July 22, 1850.

Neander is no more! He who for thirty-eight years has defeated the attacks upon the church of rationalism and philosophy—who, through all the controversies among theologians in Germany, has remained true to the faith of his adoption, the pure and holy religion of Jesus Christ—Neander, the philosopher, the scholar—better, the great and good man—has been taken from the world.

August Neander was born in Gottingen, of Jewish parentage, in 1787; studied at the Gymnasium at Hamburgh; at the age of 17 was converted to Christianity and baptized. After his conversion, he went to Halle to study theology under Schleirmacher. Having completed his studies, he was first appointed in 1841 private lecturer in Heidelburg, and in 1812 professor at the newly founded University in Berlin. He was never married, but lived with his maiden sister. Often have I seen the two walking arm in arm upon the streets and in the parks of the city. Neander's habit of abstraction and short sightedness rendered it necessary for him to have a guide whenever he left his study to take a walk, or to go to his lecture room. Generally, a student walked with him to the University, and just before it was time for his lecture to close, his sister could be seen walking up and down on the opposite side of the street, waiting to accompany him home.

Meeting him in the street, with his sister, you never would have suspected that such a strange-looking being could be Neander. He formerly had two sisters, but a few years ago the favorite one died. It was a trying affliction, and for a short interval he was quite overcome, but suddenly he dried his tears, calmly declared his firm faith and reliance in the wise purpose of God in taking her to himself, and resumed his lectures immediately, as if nothing had happened to disturb his serenity.

Neander's charity was unbounded. Poor students were not only presented with free tickets to his lectures, but were often provided by him with money and clothing. Not a farthing of the money received for his lectures ever went to supply his own wants; it was all given away for benevolent purposes.

The income from his writings was bestowed upon the missionary, Bible, and other societies, and upon hospitals. Thoughts of himself never seem to obtrude upon his mind. He would sometimes give away to a poor student all the money he had in his possession the moment the request was made—even his new coat, retaining the old one for himself. You have known this great man in your country more from his books than in any other way; but here, where he has lived, his private character, his piety, his charity, have distinguished him above all others. It would be difficult to decide whether the influence of his example has not been as great as that of his writings upon the thousands of young men who have been his pupils. Protestants, Catholics, nearly all the leading preachers throughout Germany, have attended his lectures, and all have been more or less guided by him.

While philosophy has been for years attempting to usurp the place of religion, Neander has been the chief instrument in combatting it, and in keeping the true faith constantly before the students. Strauss's celebrated "Life of Jesus" created almost a revolution in the theological world. At the time of its appearance, the Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs consulted Neander's opinion as to the propriety of prohibiting its sale in Prussia. Neander, who was at that time reading lectures upon the "Life of Christ," replied, that as his opinions were in direct opposition to those of Strauss, he would write a book in which he would endeavor to confute the dangerous positions taken by that author. He could not advise to the prohibition of the work—it had already taken its place in the scientific world, and could only be put down by argument. "Our Savior," said he, "needs not the assistance of man to maintain his church upon earth." Neander's principal lectures were upon church history, dogmatics, patristics, and the books of the New Testament.

His lecture room was always well filled, and one could see from his earnest manner that his whole soul was engaged in the work—that it was to him a labor of love. Neander's writings have been translated, and are well known in America. The principal among them are, "Julian and his Times," 1812. "St. Bernard and his Times," 1813. "The development of the Gnostic System," 1818. "St. Chrysostom," 1822. "History of the Christian Church," which has reached its tenth volume. "The Anti-Gnostics," "Planting of the church by the Apostles," 1832. "Life of Jesus," in reply to Strauss, 1837.

He was better acquainted with church history and the writings of the Fathers than any one of his time. It has been the custom upon the recurrence of his birthday, for the students to present to him a rare edition of one of the Fathers, and thus he has come to have one of the most complete sets of their writings to be found in any library.

Turning from his great literary attainments, from all considerations suggested by his profound learning, it is pleasant to contemplate the pure Christian character of the man. Although born a Jew, his whole life seemed to be a sermon upon the text, "That disciple whom Jesus loved, said unto Peter, It is the Lord!" Neander's life resembled more "that disciple's" than any other. He was the loving John, the new church Father of our times.

His sickness was only of a few [illegible] his lecture as usual. The next day he was seized with a species of cholera. A day or two of pain was followed by a lucid interval, when the physicians were encouraged to hope for his recovery. During this interval he dictated a page in his "Church History," and then said to his sister—"I am weary—let us go home." He needed no further preparation; his whole life had been the best preparation, and up to the last moment we see him active in his master's service. The disease returned with redoubled force, a day or two more of suffering, and on Sunday, less than a week from the day of attack, he was dead.

MAULMAIN BAPTIST MISSION.

Mr. Wm. Moore, missionary to the Karens, writes under date of Feb. 20, 1850, giving repeated evidences of the terror and distress produced by the ravages of the Cholera. Among the incidents of a recent missionary tour, was the following:—

"One old man, of Portuguese descent, who was shipwrecked on this coast when a lad, and has since lived among the Karens, said he was rejoiced to see a teacher come to the village once more. He had long and earnestly exhorted his neighbors to become Christians and be baptized, but they would not listen to him. All they cared for was arrack, and the devil's customs. His eldest son, three months ago, in following the wicked custom of tattooing, took so much opium to deaden his feelings during the painful operation that he never woke up. 'If he had been a good Christian,' said his father, 'he would have been alive yet.' But alas for the deceitfulness of the human heart! With all the old man's anxiety for the salvation of his neighbors, he does not realize that he himself is still living in resolute rebellion against God. In reply to earnest exhortations to immediate repentance, he said he knew he must believe in Jesus Christ, and as we took our leave he gave me a dozen eggs, a fowl, many good wishes, and an invitation to come again."

Of the little church at Krungpung, he says:—

"The little band of disciples here, with one exception, remain steadfast in the faith, and manifest an increasing interest in the things of religion. Three persons were received into the church by baptism, and one by letter, making the present number eighteen. All the materials are prepared and on the ground for a new and permanent house of worship. The villagers have heretofore been very wicked, and prejudiced against all good. This year they appeared more friendly. Several families say they have cast off the priests, which is an omen of good, but they do not yet manifest an inclination to seek the true religion."

On visiting a neighboring village, the people said that—

"Ten years ago, Miss Macomber visited them once; three or four years ago, teacher Bullard remained there a night, or 'a piece of a day;' now I was doing little more than passing through their villages; the native preachers did not come often nor stay long. 'How can we know about God in this way?' I endeavored to impress upon them that it was a solemn thing to hear the Gospel.

"On our way home we spent another Saturday and Sunday at Keyen. We found the church in awakened state, and four candidates awaiting baptism, anxious to manifest their love for the Savior by obeying his commands. Two or three cases required, or will require, discipline. Two young men had been absent a week who, it was supposed, had gone to get tattooed. The rage for tattooing is by no means diminishing among the Pwos. I know of but one young man who has had the moral courage to withstand the temptation, and preserve that body unscarred that God pronounced good. As all the Watchmen do not see eye to eye in respect to this barbarous custom, I know not when it shall receive a check even among the Christians."

Mr. Harris writes, March 20th:—

"At some villages the people fled from their relatives who were sick of Cholera, and left them to die without burial. One night the assistants were obliged to sleep in the tops of the trees, because they could not find any one who would receive them into his house. Though thirsty, they dared not go down for water through fear of tigers. During the dry season, I have baptized seventeen, making, in all thirty within a year. The native pastors have baptized as many or more."

ANECDOTE OF HUGH L. WHITE.

The late lamented Judge Hugh L. White, of Tennessee, became conspicuous, at a very early period of life, as a jurist and a statesman. He fixed his permanent home near Knoxville, amid the scenes of his youthful sports and the companions of his boyish days. Rarely has a young man, continuing in his own country and among his own kindred, so soon attained such literary and political preeminence. From his youth the Judge was characterized by profound reverence for the ordinances of the Gospel. He was a regular attendant at the house of worship. And while he was a Presbyterian, that being the church of his choice, he was benevolent and generous towards other branches of the Christian family, and often attended the Methodist church. In those days there was a presiding elder in that region, called Father Axley, a pious, laboring, uncompromising preacher of the Gospel, who considered it his duty to rebuke sin wherever it should presume to lift its deformed head within the limits of his district. And while Father Axley was a man of respectable talents, undoubted piety, and great ministerial fidelity, he had moreover a spice of hu- rarely failed to impart a characteristic tinge to his performances. The consequence was, that amusing anecdotes of the sayings and doings of Father Axley abounded throughout the country.

On a certain day, a number of lawyers and literary men were together in the town of Knoxville, and the conversation turned on the subject of preaching and preachers. One and another had expressed his opinion of the performances of this and that pulpit orator. At length Judge White spoke up:

"Well, gentlemen, on this subject each man is, of course, entitled to his own opinion; but I must confess that Father Axley brought me to a sense of my evil deeds—at least a portion of them, more effectually than any preacher I ever heard."

At this every eye and ear was turned; for Judge White was known never to speak lightly on religious subjects, and moreover he was habitually cautious and respectful in his remarks concerning religious men. The company now expressed the most urgent desire that the Judge would give the particulars, and expectation stood on tiptoe.

"I went up," said the Judge, "one evening, to the Methodist church. A sermon was preached by a clergyman with whom I was not acquainted; but Father Axley was in the pulpit. At the close of the sermon he arose and said to the congregation: 'I am not going to detain you by giving an exhortation. I have risen simply to administer a rebuke for improper conduct, which I have observed here to-night.' This, of course, waked up the entire assembly, and the stillness was most profound, while Axley stood and looked, for two or three seconds, over the congregation. Then, stretching out his large, long arm, and pointing with his finger steadily in one direction, 'Now,' said he, 'I calculate that those two young men who were talking and laughing in that corner of the house, while the brother was preaching, think that I am going to talk about them. Well, it is true, that it looks very bad, when well-dressed young men, who, you would suppose from their appearance, belonged to some genteel, respectable family, come to the house of God, and instead of reverencing the majesty of Him that dwelleth therein, or attending to the messages of his everlasting love, get together in one corner of the house (his finger all this time pointing steady, and straight as the aim of a rifleman), and there, through the whole solemn service, keep talking, tittering, laughing, giggling, thus annoying the minister, disturbing the congregation, and sinning against God. I am sorry for the young men. I am sorry for their parents. I am sorry they have done so to-night. I hope they'll never do so again. But, however, that's not the thing that I'm going to talk about. It is another matter, and so important that I thought it would be wrong to suffer the congregation to depart without administering a rebuke. Now,' said he, stretching his huge arm, and pointing in another direction, 'perhaps that man, who was asleep on the bench out there, while the brother was preaching, thinks I'm going to talk about him. Well, I must confess it looks very bad for a man to come into a worshiping assembly, and, instead of taking his seat like others, and listening to the blessed Gospel, carelessly stretch himself out on a bench and go to sleep! It is not only a proof of great insensibility with regard to the obligations which we owe to our Creator and Redeemer, but it shows a want of genteel breeding. It shows that the poor man has been so unfortunate in his bringing up, as not to have been taught good manners. He dosen't know what is polite and respectful in a worshiping assembly, among whom he comes to mingle. I am sorry for the poor man. I am sorry for the poor family to which he belongs. I am sorry he did not know better. I hope he will never do so again. But, however, that is not what I am going to talk about.' Thus Father Axley went on for some time, 'boxing the compass,' and hitting a number of persons and things that 'he was not going to talk about,' and hitting them hard, till the attention and curiosity of the audience were raised to the highest pitch; he finally remarked, 'The thing of which I was going to talk is chewing tobacco. Now I do hope, when any gentleman comes here to church, who can't keep from chewing tobacco during the hours of public worship, that he will just take his hat, and put it before him, and spit in it. You know we are Methodists. You know that our custom is to kneel when we pray. Now, any gentleman may see in a moment how exceedingly inconvenient it must be for a well-dressed Methodist lady to be compelled to kneel down in a great puddle of tobacco spit!'

"Now," said Judge White, "at this very time I had in my mouth an uncommonly large quid of tobacco. Axley's singular manner and train of remark had strongly arrested my attention. While he was striking right and left, hitting those 'things' that he was not going to talk about, my curiosity was roused, and conjecture was busy in finding out what he could be aiming at. I was chewing my huge quid with uncommon rapidity, and spitting, and looking up at the preacher to catch every word and every gesture; and when at last he pounced on the tobacco, behold, there I had a 'great puddle' of tobacco spit! I slipped the quid out of my mouth, and dashed it as far as I could under the seat, resolving never again to be found chewing tobacco in a Methodist church."

ADVICE TO YOUNG LADIES.

The editress of the Literary Gazette, Mrs. Lydia Jane Pearson, in an article addressed to young ladies upon the subject of marriage, discourses as follows:—

"Do not, as you value life and its comforts, marry a man who is naturally cruel. If he will wantonly torture a poor dumb dog, a cat, or even a snake, fly from him as you would from cholera. We would sooner see our daughter dying of cholera, than married to in torture, he will not spare his wife, or his helpless children. When we see a man practicing cruelty or beating a fractious horse unmercifully, we write over against his name—devil, and shun him accordingly.

"We once knew a man, aye, a gentleman, who, during a ride for pleasure, became so demoniacally enraged at his horse, which refused to go, that he sprung from his carriage, drew his knife, and cut out an eye of the poor brute. The lady who accompanied him fainted, suffered a long nervous illness, and will never recover from the horror the outrage gave her. And we know the young lady who, knowing this of him, was fool-hardy enough to become his wife. And we know how he tortured her; how he outraged all her feelings; how he delighted to destroy whatever she prized, or took pleasure in; how in his fits of passion he broke up her furniture, seized her by the shoulder and shook her till she could not crawl to bed; how he beat her; how he kept her poor babe black and blue with blows, and pinched her until her parents took her home, and sheltered her from his cruelty.

"If you have a suitor whom you feel inclined to favor, look narrowly into the temper and disposition of the man. Love may soften it for a while, or it may induce him to restrain or disguise it, but, be assured, the natural temper will remain, and the time will come, when your presence will be no restraint upon him. We have heard wives complain, 'I was so deceived in my husband; men are so deceitful,' &c. But we believe, in nine cases out of ten, these women deceived themselves. They suffered the romance of their own foolish hearts to adorn their lover with all the excellencies which their fancy attributed to a perfect, manly character, and to draw a veil over all its vices and defects, which, if it did not conceal them, greatly softened or disguised their features.

"Men are not perfect—women are not perfect. In all cases, there must exist a necessity to bear and forbear, but it does not therefore follow that you should marry a bad man, knowing him to be a bad man. If you do so, you deserve chastisement; but a life-long misery is a terrible punishment. A bad man's wife must either live in a continual disappointment of her fruitless efforts to please; or she must become callous, cold, insensible to pain, and consequently to pleasure. Will you take upon yourself either of these terribls alternatives? We hope not."

Every Christian Should Labor.—Dr. Wayland, speaking of the Christians who were dispersed by the first persecution of the church of Jerusalem, says, "This little band of disciples accomplished more for the conversion of the world then all the christians of the present day, united, have done." Does any one ask why? "Because," says he, "every individual felt that the conversion of the world was the work to which he himself, and not an abstraction called the church, was responsible. Instead of relying on man for aid, every man looked directly up to God to forward the work. God was thus exalted, his power was confessed; and very soon, in a few years, the standard of the cross was carried to the remotest extreme of the then known world."

By request of several Members.

TERMS OF COMMUNION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :—

Nearly every denomination has a creed, differing in some peculiar points from the creeds of other denominations, which its members are required to believe. These creeds not only form the test of membership, but also draw the line of demarkation at the celebration and commemoration of the Sacrament or Lord's Supper. However devoted a Christian a man may be; though he may pray with the fervor of a Daniel, and preach with the boldness of a Paul, and, like him, declare the whole counsel of God; but few Christian churches will extend to him the privilege of partaking with them of the emblems of our Lord's death, unless he is a member of a church receiving their peculiar creed. A man in full fellowship with a church of one denomination, may remove his location to a place where there is no church of the order to which he belongs; but a church of another denomination is there, which he regularly attends. He is regarded by the members of this church as a sincere worshiper and a Christian. They believe in the same God, in the same Savior of the world, and the same gospel. They sing the same praises together; they lift up their hearts together in prayer to the Father of all, and regard each other as sincere followers of the Redeemer. But there is one duty which Christ enjoined upon his disciples just before his death, which this brother cannot observe with these brethren with whom he has worshiped in harmony and union, without infringing upon the rules of the churches to which they respectively belong. It is the institution of the Lord's Supper. The emblems of the Lord's body are partaken of by all except this brother. "And why not allow this brother also to partake?" says one; "do you not consider him a Christian, worthy to share with you all the privileges of the Christian church?" "O yes," answer the members of the church, "we think this brother as good and as worthy as we are; but the RULES of our church do not allow us to commemorate the death and sufferings of the Savior with any church that does not hold our creed; and, by the same rules, no one is allowed to participate with us, who is not a member of our church; and his church holds the same principles. So, if we would commune with him, he would not with us." Now, I ask, why should rules be made by a Christian church to exclude to debar him from praying in a church of which he is not a member. It appears to me that Christians who can sing, pray, and worship together, with the "spirit and understanding," should not put up bars to prevent a member of one church from participating in all the ordinances of the gospel in any other. The question is too often asked, "Does such an one believe in our creed?" The mere believing in the articles of confession of a church, does not necessarily make one a Christian. The question should be, Is the man a Christian? Does he live the life of a Christian? Does he do as he would be done by? Does he seek truth, obey conscience, and trust in God? Paul, speaking of the Lord's Supper, to his Corinthian brethren, says, "But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup." In my opinion, there are many sincere Christians, who, like these Corinthian brethren, say, "I am of Paul, and I am of Apollos," and like them also forget that it is Paul that plants and Apollos that waters, but God alone giveth the increase.

ONE BROUGHT UP TO KEEP THE SEVENTH DAY.

Remarks.

With all those who advocate mixed or unrestricted communion in the Lord's Supper, the idea which seems to be uppermost in their minds is, that the ordinance is designed, primarily and principally, as a test of Christian fellowship. Hence it seems like insincerity of the most glaring kind, to invite members of other churches to pray in our assemblies, to preach in our pulpits, and to do such other offices as imply their Christian character, and then, when the season for celebrating the dying love of Christ comes round, to refuse them the privilege of partaking with us. Our view of the ordinance is, however, that it is designed rather as a commemoration of the sufferings of Christ, than as a test of our fraternal regard for one another. "As oft as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, YE DO SHOW FORTH THE LORD'S DEATH till he come." "This do IN REMEMBRANCE of me." In rejecting others, we do not mean to declare that they have no interest in the fact which it commemorates. We only mean to be true to the order which, we think, Christ has established in his house.

Our argument in justification of strict communion is simply this: That where we cannot exercise discipline, there we have no right to extend the ordinance.

Now it is clear, that we can secure the exercise of discipline no where but in our own churches. Suppose, then, that we should practice open or mixed communion. A person comes forward, and claims a seat with us, who is a member of another denomination. We know him to be one who is unworthy of the Christian name. His conduct shows, that he has no saving interest in Christ. Or, if we do not know it ourselves, it is known to others, and even to the church to which he belongs. His church, however, neglects to bring him to account; on the contrary, it retains him in full fellowship. What shall we do in such a case? We can do nothing. He participates in the emblems of Christ's death, in spite of us, availing himself of our open communion system. We can exercise no discipline in the case; he is beyond our reach. Even if we are aware of his character, if we know him well, he is beyond our reach, being amenable to another body. Or, the fact that he belongs to another denomination places him so much beyond the scope of our observation, that we cannot detect him to report his character to his church, even if that would remedy the matter. Hence we have no alternative, but to shut up the door, and confine the ordinance to those over whom we can exercise discipline, and who are so much under our watch-care, that we can detect them when they do wrong.

But that we may better understand the impracticabillity of mixed communion, let us consider it in reference to our denominational peculiarity, the Sabbath. We consider the Sabbath a necessary and important part of that law which was given to Adam—a necessary part, therefore, of that law, the transgression of which makes men sinners before God. It is impossible for us, therefore, to view those who disregard it in any other light than as sinners. It may be that their guilt or criminality is not very great. That, however, depends upon the amount of light they have had on the subject. If they have had the question fully placed before them, so as to understand it perfectly, their guilt is great. If, on the other hand, they neglect the Sabbath through ignorance of its claims, their guilt is not so great but that it may be hoped of them that they are God's people. But how are we to decide this point? The extent to which light has affected their minds, is something which we cannot determine; it is more a matter of consciousness with themselves. We are, therefore, thrown back on the necessity of regarding them as their actions characterize them—sinners against the divine law.

Were such persons members with us, they would at once be subjected to discipline, and for their violation of the Sabbath, would be excommunicated from our churches. Shall we, then, admit to the Lord's table those whom, if they were our own members, we would at once excommunicate? Shall we, while we reject them from all other church privileges, admit them to the very highest and most exalted of them all?—thus by one act counting them worthy of fellowship, and by another as utterly unworthy.

But let us look at the operation of the principle a little farther. One of our own members, who has for years lived in the light of all the truth concerning the Sabbath, suddenly [illegible] towards us. He conducts himself in a disorderly manner, and finally we excommunicate him. The next thing we hear of him is, that he has joined a first-day church, and is at work on the Sabbath. But he happens to be present at one of our communion seasons. Suppose, now, that we throw the door wide open, and, after the manner of some denominations, invite all to come forward who feel themselves entitled to the ordinance, whether members or not. This man, who, a few weeks before, was so disorderly that we could not retain him among us, and who, in spite of all the light he possesses, has gone to work on the Sabbath day, comes up and claims a seat. Shall we receive him?

Such cases are not improbable; and it is easy to conceive, that the operation of the principle would be the same in reference to other things besides the Sabbath. It is no uncommon thing for a person to conduct himself in such a disorderly manner, and exhibit a spirit so much at variance with the spirit of Christ, that he can no longer be tolerated in Church fellowship, and he is accordingly expelled. It is no uncommon thing for such a person to go immediately and join some other sect. On the principle of mixed communion, there is no way of preventing him from participating in those symbols, of which he is known to be, and has already been pronounced to be, unworthy. This is not an imaginary evil, but one which has been felt, more or less, by almost all denominations which are organized upon the mixed communion platform.

It may be said, that notwithstanding such difficulties, we should leave those who thus unworthily obtrude themselves at the Lord's table, to answer for their own conduct at the bar of God, rather than exclude so many persons really worthy. "Let it be between God and their own consciences," we often hear. So it might be, if the act could be altogether their own, and no one else necessitated to participate in it. But there is not only the act of the individual himself, in obtruding himself at the table, but there is also our act in administering to him the symbols. All that we claim to do in the case, is to regulate our own conduct, not his.

With regard to our own members, it is absolutely required of us—nay, it is demanded by public opinion, as well as by the Scriptures—that we withhold from them the sacred symbols, in case their conduct requires it. Why, then, is it demanded of us, that we extend these symbols to a class of persons over whom it is not in our power to exercise such discipline? Why must there be two classes of persons seated at the Lord's table upon such unequal terms? Surely, that would not look like the Lord's table. His people are seated there upon terms of perfect equality.

On the whole, we conclude, that the ordinance of the Lord's Supper belongs to the Church, and to the church only. It belongs to that body where discipline is lodged. It belongs to that society which is constituted after the model of the New Testament.

Our Baptist brethren, in defending the practice of strict communion, have generally rested the argument upon the indispensable necessity of baptism as a prerequisite to the ordinance. They maintain that, according to the constitution of Apostolic churches, none were ever admitted to the ordinance except such as had first been baptized. This is very clear; and since nothing short of the immersion of the believer in water deserves to be called baptism, they are unquestionably correct in rejecting all who have not submitted to immersion. Yet we question whether this is more than a superficial view of the case. At all events, it sets forth a principle which cannot be made to stop with baptism. For, if the mode in which the Apostles proceeded in the organization of churches is an inspired pattern for us to follow, it will be found to be no more a fact that the early churches were composed exclusively of baptized believers, than that they were composed of Sabbath keepers; and the Supper was no more limited to baptized persons, than it was to those who "counted the Sabbath a delight." The inspired pattern is, therefore, just as applicable to our denominational peculiarity, as it is to that of our first-day Baptist brethren. The true doctrine of the institution is, that it is a church ordinance, and that it is to be administered co-extensively with the power of exercising discipline.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 10.

Sunday Desecration—Miracle to reprove it—The Jew Question in Parliament—Mr. Gorham Installed—An Agricultural Fair, &c.

GLASGOW, August 9th, 1850.

Notwithstanding all that has been said and done for the prevention of Sunday desecration, it still goes on. Even in Scotland, the Caledonian, the Scottish Central, the North British, the Aberdeen, and the Edinburgh and Northern Railways, all run passenger trains on Sundays; while on the Scottish Central, there is an early goods train every Sunday morning, which, it is stated, left off trucks containing iron, hides, &c., at the Stirling station, on a Sunday last month. In England, nearly all the railways run Sunday trains; and in some of the towns there is an amount of Sunday trading that is unknown amongst us in the North. Its extent in London is greatly on the increase; and repeatedly, of late years, has an attempt been made to get an Act of Parliament for its restraint. In the Bills of former years, introduced with this view, it was designed to be very stringent. It was found, however, that such measures had little favor in the eyes of many [illegible] in Parliament; and each successor of this Bill, which its rejection occasioned, was modified in its demands. That which was introduced this session, took lower ground still than any of its predecessors. Mr. Pearson, to whom it was entrusted, in moving that it be read a second time in the House of Commons, on the 24th of July, said that the object was "to discountenance Sunday Trading, not upon religious grounds, but for civil reasons." This, he said, was evident from its "many exceptions, which warred against the Sabbath," [meaning Sunday.] He himself had frequent occasion to labor on the Sunday. He was ready, he said, to abandon some of the details of the Bill, and modify others. As it stood, it was to allow the sale of fish, milk, meat, and fruit; beer, wine, spirits, and tobacco. Shops for the sale of newspapers were also to be allowed to be open. Yet even this Bill could not be got passed. It was withdrawn on the 31st of July.

The Christian Times said, last month, that every Sunday, "while two millions of our countrymen are in attendance on divine worship, double that number are reading the various Sunday newspapers, either at the taverns, or at the cottage door, or by the fireside, and detailing to the childhood and womanhood of operative life the poisonous garbage that commonly forms their contents." It therefore laments the want of law to restore Sunday to the place which the Sabbath of the Lord alone should occupy. But while the British Legislature is so remiss in this respect for its friends, aid comes from a very unexpected quarter—the very source of Sunday sanctification. In the Church of Rome the fame of an available miracle in behalf of the Sunday is attracting crowds. Mr. Weld, in his Summer Ramble in Auvergne, Piedmont, and Savoy, (just published,) gives account of his meeting in his travels with a priest having in charge a large can of "miraculous water," from a spring near the top of a mountain in the commune of Corps and department of the Huntes Alpes, rendered sacred by an apparition of the Virgin. To two children of the hamlet of La Sallette, near the spring, she said, "My son is sorely troubled at the wickedness of his people in this part of France. The Sundays are desecrated; blasphemy is common; evil deeds are of every day occurrence. I have had great difficulty in arresting His avenging hand, nor have I entirely succeeded in doing so—for already your potatoes have been blighted. Be sure, if such things continue, that your corn will be destroyed, and your cattle will perish by disease." A miracle of this kind, it would seem, is more easily procured in favor of the Sunday, than a Scripture text, or even than an Act of the British Legislature. And although our Protestant friends, who keep the Popish-made day, may slight the miracle thus avouched for upholding it, I do not remember that any greater wonder was averred as a reason for commencing the practice they so devoutly continue.

At the last General Election of Members of Parliament, Baron Rothschild and Lord John Russell were returned as members for the city of London. What influence the Baron could command at the election, was, it is understood, given in favor of the Prime Minister, who was expected to lend a hand in getting the Baron through the difficulty which the usual form and terms of the oaths presented to a Jew. A measure was, accordingly, brought in by his Lordship, in 1848, to obviate this difficulty. The attempt was, however, defeated by the House of Lords, and renewed without success in 1849. The Baron, by a form of the House, resigned, and appealing again to his constituents, was reëlected, and the Government had promised to introduce a Bill altering the oaths, which in the usual form make the person attest "on the true faith of a Christian." The Bill introduced in an earlier part of the session, was crowded out towards its close; and the Baron having called a meeting of his constituents, it was agreed that he should present himself to be sworn. He did so, and a scene of confusion and strife ensued, and repeated adjournments of the debate followed. The Baron asked to be allowed to swear on the Old Testament alone, instead of the Old and New Testaments together. This was granted, in accordance with a law of recent enactment, which authorizes any individual to swear in the form most binding on his conscience. He thus took the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. The next and last was that of Abjuration, which is the one containing the objectionable clause. The Baron proceeded, repeating the form of this oath till, coming to the words, "On the true faith of a Christian," he paused, and said, "I omit these words, as they are not binding on my conscience." The discussion was adjourned, and on being resumed, he was prevented taking his seat; but the House is to revise the oath, and it is not unlikely that the Baron may be successful in getting admission to Parliament next session, the Attorney General having moved the resolution which contemplates a suitable adaptation of the oath. The Lords can scarcely hope to be successful, if the Commons are resolved. Looking at the matter in the light of the Lord, it may be a step towards that condition of Israel of which Ezekiel speaks at the time of their restoration, when they shall say, "We will be as the heathen;" and for which God says, "I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you face to face. Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with [illegible] God." (Ezek. 20: 32—38.) The ameliorations in their condition, and the influence which the Jews are now acquiring in Europe, are tending to make a large number of them neglectful of the promises given unto the fathers, and preparing them for yet dark scenes portrayed by the prophets.

Unexpectedly, on Tuesday last, in the Prorogative Court in London, the Rev. Mr. Gorham was introduced to Sir H. J. Fust, Principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury. Having signed the Articles, and taken the customary oaths, he received from this lay Doctor of Laws, "true, lawful, canonical institution," and "the care of the souls of the parishioners" of Bampford-cum-Speke, with the defeated but protesting Bishop of Exeter as his Diocesan.

Since last we wrote, the Wesleyan Annual Conference has held a session in London, acting with the same high-handed despotism which has recently excited so much dissatisfaction in their denomination; at Edinburgh, the Annual Meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, with more than usual satisfaction; and, at Glasgow, the Highland Society's Annual Exhibition of Cattle and Implements employed for the furtherance of Agriculture. This has been an influential Society for good, both in Scotland and England. With that part of their proceedings which gives prizes for over-fed cattle, artifically-made monsters, whose flesh is rendered unfit for human food, we have no sympathy; but their fostering care has also been extended to the maintenance of breeds best adapted for our soil and climate, and of animals of finest symmetry. The greatest advantage, however, derived from their labors, has been through the improvements they encourage, by commendation and prizes, in the form and application of all manner of Agricultural Implements. On this occasion, there were exhibited 577 of these, of every description, all claiming to be improvements, in some respect, upon those in present use. A list of the whole, with prices, was sold upon the ground. There were ploughs in great variety, with and without wheels, for the soil and for the subsoil; grabbers, harrows, sowing machines; turnip, hay, and straw cutters; root-washers and bruisers of beans, oats, and linseed; thrashing machines and weighing machines; churns and cheese presses, &c., &c. Of the churns, Anthony's American Churn, to be wrought by horse or hand labor, had greatest variety, and seemed in most favor. There was a Hand Steel Mill, in form of a large coffee mill, which grinds wheat into flour equal to that of the miller, intended for emigrants, and not unlikely to find its way into the back settlements of the United States. Yet from a description I have seen of an Eccentric Plate Mill of Mr. James Bogardus, of Eldridge-street, New York, invented some four years ago, I am induced to believe that it is better adapted for families than any that this country has produced. To many of your readers, probably, a description, with statement of price, in your own columns, would be a favor; for although not exclusively for the grinding of grain, it is stated to be admirably adapted for this, and had the commendation of some of our mechanical journals when first announced. Our exhibition of cattle and implements, and public trial of some of the latter, extended over three days, and occupied a space of about 20 acres of our public Park, called "The Green."

After considerable indecision, the Committee for providing a suitable building for the coming Exhibition of the Products of Industry in London, decided upon one that will at least be a novelty. It is the design of Mr. Paxton, Gardener to the Duke of Devonshire, and may be briefly described as a monster Conservatory. It is to be of iron framework, with glass panes. No stone, brick, or mortar, will be used; and the materials will be of more value at removal, should this be persisted in, (which, however, is hardly expected,) than by the adoption of any other plan. The building is to be 2300 feet long, 400 broad, and 100 high, enclosing the highest trees on the ground. Its roofed area will extend to 900,000 square feet, or 20 acres. The long line of front is to be broken up by a transept running north and south. Ventilation and other requisites for comfort will be provided for. The contract price is stated to be £87,000, and the materials are the contractor's, and to be removed by him if so desired—about double that amount being to be paid, if to be left permanent. All the roofing and upright sashes will be made by machinery, fitted together and finished rapidly. Large sums have been subscribed to defray the expense; the contractors have commenced operations, and the building is expected to be completed this present year, although the exhibition does not take place till May, 1851. Articles for the exhibition are, we believe, being prepared all over the country.

The House of Commons, on the 19th ult., voted for the British Museum the sum of £45,329, being the estimate for the ordinary expenses for the year; having, on the 1st of the same month, voted £38,569 for defraying the expenses of the new building.

The third tube of the great Britannia Bridge, over the Menai Strait, has been for some time permanently fixed in its place; and the fourth tube having been also safely floated to its place, is now being raised, and the whole is expected to be completed within three months. The high Railway Bridge over the Tweed at Berwick, is to be opened by the Queen on the 29th of this month, on her way by Edinburgh to her Highland residence, Balmoral.

The City of Glasgow steamer left yesterday for New York. Her success is not unlikely to lead to the building of other screw vessels for the same trade, from the Clyde, and it is said that Liverpool, also, intends thus to compete.

DEATH OF MAXSON GREEN.

The death of a good man should always be regarded as a public calamity. In the death of such an one, the community in which he lived always sustains a loss, and sometimes a great loss. Some serve their fellow men in one way, and some in another, according to the particular turn of mind which each may take. Unquestionably the Divine Being has so arranged society, that there is a particular part for each member to perform, so that each one may render his quota of service for the public good. But there are some men who are endowed in a special manner with what we call a public spirit—men who seem to look beyond themselves—philanthropists, having enlarged views and liberal souls, who make their religion practical in the way of not "looking on their own things," but "on the things of others,"—who, by sympathizing with the suffering, and exercising an earnest and kind regard for the interests of society, make themselves useful and greatly beloved.

Such a man was Bro. MAXSON GREEN, of Alfred, an account of whose sudden and unexpected death appeared in the Recorder of August 15th. Bro. Green became an inhabitant of the town of Alfred, Allegany County, at an early day, and was one of the loving and self-denying band who were united in Christian fellowship, composing the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, at the time of its organization, and of which he remained a worthy and devoted member until his death. The life of Bro. Green has been marked with a constant and earnest devotion to the cause of religion and humanity. In sustaining the interests and ordinances of the Lord's house, he was ever prompt and ready. His sympathies, his counsel, and his property, when demanded, were alike freely given. The missionary cause, both foreign and domestic, shared largely in his contributions, and the cause of Bible distribution had a place near his heart. Nor were those suffering from misfortune and poverty forgotten by him; to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, he was ever forward, while his doors were ever open to receive the stranger, and his ample table was abundantly supplied with the fruits of the earth to satisfy his wants. In the benevolent enterprises which mark the present age, he took a deep and lively interest.

Nor was Bro. Green singular and alone in his well-chosen field of Christian labor. His devoted and loving companion, who followed him so closely in his journey to the spirit-land, seeming to die purely for his sake, was in the fullest sense a help-meet. Having in early life dedicated herself to the service of God, her one desire seemed to be "to do good;" and perhaps there never were two persons more happily united in this respect.

Their death, so unexpected, and occurring under such painful circumstances—they at the time being from home on a visit to their friends in Wisconsin—has spread a deep gloom over the community. But they are gone, and may God, who has afflicted us, sanctify to us this our mournful bereavement.

ALFRED, Aug. 19th, 1850.

FUGITIVE SLAVE CONVENTION.

Agreeable to the call which we published some weeks ago, a Convention of "fugitives from the prison house of Southern despotism, with their friends and protectors," was held at Cazenovia, N. Y., on the 21st and 23d insts. Frederick Douglass was chosen President; J. C. Hathaway, C. B. Ray, Frances Hawley, and C. W. Wheaton, Vice Presidents; C. D. Miller, and Anna P. Adams, Secretaries.

A Committee was appointed, who reported a series of seventeen Resolutions, an Address of the Fugitive Slaves to their brethren in the South, and an Address to the Liberty Party—documents which were adopted by the Convention, and which we shall print when we can get official copies.

At an early stage in the proceedings of the Convention, J. C. Hathaway gave an account of his recent interview with W. L. Chaplin in the prison at Washington, in the course of which Mr. Chaplin stated to him, that he never saw the slaves till the night they got into his carriage—that he had, however, made arrangements with friends to assist them—that he was not armed himself, and did not know the slaves were—and, finally that he has done nothing but what he is willing to answer for to his God. A Committee of twenty-three was appointed to raise $25,000 in thirty days to aid Mr. Chaplin in his defense, and to regain his liberty. Gerrit Smith, the Treasurer of the Committee, headed the list with a subscription of $500. A Committee was also appointed, who raised $75 in ten-cent subscriptions to purchase a medal to be presented to Wm. L. Chaplin for his eminent services in the cause of humanity.

ROUTE TO ALFRED.—Delegates from the Eastern Churches to the meetings at Alfred, will find the route from New York by the Erie Railroad the quickest and pleasantest. That road is now open to Corning, fifty miles this side of Alfred, and will probably be opened to Hornellsville, ten miles from Alfred, in time. The Company, with their usual liberality in such cases, have agreed to furnish delegates with tickets to go and return for one fare—that is, $6 15 to Corning, or probably $7 to Hornellsville. The friends at Alfred have volunteered to be at Hornellsville with teams, and convey delegates to the place of meeting without charge. In our next we shall be able to state positively whether the road will be open to Hornellsville, and also the best time of starting from New York.

NEW BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.—The New York Baptist Ministerial Union have resolved to establish a Theological School at Rochester, N. Y., beginning on the first Monday of November next. The Board will take meas[illegible] needing pecuniary assistance in the pursuit of their studies. Rev. Thomas J. Conant, D. D., is to be Professor of Hebrew and Biblical Criticism, and Rev. Thomas Maginnis, D. D., Professor of Biblical and Pastoral Theology. The subscriptions for the endowment of a University have reached one hundred thousand dollars.

PRESBYTERIAN MISSION.—The following statistics, derived from the annual reports of the Board of Foreign Mission to the General Assembly, show the rise and progress of the Mission of the Presbyterian Church:—In May, 1838, there were 8 stations, 21 male and 17 female missionaries, 3 churches, 27 communicants, 131 pupils, 1 press, and the contributions amounted to $44,744. In May, 1850, the stations were 28, the male missionaries 91, the females 17, the churches 17, the communicants 350, the pupils 1,781, the presses 6, and the contributions $126,075.

ACCIDENTS LAST SABBATH.—A gravel train on the Kennebec and Portland Railroad was thrown from the track in Cumberland, killing four Irishmen and severely injuring several others—some so badly as to leave no hope of their recovery. A train from Philadelphia for Harrisburg ran over a cow near the latter place by which the locomotive was upset, and a passenger car containing a large number of emigrants, was smashed, a passenger named Albert Bryant was killed instantly, and five others were badly injured, one not expected to survive. In the afternoon, John Cole, aged 22 years, was accidentally drowned in the Delaware, near Kensington.

ANTI-FREE SCHOOL CONVENTION.—A Mass Meeting of the opponents of the Free School Law was held at Hampden, Oneida Co., N. Y., on the 22d inst. Among the speakers were Hon. F. C. White and David Moulton. A series of resolutions was adopted, to be published in all the New York papers. A committee was appointed to make arrangements for printing a paper till after the election.

CASTE IN INDIA.—Eighteen European and American missionaries, belonging to seven different denominations, have lately held a conference at Madras, on the subject of caste, where they voted unanimously, that this cherished practice of the Hindoos is unscriptural, heathenish, and one of the greatest obstacles to the progress of the gospel in India.

CHURCH ORGANIZED.—We learn that a Seventh-day Baptist Church, with forty-two members, was organized last Sabbath at Mystic Bridge, Ct.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, Aug. 19.

After the consideration of morning business, the Fugitive Slave Bill was taken up.

Mr. Mason moved to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. Dayton moved to amend the amendment by substituting the bill laid on the table several weeks since by Mr. Webster, which he briefly supported. It provides that if the alledged fugitive shall declare that he owes no service to the claimant, the right of claimant shall be decided finally without delay by the finding of a jury.

Mr. Mason opposed Dayton's amendment. He was satisfied that if its provisions were adopted the bill would be utterly ineffectual and useless. If the trial by jury was adopted, it would be considered conclusive evidence of the refusal on the part of the Federal Government to perform its duty in relation to the delivery of fugitive slaves to their owners.

Mr. Dayton replied, contending that there was no safer ground on which the slaveholder could rest his rights than the verdict of twelve honest men.

Mr. Berrien called the especial attention of the Senate to the principle of the amendment granting the trial by jury and expressed the hope that Southern gentlemen would allow the question to be taken without debate.

In the course of some remarks by Mr. Winthrop in support of the amendment, Mr. Butler inquired whether he had ever heard of a case in which an attempt was made to assert a false claim by which a free man was held as a slave.

Mr. Wales referred to several such cases.

Mr. Walker recited several similar cases, and among others one in which a white girl was scarcely rescued from the claims of a kidnapper.

Mr. Underwood said the provision for a jury trial would not satisfy the people of Kentucky and advocated an amendmeut of the act of ninety-three, which should provide for the execution of that law by federal officers, to whom such duty should be assigned.

Mr. Cass desired a simple amendment of the law of '93, the main feature of which he thought ought to be resumed. That act laid down four principles to which he was prepared to adhere: First, the right of the master to arrest his fugitive slave wherever he may find him: Second, his duty to carry him before a magistrate in the State where he is arrested, that the claim may be adjudged by him: Third, the duty of the magistrate to examine the claim, and to decide like other examining magistrates, without a jury, and then to commit him to the custody of his master: Fourth, the right of the master then to remove the slave to his residence. After further debate the amendment was rejected—Yeas, 11; Nays, 27.

Mr. Chase moved to amend Mr. Mason's amendment by the insertion of a provision for a jury trial to test the question of claim or no claim. This amendment was also rejected.

Mr. Winthrop moved an amendment securing the right of habeas corpus to the alledged fugitive, and providing for a judicial review of the decisions of the proposed commissioners, which, after debate, was also rejected—Yeas, 11; Nays, 26.

The further consideration of the Bill was then postponed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Brown, of Indiana, asked leave to offer a resolution that bills on the Speaker's table be taken up and made the special order for the 23d inst., in this succession, namely—New Mexico, Texas boundary, California, and Utah.

The Speaker stated that the bills came from the Senate in this order, namely—Utah, Texas boundary, California, and New Mexico.

Mr. Brown's motion lost, 87 to 98.

Mr. Ashmun asked leave to offer a resolution to make special order for to-morrow, and continue until disposed of, the bills in following order, Utah, Texas boundary, California, and New Mexico. Lost, 94 to 94.

The rest of the day was spent in proposing amendments and making five-minute speeches on the Appropriation Bill.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, Aug. 20.

The Fugitve Slave Bill was taken up, and Mason's amendment was adopted without a division. It provides for three commissioners in every county, to be appointed by the United States District Judge, to hear and determine all slave cases; the deposition of the owner, and proof of the identity of the person claimed, to be taken as sufficient evidence, and the claimant to have no further hindrance. The decision of the commissioner to be final, and the U. S. Marshal and his deputies to execute the warrant of restoration, with a penalty of six months' imprisonment, or $1,000 for aiding in the escape of a slave from the claimant; and if rescued after a decision of the commissioner, the slave to be paid for out of the United States Treasury.

An amendment was proposed, but not acted upon, to add still more stringent provisions, for the payment by the United States of the value of escaped slaves who shall not be delivered up to the claimant by the officers whose duty it is made to execute this law.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Thurston, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial from the Territorial Legislature of Oregon, praying donations of the public lands. He moved to refer it to the Committee on Territories. This raised the question in the House, whether a delegate can make a motion. The Speaker gavr his reasons at length in favor of the right. Messrs. Duer and Burt contended that delegates of territories are not members of the House, and have only by courtesy a right to debate; but the House sustained the Speaker, 111 to 62.

The rest of the sitting was occupied with the Appropriation Bill, in which some progress was made.

IN SENATE. FOURTH DAY, Aug. 21.

After the consideration of morning business, the Fugitive Slave Bill was taken up.

Mr. Dayton submitted some remarks in reply to Mr. Badger's speech of yesterday and against Mr. Pratt's amendment making the United States liable for the value of an escaped slave when the federal officers may fail to deliver him up to the claimant, when evidence is furnished that such slave is within such officer's district.

Messrs. Atchison, Foote, Pratt, and Mason advocated the amendment.

Mr. Berrien could not vote for the amendment. It was, in his opinion, unconstitutional.

Mr. Mason contended that it was a constitutional duty of the Federal Government to see that fugitive slaves were restored.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House spent the day in Committee of the Whole on the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill. A good deal was said about the expense of Charges, several of whom are on the eve of starting for home. The prospect of trouble with Portugal was enlarged upon by two or three speakers. Amendments were made appropriating for City iments, and $50,000 for the relief and protection of seamen on western waters. Others of less importance were adopted.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, Aug. 22.

The Fugitive Slave Bill was again under discussion. Mr. Underwood moved a substitute for the entire bill, providing federal officers, whose duty it shall be to execute the law of '93, relative to fugitives from justice or slavery. The amendment also provides for record evidence of the slavery of an individual, his identity and escape, as proposed by the Committee of Thirteen, and provides further that the claimant of a fugitive, who asserts his freedom, shall give bond without security, to afford the slave opportunity for jury trial on the question of his right to freedom in the place from which he shall be alledged to have escaped. The debate was continued by Messrs. Mason, Underwood, Davis of Miss., Turney, and Foote, until 4 o'clock, when, without coming to a vote, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole. Several amendments were considered and adopted, and the Committee rose and the House adjourned without a final disposition of the bill.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, Aug. 23.

The Senate took up the Fugitive Slave Bill; rejected Mr. Underwood's substitute; adopted an amendment making a marshal or his deputy responsible in damages for the escape of a fugitive from his custody; also making him responsible if he shall fail to use due vigilance in executing warrants for the arrest of fugitives; rejected an amendment for the protection of colored citizens visiting Southern States; and, finally, ordered the bill to be engrossed by a vote of 27 to 12.

The Indian Intercourse Bill was passed, and the Senate adjourned till Second-day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House was engaged on the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill in Committee of the Whole. Several items and amendments were considered, when the Committee rose, and the House adjourned without disposing of the bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. SABBATH, August 23.

The House had a short session, which was spent in discussing the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill; adjourned without disposing of it.

One Week later from Europe.

By the steamer Europa, we have one week later news from all parts of Europe, the substance of which we give below.

The steamship Atlantic arrived at Liverpool at midnight on Tuesday, the 6th inst. Her running time is stated at ten days, eight hours and twenty minutes—thus beating all former passages by several hours.

The question relative to Baron Rothschild's taking his seat in the House of Commons has been postponed to the next session, when the ministers are to introduce a new bill upon the subject.

The House of Commons have, by a large majority, granted the present Duke of Cambridge a pension of £12,000 per annum.

The Queen and Court are to leave London for Scotland on the 23d inst., previous to which Her Majesty was expected to prorogue Parliament in person.

The composition of the new Cabinet at Washington is regarded, by the leading English press, with much favor.

The Gorham controversy has been brought to a close, the Rev, gentleman having gained his point in every respect.

It is said that the Great Britain steamship has been purchased for £25,000, and that she is to run with passengers on the Pacific between Panama and San Francisco.

Several of the French Socialists have been visited with the law's penalties, for threatening the lives of Representatives.

Advices from Altona of the 5th, state that a collision between the Danish and Holstein armies took place on Friday, near Mohlde, which resulted in the defeat of the Danes. The loss inconsiderable on both sides.

The Sultan has decided that specimens of the manufactures of Turkey shall be sent to the Exhibition in London, in 1851, and he has nominated a Commission of five superior functionaries of the Ministry of Commerce, three Mussulmen and four Christian merchants, to superintend the necessary arrangements.

The accounts from Lisbon state that the session of the Cortes was closed on the 20th ult., after having lasted for more than six months. After dispatching the steamer of war Mississippi to convey the intelligence of the failure of his negotiation to the American Government, Mr. Clay embarked on board the Independence frigate, which proceeded to Gibraltar. The departure of the American Minister on the 20th ult. was not followed by immediate hostilities, as had been anticipated at first; and the whole proceedings will be submitted to the American Congress, before any stringent measures are adopted to enforce the claims. A Consular Agent has been left at Lisbon.

A letter dated at Washington, August 22d, says:—"There was a report in town this morning, that two of the slaves attached to the farm of Charles B. Calvert, of the National Hotel, (of mixed blood) had absconded, and that some thirty or forty other slaves, claimed by different persons in Prince George's County, Maryland, had gone in company."

Two Weeks later from California.

Two steamers from Chagres—the Philadelphia and the Crescent City—arrived at New York last week, bringing two weeks later news from California. The Philadelphia brought 131 passengers, and the Crescent City 103. The former had one million dollars in gold dust.

Among the passengers by the Panama is Gen. Herrau, ex-President of New-Grenada, and formerly minister from that Republic to this country. Gen H. returns to this country with the intention of residing here for a term of years. He has in his charge five young men, sons of gentlemen residing in New-Grenada, who come to this country for the purpose of obtaining a collegiate education.

Died, on board of the steamship Tennesee, on her passage from San Francisco to Panama, July 22, Andrew Mead of Lowell, (Mass.) At Crueces, Mr. Joseph Abourn, of Marion County, (Mass.) Mr. Collier, son of W. Collier, was left sick at Panama. The passengers report it very sickly at Chagres.

The Philadelphia brings a block of gold-bearing quartz, weighing 193 pounds, filled with gold—the first specimen ever taken from the Mines at Mariposa.

There arrived at San Francisco, by the steamers Tennesee and California, one hundred and twenty-six professional gentlemen, making one-sixth of the passengers in the two steamers.

Quite a trade has sprung up between San Francisco and South Australia, from which latter place the former is now supplied with most of the substantial vegetables in its market.

The people of Portland, Oregon, have sent as a present to the city of San Francisco, a Liberty Pole, 120 feet long, 1 foot thick at the base, and 3 inches at the top. Slim stick that.

Great pieces of gold are now found frequently. Wm. C. Satterfield picked up a lump of the pure stuff near Nevada City, weighing 81¾ ounces, and another person found a piece of gold mixed with quartz weighing 33 pounds. He shows it at Sacramento; price of admission to see it, $1.

The largest lump of gold ever dug in California is a mixture of quartz and gold, the whole weighing 30 pounds, (360 ounces) troy. From the tests made, it is ascertained the lump contains about 23 pounds of pure gold. This mammoth piece was dug from a ravine in the dry diggings, between the North and Middle Forks of the Yuba river, by Mr. Wm. H. Julius of New York City, and Mr. John H. Grives of New Orleans. They were offered $10,000 for it, which they refused. They are exhibiting it at McKnight's Sutter Hotel, at 50 cents per head. The young men are on their way home, and expect to realize a fortue from exhibiting it in the States.

The population of San Francisco is now said to be 15,000 only; those are stand-bys; all the rest gone to the mines.

The steamer Senator is said to have cleared over $500,000 in navigating the Sacramento River.

The Fourth of July was duly celebrated in all the towns of California.

The following extracts from the Pacific News of July 15, gives a tolerably good idea of what is going on in California:—

The overland immigration has commenced arriving, and some hundreds are already in our midst who left the Missouri river this spring. It is expected that much suffering will be experienced on the route among the rear parties. The earliest arrivals were pack companies, who came through in about two months; and experience has demonstrated that for parties who are not bringing families, packing is the safest and surest mode of reaching California.

New diggings have been discovered lately on the upper waters of the Yuba and Feather Rivers, which promise to yield a rich harvest to the adventurous miner. The water is yet too high for working the bars of streams, but there is every confidence that the yield will be equal to any part of last season, as soon as the water falls, which may be shortly expected.

Within a few days we have also received authentic reports that gold has been discovered at the Upper end of Carson River Valley, near and at the eastern base of the Sierra Nevada. A number of families from Salt Lake have stopped there this Summer, with the intention of forming a settlement, and working the mines.

In the Southern mines, up the San Joaquin, many murders have been committed within three or four weeks past, mostly by Mexicans and Chilians, upon American miners. This class are composed in great part of ladrones and guerrillas that have always infested the roads of Mexico and South America, and in the Southern mines they have mostly congregated.

The settlements recently formed on Trinidad Bay, and at the mouth of the Klameth, near the Oregon line, have had some disturbance with the Indians. At Humboldt, and also at Klameth, there have been difficulties with the neighboring tribes, because of their pilfering from the settlers. Eight or ten Indians were killed on each occasion.

There has arisen, and must continue to arise, much difficulty about the settling on vacant lands. The large grants claimed under Mexican title, has placed all of the best locations in the country in the hands of a few who think it legitimate to assert their ownership in cases where the settler considers the title imperfect. Some collisions had taken place from this cause.

Mr. Otis Comstock died recently at Farmington, Ontario County, in the 80th year of his age. He was one of the first settlers of the Phelps and Gorham Purchase, in the year 1798. He harvested the first wheat in that region in 1790; was never at Rochester or Buffalo—grown up since then; and had not crossed Cayuga Lake until within the last two years.

The dedication of the "Forest Lawn Cemetery" at Buffalo, took place on Thursday afternoon. A large number of persons witnessed the interesting ceremonies. Several original poems were sung by a large choir, and an address was delivered by Geo. W. Clinton. The Cemetery embraces 60 acres, with a variety of surface, and mainly covered with groves.

Fish, the Forger.

The Herkimer County Democrat furnishes some particulars of the early history of the accomplished forger, having so many aliases, whose career was recently arrested by the acuteness of Cashier Kendrick of New York:—

"This person, who is well known to many of our citizens, has been arrested in the city of New York for forgery. He has been passing under the assumed names of Daniels, Rainforth, &c. &c., and has been for several years engaged in carrying on extensive robberies on the banks of the State. It is said that his trunks contained all the materials necessary to a systematic and skillful prosecution of his business. It will be remembered that shortly after he left this County he forged the names of several of our citizens and obtained large amounts of money. About the year 1839 he came to this place and broke into a shoe store and stole some bootc and shoes. He was detected, arrested and convicted of petit larceny. While in jail in this place his gentle behavior and innocent appearance gained for him the confidence of the Sheriff and jailor, and even before the expiration of his term of imprisonment he was admitted into the County Clerk's Office to write as a clerk. While there he altered the record of his own conviction by erasing his own name and inserting the name of some other person. He was a skillful penman, and could imitate the autograph of most of the leading men of our county. During his stay in this place he attended school at the Academy, and in consequence of his jovial and sprightly nature was a favorite among the students. He was suspected by some of being a great rogue while here, and his subsequent life has proved him to be such without a question.

HORRIBLE TRAGEDY.—A most appalling and bloody tragedy came to light at the St Charles Hotel, in Troy, on the 21st inst. It seems that a man and woman came there two days previous as travelers. On the day in question the landlord became suspicious that something was wrong, and on going to their room found them both dead, with their throats cut in a horrible manner. From facts developed before the Coroner's Jury, it appears that the man's name was W. A. Caldwell—that in 1842 he was convicted of burglary in Clinton County, N. Y., and sent to State Prison for five years, but pardoned in 1843—that he has since been on a whaling voyage, from which he recently returned—that while in New York he ingratiated himself into the affections of a Mrs. Knapp, who fled from the city with him—that they were overtaken by officers at Williamstown, Mass., whence they escaped to Troy, where their career was brought to an end in the manner above indicated. The verdict of the Coroner's Jury was that the woman came to her death by having her throat cut from ear to ear by the hands of William A. Caldwell, and that Caldwell came to his death by his own hands.

SUMMARY.

There was considerable excitement at Savannah recently, in consequence of a number of handbills having been posted, notifying the citizens that an abolitionist was to be tarred and feathered, the gentleman having made offensive remarks in the company of several ladies and gentlemen. He was first ordered to leave the city, but having made a written statement, disavowing the offense, the excitement after a time subsided.

We learn from the Buffalo papers that the Commissioner of Customs has instructed the Collector of that District, that hereafter no property will be permitted to be inspected, and no vessel unloaded from foreign ports at any place in that District, except at the port of Buffalo; thus shutting the ports of Tonawanda, Black Rock, Barcelona, and Dunkirk, against any commerce with Canada.

By the de la Morina, of Aug. 11, we learn that the British Government have ratified the treaty with the Dominican Rebublic and Hayti. The war will doubtless now be brought to a close, especially as the representatives of France and the United States are said to be concerned in settling it.

Rev. Mr. Chesney, of the Baltimore Conference, was seized with a cramp on the 15th inst., while bathing in James River, near Fincastle, Va. and was drowned. He was formerly a printer. He studied divinity while at the printing trade, and when out of his time became a Minister.

The receipts of California Gold at the Mint of the United States, from the 1st to the 16th, are estimated at $2,500,000. Previously received to July 3d, $18,350,000. Total, $20,850,000. Estimated receipts at Branch Mint at New-Orleans, $3,000,000. Entire receipts, $23,850,000.

The Legislature of Rhode Island, at its recent session, appointed a commission to inquire into the affairs of the Mount Vernon Bank, which is charged with having violated its charter by establishing an agency for discount in Providence.

Intelligence of the expedition in search of Sir John Franklin has reached the Navy Department dated at Whalefish Island, June 29. All was safe and very well, though icebergs had been encountered by the vessels.

Kanouse and Cole, who have been on trial for the robbery of the Westerly Bank, R. I., have been remanded, the Jury having failed to agree. The court does not meet again until February next.

The farmers of Rensselear and other counties where there are "manors" are raising funds to sustain themselves in the numerous suits they are making for the purpose of disproving the title of the landlords.

A Valuable Farm for Sale.

THE subscriber offers at Private Sale his Farm, situate near Shiloh, Cumberland County, New Jersey, containing 107 Acres of Good Land, in a high state of cultivation, having carted on it within the last 4 years, about 1,000 loads of good shell marl, near 2,000 bushels of lime, besides ashes, guano, and poudrett without measure. There is on said Farm a new and substantial Dwelling House, built of the best materials and by good workmen, two stories high, with a good cellar. Size of the house 32 feet by 28 feet, with kitchen and bath-room attached, 17 by 28 feet, a good well of water, a cistern holding about 30 hogsheads of water, with a pump in the kitchen, very convenient for washing and supplying the bath-room. A large barn, stabling and hay house, wagon house, wash and wood house, and other out buildings, all fitted up within four years. Two Young Apple Orchards of choice fruit, besides an old orchard of natural fruit; also a variety of other fruit trees, such as peaches, pears, plums, &c. There are also two Good Tenant Houses, with good wells of water at their doors, newly fitted up, and so arranged on the Farm that it can easily be divided into two if desired.

Said Farm is handsomely located, within half a mile of the village of Shiloh, N. J., where is a post office, and the Greenwich stage running through regular to Philadelphia; within three miles and a half of Bridgeton, the county town, where the steamer Cohansey plies daily to Philadelphia, and within two miles and a quarter of Roadstown.

The Union Academy is located in its immediate vicinity, the design of which is to prepare students for college. Over a hundred were in attendance the first year, which has just closed. A large brick building is now being fitted up for its accommodation. There has been a large sum of money subscribed to procure apparatus and material for an Agricultural Department, and fitting up a Chemical Laboratory, which will go into operation this fall, the only institution of the kind all West Jersey.

The above advantages make the said Farm a desirable location. Property in the vicinity is rising in value constantly.

For further particulars, inquire of the subscriber on the premises. Terms made easy.

Miscellaneous.

The Great Salt Lake.

After an interval of six months, during which the party were completely isolated by the impenetrable snows of the surrounding mountains, intelligence has at length been received from Captain Stansbury, of the Topographical Engineer Corps, who is engaged in an examination of the Valley of the Great Salt Lake, and a hydrographic survey of that singular sheet of water. The last previous news of the whereabout of his party was dated in October last. The present dispatches come down to as late as the 16th of March. Capt. Stansbury, under date of March 26, gives the following account of a tour around the western side of the Lake—a journey which occupied from the 16th of October to the 8th of November:—

"We found that the whole western shore of the Lake consists of immense level plains of soft mud, inaccessible within many miles of the water's edge to the feet of mules or horses, being traversed frequently by meandering rills of salt and sulphur water, which apparently sink and seem to imbue and saturate the whole soil, rendering it miry and treacherous. These plains are but little elevated above the present level of the Lake, and have, without doubt, at one time, not very long since, formed a part of it; for it is evident that a rise of but a few inches will at once cover the greater portion of these extensive areas of land with water again. I do not think I hazard much by saying that a rise of one foot in the Lake would nearly if not quite double its present area.

"The plains are, for the most part, entirely denuded of vegetation, excepting occasional patches of Artemesia and 'grease wood,' and they glitter in the sunlight, presenting the appearance of water so perfectly that it is almost impossible for one to convince himself that he is not on the immediate shore of the Lake itself. This is owing to the crystalization of minute portions of salt on the surface of the mud, and the oozy slime occasioned by the complete saturation of the soil by moisture. From this cause also arises a mirage, which is greater here than I ever witnessed elsewhere; distorting objects in the most grotesque manner, and giving rise to optical illusions almost beyond belief. I anticipate serious annoyance from this cause in making the triangulation.

"In an estimated distance of 150 miles on one part of the route, fresh water and grass were found only in one spot, about midway of this stretch, and we were obliged to subsist our animals, that is, to keep life in them, by serving them out a pint of water each night and morning, taken from the india-rubber bags packed upon their backs. The first part of this desert was about seventy-five miles in extent, and occupied us two days and a half to cross it, traveling all day, and the greater part of the night; walking a greater portion of the way to relieve the mules, which began to sink under the want of sustenance and water.

"In the latter portion of this first desert we crossed a field of solid salt, which lay encrusted upon the level mud plain, so thick that it bore up the mules loaded with their packs so perfectly that they walked upon it as if it had been a sheet of solid ice, slightly covered with snow. The whole plain was as level as a floor. We estimated this field to be at the least ten miles in length, by seven in width, and the thickness of the salt at from one half to three quarters of an inch. A strip of some three miles in width had been previously crossed, but it was not thick, nor hard enough to prevent the animals from sinking through it into the mud at every step. The salt in the solid field was perfectly crystalized, and where it had not become mixed with the soil was as white and fine as the best specimens of Salina table salt. Some of it was collected and preserved.

"After crossing the field of salt, we struck upon a fine little stream of running water, with plenty of grass, lying at the foot of a range of mountains, which seemed to form the western boundary of the immediate valley of the Lake. Here we were obliged to halt for three days to give our animals an opportunity to recruit. The latter part of the desert was about 70 miles in extent, and was passed in two days, by prolonging our marches far into the night. Had we not found grass and water mid way of this barren waste, both animals and men must have perished.

"We were, as I have every reason to believe, the first party of white men that ever succeeded in making the entire circuit of the Lake by land. I have understood that it was once circumnavigated by canoes, in early times, by some trappers, in search of beaver, but no attempt by land has ever been successful.

"From the knowledge gained by this expedition, I am of opinion that the size of the Lake has been much exaggerated; and from observation, and what I have learned from the Mormons, who have made one or two excursions upon it in a small skiff, I am induced to believe that its depth has been much overrated. That it has no outlet is now demonstrated beyond doubt; and I am convinced, from what I have seen, that it can never be of the slightest use for the purposes of navigation. The water, for miles out from the shore, wherever I have seen it, is but a few inches in depth, and if there be any deep water, it must be in the middle. The Utah River (or the Jordan, as the Mormons call it) is altogether too insignificant and too crooked to be of any use commercially. The greatest depth of the Utah Lake that we have found is sixteen feet; so that, for the purposes of a connected line of navigation, neither the River nor the Lakes can be of the slightest utility. Such, at least, is my present impression. Further examination of Salt Lake may, perhaps, modify this opinion with regard to the latter. The River connecting these two Lakes is forty-eight miles in length."

Cooking by Gas.—Among the novelties produced at the Grand Agricultural Meeting at Exeter, England, was one which excited great curiosity; it was the cooking of the monster joint, called by M. Soyer the baron and saddle back of beef a la Magna Charta, weighing 535 lbs. For the first time in the annals of cookery, this was subjected to a new process of roasting by use of an agent which has been discovered half a century, that is to say, gas. To gratify the curiosity of the public, it was placed in the middle of the castle-yard, resting upon a dripping pan, environed with bricks, and surrounded by 216 jets of gas, and covered with sheet iron. It took five hours to roast, and consumed 700 feet of gas of the value of 4s. $5\frac{3}{4}$d. It weighed, after being cooked, 497 lbs.; the dripping $23\frac{1}{4}$ lbs.; the osmazeme $3\frac{1}{4}$ lbs.; thus losing by evaporation only $11\frac{1}{4}$ lbs. To cook this piece of beef by an ordinary fire would have taken 14 hours. This apparatus was invented and fitted up by Mr. Warriner of London, who was prepared to have roasted all the dinner by the same means, that is, 400 chickens, 58 quarters of lamb, and 33 ribs of beef, at the cost of 12s. for gas. Marriage in California.

It is said the Californians are born on horseback; it may also be said they are married on horseback. The day the marriage contract is agreed on between the parties, the bridegroom's first care is to buy or borrow the best horse to be found in his vicinity. At the same time he has to get, by one of these meaus, a silver mounted bridle, and a saddle with embroidered housings. This saddle must have, also, at its stern, a bridal pillion, with broad aprons flowing down the flanks of the horse. These aprons are also embroidered with silk of different colors, and with gold and silver thread. Around the margin runs a string of little steel plates, alternated with slight pendants of the same metal. These, when the horse moves, jingle like a thousand mimic bells.

The bride, also, comes in for her share of these nuptial preparations. The bridegroom must present her with at least six entire changes of raiment, nor forget, through any sentiment of delicacy, even the chemise. Such an oversight might frustrate all his hopes, as it would be construed into a personal indifference—the last kind of indifference which a California lady will forgive. He therefore hunts this article with as much solicitude as the Peri the gift which was to unlock Paradise. Having found six which are neither too full nor too slender, he packs them in rose-leaves which seem to flutter like his own heart, and sends them to the lady as his last bridal present. She might naturally expect him to come next.

The wedding-day having arrived, the two fine horses, procured for the occasion, are led to the door, saddled, bridled, and pillioned. The bridegroom takes up before him the god-mother, and the god-father the bride, and thus they gallop away to Church. The priest, in his richest robes, receives them at the altar, where they kneel, partake of the sacrament, and are married. This over, they start on their return—but now the gentlemen change partners. The bridegroom, still on the pillion, takes up before him his bride. With his right arm he steadies her on the saddle, and in his left hand holds the reins. They return to the house of the parents of the bride, where they are generally received with a discharge of musketry. Two persons stationed at some convenient place, now rush out and seize him by the legs, and before he has time to dismount, deprive him of his spurs, which he is obliged to redeem with a bottle of brandy.

The married couple then enter the house, where the near relatives are all waiting in tears to receive them. They kneel down before the parents of the lady, and crave a blessing, which is bestowed with patriarchal solemnity. On rising, the bridegroom makes a signal for the guests to come in, and another for the guitar and harp to strike up. Then commences the dancing, which continues often for three days, with only brief intervals for refreshment, but none for slumber; the wedded pair must be on their feet; their dilemma furnishes food for good-humored gibes and merriment. Thus commences married life in California. The stream, it is to be hoped, is much smoother than its fount. [Colton.

The Poland Top-Knot and Fawn-Colored Dorking.

The quantity and value of eggs and poultry consumed daily, and the aggregate annually consumed in our large cities, as stated in the proceedings of the late Poultry Convention in Boston, is great beyond any conception we could otherwise have entertained. It is important therefore to the farmer, who cultivates poultry for the profit of its products in market, and also to the private citizen, who keeps a small flock for the convenience of commanding, at all times, a ready supply of eggs for family use, to know, and to be able to obtain, the best and most profitable breeds—the best for the production of eggs—and the best as to size, quality and value in market for the use of the table. If no single breed combines, in the highest degree, both these items of value, then good policy would seem to require, that the farmer at least, should keep not only the best breed for the production of eggs, but also the best breed for size, and early maturity for the market.

For the abundant production of eggs I consider the Black Poland Fowl altogether unrivaled. And for the reason that she strongly inclines to lay, but strongly disinclines to set. For the past 4 or 5 years, out of a flock varying occasionally from 12 to 20, I have had only 5 that inclined to set. The last year, in a flock of 20, I had only 1 that inclined to set. She proved, however, in all respects, an excellent nurse. With no extra care in any respect, and confined to a yard of 10 to 25 feet, the flock produced, in ten months, rising of two thousand eggs. They cease laying occasionally—recruit for a few days—are cheerful and sprightly—and then commence laying again. With a warm basement room for winter, admitting daily the cheering rays of the sun, they would lay every month in the year. The Poland is of good size, of fine quality for the table, and to the eye of a person of taste and fancy, is a beautiful bird.

But there is another breed that merits also the highest commendation. I allude to the English fawn-colored Dorking. They possess some excellencies not found in the Poland, and lack some that the Polands possess. Although good layers, still they will insist upon setting as soon as they have laid their litter. Of course, though excellent for laying, they are less productive in eggs than the Polands. But they have great beauty of form—their flesh is stated to be excellent—and they wholly surpass other fowls in plumpness and size, united with smallness of bone. They are shaped like the quail or partridge, being very full in the berast, with deep heavy bodies. I have weighed one hen, seven pounds and eight ounces, and others of nearly the same size. As to color, according to the best English accounts, they vary the same as common fowls. But I have seen none except the fawn or cinnamon color; in some instances deep, bordering upon brown. Admiring the fawn color, I would tolerate no other. But no one color is decisive as to blood. Another peculiarity is to have five claws on each foot. This mark, however, though desirable as a distinctive characteristic of the bird, still, like color, it does not decide conclusively the purity of the blood. It is not uncommon that a brood from a pair genuine as to blood, having all the characteristics, should still in part have five, and in part four claws. The cock is a splendid bird—rich and beautiful in plumage—large, erect, sprightly, and bold as a warrior. I consider them healthy, hardy, easy to keep, and in all respects a valuable and desirable fowl. To the farmer, who raises poultry for the market, for table use, no breed, on account of size and quality, offers higher promise. I should consider the poultry yard of a good farmer inexcusably deficient, unless it embraced both these breeds—the Poland for the production of eggs, and the Dorking for the market—especially since improvement is the order of the day.

Shot on the Field of Battle.

You can form no idea of the storm of balls and shells which crossed each other in their dread course. Before and around the shot on which Field-Marshal Radetski was standing, the heavy sixteen-pound shots plowed up the ground tracing in one place a deep furrow, and cutting down a tree like stubble in another. It is remarkable how each kind of missile has its own characteristic. There is the tremulous howl of the round large shot, the whistle of the musket ball, the hiss of the shell, like that of the Catherine wheel fire-work, and then its detonation as it bursts. Of these last, many exploded harmless in the air; but where one fell and did its office, the effect was fearful. One such struck an officer in the breast, exploded at that instant, struck down a man to the right and left, and cut off the upper part of the officer's body in such a fashion that his frightened horse galloped off some distance with the feet of the corpse in the stirrups. Such are the spectacles which the field of battle occasionally presents. Not far off lay a Piedmontese artillerist who had been struck on the forehead with a spent six-pound shot, which remained in the wound. A hussar had bean killed at the same instant with his horse, by a shot which had passed through the neck of the latter; they had sunk together, the rider still in the saddle, and the saber still in his hand.

The sudden collapse of a man in full vigor is what is most fearful to behold. One sinks without a groan, another jumps high from the ground with a shriek, falls over, lies stiff, and is dead! I saw a Granser from the Bsnat, with a ball in his forehead, falter a few paces, leaning on his musket like a drunken man, and then, after a faint whisper about his home, expire. Over the town the cannon smoke had spread a colossal canopy, which floated motionless above the roof like the crown of the Italian pine tree.

The Lost Mail.

By some oversight the mail for New York city from California failed to arrive by the steamer Georgia. It is not easy to calculate the consequences of this slight omission. Merchants expecting advices of consignments or fresh orders, are left in suspense for a week, and possibly a fortnight, in which time advantageous opportunities for trade may be irrecoverably lost. Others who were relying upon drafts or bills receivable contained in that mail, are embarrassed in meeting their obligations at home. The loss or detention of a single mail may affect money transactions to the amonnt of thousands of dollars. But the most serious evil arising from this cause is the trial of the affections of many who were anxiously awaiting intelligence from friends. The lonely wife, whose husband has gone to the El Dorado to better his condition, and to lay up in store for his family—the widowed mother, whose son had been enticed to the shores of the Pacific by the love of adventure or the vision of gold, having watched day after day for the arrival of the steamer, reads its announcement in the morning news, and her impatient heart chides the postman for his delay in bringing tidings from the absent loved one. But no letter comes. What troubled thoughts crowd that longing heart. "Has any evil befallen him? Is he sick and helpless, so far away?" "Perhaps," Hope suggests, "perhaps he is already on his return, coming to take me by surprise." And then follows the dreadful conjecture—that absence may have made him careless and forgetful. But every supposition gives way to an aggravated suspense, when it is announced that there is no mail, and that crushed and burdened spirit revives only to renew its watching for another weary week. Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.

What an element of civilization is the Mail; what an indespensable of life, entering into its dearest affections and its most momentous concerns. Little do they who handle carelessly the foreign mail-bag, or even the little village mail, tossing it hither and thither, not regarding whether it is put in place, and duly forwarded to its destination; little do such think with what treasures of love and hope, of joy and grief, every such mail is freighted. The heart of this great, busy, teeming, panting, sorrowing world, is bound up in each day's Mail. [Independent.

How to Arrest Cholera.

The Editor of the Louisville (Ky.) Journal insists that the ravages of this dreaded pestilence were arrested in that city by efficient sanitary regulations, under the auspices of Dr. Theodore S. Bell. The Journal says:

The process followed here so successfully was simply that as soon as the disease broke out, the spot whence the malaria rose was speedily discovered, and sand was strown thick over the decaying vegetable matter, and on the sand lime was liberally scattered. Meanwhile the occupants of ground floors were removed to healthy places. This process has never failed to stop the Cholera within a few days, and we earnestly recommend it to the attention of persons residing in other parts of the country.

Whenever the Cholera makes its appearance, let those persons who have been accustomed to lodging on the ground floors leave them. Night is the season in which the disease makes the most havoc, and the nearer you approach the ground the more deadly it becomes. Persons whose sleeping rooms are elevated, as a general rule, escape Cholera, unless they are grossly imprudent in diet or exposure. Bad food kills its hundreds when Cholera is about, while bad air kills its thousands.

When a neighborhood is infected, let all those who live in shantees and one story houses be immediately removed, and those who have occupied lower stories and have upper stories to retreat to do so. The happiest results have followed an observance of this course here.

Captive Lady among the Camanches.—It is stated that a trader among the Camanche Indians has discovered, in a camp of that nation, a white woman, fair and comely in appearance, who is intermarried among them, and says she is the sister of Lieut. Love or Lovett, who commanded a train which left Independence, about three years ago, for Santa Fe; that she was in company with the party when it was attacked by the Camanches, and that her brother was badly wounded, a large number of the men were killed, and she, with a number of men, were carried off prisoners by the Indians. She says she is well treated by her husband, but the women are cruel to her—that she is anxious to return to her friends, and that four or five good riding horses will procure her ransom.

A Family of Animals.—A person in Liverpool has succeeded in forming what he calls a "happy family" of animals; that is, he has taught a large number of animals, of the most diverse propensities and opposite natures, to live together in perfect peace. He has now fifty-five animals, of seventeen different kinds, among which are cats, dogs, monkeys, rats, pigeons, fowls, hawks, starlings, pigs, rabbits, &c., who live and sleep together unwatched. At one time, for an experiment, they were kept for thirty-six hours without food, and no creature was injured. Similar experiments have succeeded before, but none on so large a scale.

To Destroy Ants.—Various plans have been proposed for the destruction of these insects. Rags, well saturated with turpentine, thrust into the crevices where they abound, will certainly destroy them, as also will oil, if it come in contact with their bodies. Dr. Bostock found lime very serviceable in expelling them, and water, in which the outer green skins of walnuts have been soaked, has been used with success; salt has also been stated to be objectionable to them. One of the simplest and most effectual remedies is to lay wide-mouthed bottles in their tracks, or near the mouths of their burrows, placing bits of raw meat within. The ants will greedily attack the latter, and may be destroyed from time to time by shaking the bottle over hot water. [Dr. Westwood.

"All Aboard."—While standing at the depot at Westerly, R. I., I observed a man with a carpet bag in hand waiting for the cars. He was in close conversation with a friend, when "all aboard" was shouted, and the cars moved slowly forward. "Get on," said his friend. "There is time enough when the last car comes along," he answered. The last car went whizzing by—his attempts to get on proved a failure. One step in time and he would have been safe. I thought how very many are like this man. The cry is sounding in their ears "all aboard," and the cars are even at their doors They see others getting on, but they say, "There is time enough when the last car comes along." The last car indeed comes, they make an effort to get on, miss their footing, and plunge into hell. [Am. Mess.

Insect Life.—Professor Agassiz says, more than a life time would be necessary to enumerate the various species of insects, and describe their appearance. Meiger, a German, collected and described 600 species of flies, which he collected in a district of ten miles circumference. There have been collected in Europe 27,000 species of insects preying on wheat. In Berlin, two professors are engaged in collecting, observing and describing insects and their habits, and already they have published five large volumes upon the insects which attack forest trees.

The Parrot.—In a small family, in the south part of this city, says the Portsmouth Journal, there was a parrot which had found a home there for years, and had become a pet of the family. A child was taken sick this spring, and was not seen by the parrot for some days. The bird had been used to repeat her name; and in the child's absence kept repeating the name so incessantly as to annoy the family. The child died; the repetition of the name was kept up, until one of the family took the parrot to the room where the corpse lay. The parrot turned first one side of its head and then the other towards the corpse, apparently eyeing it, and was then taken back. He never repeated the name again, and was at once silent, and the next day died.

United in Death.—At Louisville, on the 24th ult., a Mrs. Jacques was seized with cholera. A physician was called, who sent her husband for medicine. On his return, he inquired of the doctor how his wife was, and was told she could not possibly live. Thereupon he calmly took out his watch, and, handing it to his brother, said—"My wife is going to die, and I cannot live without her; I shall die too." He seemed in perfect health at the time; but all the symptoms of cholera made their appearance immediately, and he died in three hours.

Relief for the Stung.—The irritation produced by the stings of bees, wasps, spiders, gnats, mosquitoes, &c., may be relieved by using either a solution of common salt, borax, or diluted water of ammonia. Onion juice has been recommended for the same purpose. The application of eau de Cologne, or a similar stimulant, will convert the itching into a smarting, which is more tolerable.

The Canada Thistle.—The Legislature of Wisconsin has recently passed an act by which any owner or lessee of land who shall knowingly permit the Canada thistle to go to seed on such land, is deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, to be punished by a fine not exceeding five, nor less than one dollar, with costs.

Variety.

Every year's experience in the ministry of this country shows the vast importance of scriptural exposition. Let ministers be encouraged to discharge this duty, from the advantages derived from it, as stated by Dr. Dwight. He says, "I took up the practice expounding the Scriptures when I was a minister of a parish. I never was thanked so much for any other sermons as for those. For this reason I think it is necessary to explain the plainer truths of the Scripturers, as well as the more intricate."

The Pittsburg Gazette says that Mr. Solomon Sutter, a highly respectable mechanic of Alleghany City, has, it understands, discovered a method of decomposing water by mechanical means, and without the use of a galvanic battery, at a merely nominal expense. He made this discovery by mere accident, in the pursuit of his business as a blacksmith, and was first made aware of the fact by the hydrogen evolved from the water exploding, though fortunately without doing much damage.

Some suppose that every learned man is an educated man. No such thing. That man is educated who knows himself, and takes common-sense views of men and things around him. Some very learned men are the greatest fools in the world; the reason is, they are not educated men. Learning is only the means, not the end; its value consists in giving the means of acquiring, the use of which properly managed enlightens the mind.

Messrs. Burgoyne & Co., San Francisco, shipped by the last steamer to Messrs. Wm. Hoge & Co., New York, some 300 specimens of gold, in dust, lumps, and quartz, one of which weighs 193 lbs., said to be the finest and largest piece ever discovered. The last-mentioned specimen is destined to be sent to the great London exhibition of 1851, as a specimen of the products of California.

In the District Court of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, Judge Lowrie has recently decided that a building committee may sue and collect a subscription made for building a church. W. Chambers, one of the building committee himself, was sued in the name of the other members of the committee, and judgment was rendered against him.

Mr. Alinzor Clark, of Southfield, Richmond county, Staten Island, has invented an improvement on pitchforks, consisting in the manner by which he can transform the fork from one of two prongs, to three prongs, so as to make it more suitable for forking and pitching both short and long hay, &c, as may be desired.

The Pennsylvania Miltonian says that Mr. Kerr Rsssell, of Lewis township, saw a land turtle on his farm recently, which he witnessed being marked June 3, 1800, and which he has seen on his farm every year since. It looks as young as it did fifty years ago, and promises to live fifty years more.

Mr. Nice, of Pottsville, grows a grape vine twined round an apple tree. The vine has for years borne blossoms, but no fruit. This year fruit appears, which externally is apple, with its down, its flush, its tufted crown, &c., internally the pulpy texture is more grape than apple, but the seed and capsular tegument favor the apple.

A project has been put forth for a new railway from London to Liverpool, the guage to be 20 feet, carriages 200 feet long, two-deckers, with refreshment-rooms, pay-office. No station-houses, fare 2d. per mile, time, 4 hours.

It was said by a great man that "the chief mistake of the world, and the greatest bar to the happiness and well-being of mankind, rich and poor, is thinking that all the money we are possessed of is our own."

Lord Brougham, at a recent meeting of the society for the amendment of the law, announced his intention of visiting the United States in the month of February next.

The coal-whippers of the port of London have subscribed £10, collected in pence, toward the Workingman's Monument to the late Sir Robert Peel.

The Constitutionel states that the Chateaux de Meudon, near Paris, is being prepared for Abd-el-Kader, who is to be transferred there from Amboise, where he is at present, confined.

At Black's store, Tippah Co., Miss., near the State line, on the 23d July, a fatal affray occured between Drs. Wooten and Brandon, two practicing physicians of that vicinity. The latter was killed and the former mortally wounded.

Five of the persons charged with robbing the cargo and passengers of the bark Elizabeth, recently wrecked on fire Island, were brought to New York, on Saturday, by one of the Deputy Marshals, and committed for examination.

A little daughter, four years old, of Mr. Jason Gillet of Ypsilanti, Michigan, died of hydrophobia a few days. She had been bitten by a rabid dog.

The Vincennes (Ia.) Gazette notices the death in that place, on the 6th inst. of Mr. B. S. Whitney, Secretary of the American Live Stock Insurance Company.

On the 12th inst., a collision occurred on the Harlem Railroad near Fordham, by which considerable damage was done, and one man killed outright.

The Maysville Sentinel says the steamer Transit, running on Chautauque Lake, collapsed her flues on Friday, just as she was leaving the wharf at that village. Three persons were scalded, but none fatally.

In Belchertown, on the Fourth, Rev. Mr. Wolcott delivered an oration in the church, and in the evening appeared in his Turkish costume, illustrating the manners and peculiarities of the Turks.

The Spanish war-steamer Pizarro, which arrived at this port on Thursday night, brought to our shores the Count de Alcoy, Captain General of Cuba, with his family. He comes, as is rumored, mainly for the sake of his health.

Elizabeth R., aged 10 years, only daughter of Rev. Gorham D. Abbot, was so severely injured a few days since at Long Branch, N. J., by a kick from a horse, that she died.

We see it stated that eight or ten slaves have escaped from Washington within a few days.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF A TOURIST—No. 5.

PARIS, July 21st, 1850.

The Parisians say that the Boulevards are the finest part of Paris. They are the most characteristic, certainly; and I doubt if, anywhere else, there can be seen a place exhibiting civilization in so perfect a state. The taste and beauty of the street architecture—the joyousness and refinement with which even things inanimate seem imbued—are well united with the ease and freedom of manners which on their part are contagious to the strangest nature, and which, though found everywhere in Paris, may be seen to a greater extent on the Boulevard, owing to its being the promenade and the afternoon resort of those who love society and social pleasure—and what Frenchman does not? Of all men, the Parisian best understands the secret of social enjoyment—that kind of cheerful selfishness which, considering the present happiness of all around him to be an essential part of his own, permits the utmost personal freedom or eccentricity in others, without invidious remark or contemptuous comparison, and which, finding no importance in others, save as they contribute to his own pleasure, leaves all farther differences of taste, manners, or customs, as well as the faults, follies, and blunders of others, as matters of entire indifference to him. The result is a feeling of freedom which I have experienced no where else, consequent on the consciousness that whatever faux pas you may commit, it is unremarked on—most likely unnoticed. Every one knows the difference between the embarrassment caused by a blunder noticed and one unnoticed; and so with the absence of embarrassment, one feels almost the ease of solitude, and yet unconsciously imbibes more or less of the grace and politeness around.

The Boulevards were shorn of a part of their glory in the former Revolution, when the trees were cut down for the barricades. They are now replaced by young ones, which merely suggest the idea of the beauty of the street, when the walks were arched over with those long lines of trees, of which a very few are left, spared by some accident. At the lower end stands the Madelaine, of which I have spoken before—a splendid and imposing structure. It is built of a light-colored stone, in imitation of a Grecian temple, surrounded by a facade of Corinthian columns, and having in niches in the wall statues of the saints, finely executed, and some of them very beautiful. On the front is a bas relief representing the Savior judging mankind. The interior is magnificently ornamented and decorated; and though I am not one of those who think the "glory of God to consist in the poverty of his temple," I think the gorgeousness of the Madelaine better fitted for a Pagan temple than for an expression of Christian aspirations. Carving and gold bewilder the eye, and the mind seems oppressed in the lavish wealth exhibited around. Higher up on the Boulevards are most of the theaters. There are many cafes and restaurants on the south side of the street, and here you may see, in the latter part of the afternoon and evening, parties of gentlemen and ladies taking refreshments in the open air. Little tables are set out in the shade of the buildings, and around them they sit, taking their wine and chatting as freely as in their own houses. This seems strange to one coming from the formality of London, but it it is no less pleasant than strange. Here you may sit through the hours of the summer day's decline, and, luxuriating over a cup of exquisite coffee, or, ice cream if you prefer it, watch the motley throng passing ceaselessly by. You may moralize if you wish it, or, what is better, you may enjoy yourself, and in the happy consciousness of being an unnoticed mute in the pleasure-bent multitude, enjoy yourself as you please. If you choose to take your hat off, no conventional decorum tells you it is improper to sit or walk in the street bareheaded. Here, too, are the principal magazines, indicating, I suppose, by their tasteful exteriors, the quality of the merchandize within; but my positive acquaintance with the interiors is very small. I passed through one on a street turning off from the Boulevards, which crossed an entire block, fronting on two streets. It was arranged much like Stewart's in New York, though more extensive. There were rooms for every kind of dry goods—ready made clothes, and rooms to try them on in.

The Boulevards have been the scene of several barricades and battles in the Revolutions, and in order to prevent the making of any more such extemporaneous fortifications, the government has macadamized it. The large square blocks of granite with which Paris is paved, are too convenient for warlike purposes. My friend F., as we walked up the street, showed me the spot where the revolution of February began. He was present when the first shot was fired, though, like the rest who were there, without any intention of having any agency in a scene like that which followed. He was on his way to a ball, and seeing the populace and soldiery in such threatening juxtaposition, he stopped to see what was the matter. The people were incensed at the prohibition of the banquet, and were making a demonstration of their discontent, but with no idea of instigating a revolution; and finding their time wasted, as they thought, would shortly have dispersed, when the shot was fired which is well known as the first shot of the rising, and, wounding an officer, was responded to by a volley from the soldiers. F. said he was taken entirely by surprise—the man before him fell dead, and as he was not in fighting rig he retired. In a few hours there was not a street in Paris that was not barricaded. I looked with interest on the spot where that first blood was shed, the seed of so much revolution, and who can say how many European Republics? I hope but one, and that one to supersede the necessity of many. He had also served as a National Guard at the insurrection of June—the bloodiest battle Paris has seen in all its revolutionary times—and went with me to the quarter which was the battle-field. Looking on the streets in this part of the city, one would wonder no longer at the duration of the struggle, but rather at the boldness that would storm such strongholds. Narrow streets, winding into a perfect maze—passages and by-ways, shut in by high, strongly built houses, every one a fortress—would have discouraged any body but Frenchmen. F. told me an anecdote of General Changarnier, which I had not heard. During the battle the General had his horse shot under him, and he was thrown to the ground. The place where he fell was but a few yards from the barricade; and on being extricated he began hunting for something on the ground, paying no heed to the remonstrances of his officers at thus exposing himself. He had dropped his cigar, and replied, "It was a good one, and I won't lose it."

On Sunday last, I visited Versailles, and spent several hours wandering over the magnificent palace. One becomes very easily bewildered in the multitude of long galleries, saloons and halls, and I went at random, paying attention to my way no farther than to notice the "sortie" and "entree" of the attendants, as I passed from saloon to hall, or from hall to corridor. There were long porticos and galleries, through which I walked between lines of statues till it seemed as if I were in one of the enchanted palaces of the Arabian nights. We entered a suite of apartments in which were paintings of the battles of France; then, passing through an open portico, with a line of statues and monumental effigies on either hand, we went up a flight of stairs into the rooms which are being embellished with pictures by Horace Vernet, the great French battle painter. Then, passing through room after room, whose walls are also covered with pictures whose size and number afford an apt illustration of the liberality and taste of the French Government, we entered a saloon ornamented in the richest style with carving and gold, and having the side opposite the windows covered with mirrors. We could not stop long to look here, for there were hundreds of pictures yet to see; so, wending through devious passages we came to the great saloon. Here richness of decoration had done the utmost. The battles of France were depicted on the walls and between the pictures, and around the window niches were busts of the warriors who had died on the battle-field, "for the laws and liberties of France." Going up another flight of stairs, we came to the State Apartments—the royal bed-chamber, in which were the sceptre and crown beneath a glass screen. Mere splendor exhibited for its own sake interested me little, and I hurried through to the picture galleries beyond. In the galleries of portraits I was no less surprised than pleased to find that of our Henry Clay, and I thought of home and my fellow-citizenship with him with renewed pride. It was an excellent portrait, and the noble face beamed out a welcome and an introduction to the dead dignitaries around. I didn't feel so strange among them after that.

But to go on farther in describing the Palace were to repeat what I have said. It is one maze of exhibitions of splendor and taste. We were several hours going through as fast as convenient, and yet F. told me I had not seen near all.

We visited the palace of the Trianou, a comparatively small building, situated back at some distance in the park, and fitted up with the same splendor as the great palace.

The fountains of Versailles are being repaired, and in consequence we were unable to see them in operation. 'The great waters,' as they are called, must certainly be a beautiful spectacle when playing. A gently declining walk leads from the palace, a distance of some hundred yards, with a line of miniature fountains playing from marble urns on each side. Following this way down, you come to a large circular space occupied by the basin of the fountain, one side of which presents a perpendicular face, on which are sculptured gigantic statues of the water gods and sea monsters, pouring out jets of water in every direction. From the surface of the water arise very large columns, and along the edge above the statues is another line of small fountains. Other fountains are in different parts of the park, which is laid out in walks and carriage ways, lined with the quaintly trimmed trees. Artificial cascades and sequestered nooks are found in every direction, and here the people come in thousands on the fete days in quest of enjoyment, the object of their lives.

In one of the more quiet glades, we passed a soldier stretched on the ground, smoking his cigar, with a woman seated by his side. "See!" said F., "he makes poetry now; he has all a Frenchman wants." After rambling till we were tired through the almost boundless park, and seeing a balloon ascension, we took the cars to St. Cloud, where we dined, and after an hour's ramble through the Park returned to Paris. The valley of the Seine, from the railroad near St. Cloud, is one of the finest distant views I ever saw. It is quite level, and presents an intermingling of vineyard, forest, and grain-field, bounded by the spires and domes of Paris, and with the Seine winding through at your feet. Well may Frenchmen love, 'la belle France."

CURIOUS CORRESPONDENCE.

The following correspondence was furnished us by a venerable inhabitant of Newport, R. I., Jeremy Bliss, Esq., from a manuscript copy in his possession. It is a valuable relic of the times that tried men's souls. We are not aware that it has ever before been published. It will therefore be read with increased interest.

Copy of a Letter sent by the Ministers of the Presbyterian Association to the town of Providence, together with their answer, in the year 1721.

To the Honourable Joseph Jenhiss, Esqr. late Dep'ty Govr.; William Hopkins, Esqr.; Major Joseph Williams, Esqr.; Joseph Whipple, Esqr.; Coll. Richd. Waterman, Esqr.; Arthur Venner, Esqr.; —— Wilkinson, Esqr.; Philip Tillinghast, Esqr.; Capt'n Nicolas Power, Esqr.; and Capt'n Thomas Harris, Esqr.; and Capt'n Wm. Harris, Esqr.; Andrew Harris, Esqr.; —— Brown, Esqr.; John Burton, Esqr.; and Jonathan Sprague, Jur., Esqr.; and to the other eminent men in the town of Providence: pardon our ignorance, if any of your honourable Christian names, or if your proper order, be mistaken:

HONOURABLE GENTLEMEN,—

We wish you grace, mercy, and peace, and all blessings, for time and eternity, through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. How pleasing to Almighty God and our glorious Redeemer, and how conducible to the publick peace and safety, an hearty union and good affection of all pious Protestants, of whatsoever particular denomination, on account of some differences in opinion, would be, by divine blessing, yourselves as well as we are not insensible; and with what peace and love societies of different modes of worship have generally entertained one another in your governm't, we cannot think of it without admiration; and we suppose, under God, 'tis owing to the choice liberty granted to Protestants of all persuasions in the Royall Charter graciously given you; and to the wise and prudent conduct of the gentlemen that have been improved as governors and justices in your collony. And the Rev'd Mr. Greenwood, before his decease at Rehoboth, was much affected with the wisdom, and excelent temper, and great candours of such of yourselves as he had the honour to wait upon; and with those worthy and obliging expressions of kind respect he met with when he discoursed about his desires to make an experiment, whether the preaching of our minnisters in Providence might not be acceptable, and whether some who do not greatly incline to frequent any pious meeting in the place, on the first day of the weeks, might not be drawn to give their presence to hear our minnisters, and so might be won over (by the influences of Heav'n,) into serious godliness. And altho' God has taken that dear brother of ours from his work in this world, yet it has pleased the Lord to encline some reverend ministers of Connecticut and some of ours to preach among you, and we all are beholden to the mercy of Heaven for the freedom and safety they have enjoyed, under the wise and good government of the place, and that they met with kind respect, and with numbers that gave a kind reception to their minnistrations among you. These things we acknowledge with all thankfulness, and if such preachings should be continued among your people (design'd only for the glory of God and Christ Jesus in chief; and nextly for the promoting of the spiritual and eternal happiness of immortal precious souls, and furtherence of a joyful account, in the great day of judgment;) we earnestly request, as the Rev'd Mr. Greenwood in his life time did before us, that yourselves, according to your power, and interest and the influence that God has blessed you with, will continue your just protections; and that you add such further countenance and encouragement thereunto, as may be pleasing unto the eternal God, and may, through Christ Jesus, obtain for you the greater reward in Heaven. And if ever it should come to pass, that a small meeting-house should be built in your town, to entertain such as are willing to hear our minnisters, we should count it a great favour if you all, gentlemen, or any of yours, would please to build pews therein, in which you and they (as often as you see fit) may give your and their presence and holy attention. And we hope and pray, that ancient matters (that had acrimony unhapily in them) may be buried in oblivion; and that grace and peace and holiness and glory may dwell in every part of New-England; and that the several provinces and collonies in it may love one another with pure hearts fervently. So recommending you all, and your ladies, and children, and neighbours, and people, to the blessing of Heaven, and humbly asking your prayers to the divine throne for us, we take leave to subscribe ourselves,

Your friends and servants,

PETER THATCHER, }
JOHN DANFORTH, } Com. of the Association.

DATED Oct'r 27, 1721.

The Answer.

Messrs. John Danforth, Peter Thatcher, and Joseph Belcher, Committee of the Association of the Presbyterian Ministry:

SIRS,—

We, the inhabitants of the town of Providence, received your letter, bearing date Oct'r 27, 1721, which was read publickly in the hearing of the people, and we judge it ungrateful to return you no answer; but, finding it to be on religious concerns, we counted it our duty to ask counsel of God, lest we should be beguiled as Israel was by the Gibeonites. And, therefore, inasmuch as the sacred Scriptures was given forth by the spirit of the Living God, to be our instructor and counsellor; to them, therefore, we shall apply ourselves.

And, in the first place—We take notice of the honourable titles you give to many of us. Your end, we take to be, is to ingratiate yourselves into our affections, and to favour your request. But such flattery in matters of religion we take to be of dangerous consequence, as witness the Hivites, who said, We are your servants, and we have heard of the fame of the God of Israel. In this way did Josiah, King of Israel, set up idolatry, after the death of Jehoiada; but we find Elihew deny'd it for fear of offending God. But the enemies of Judah, for want of the fear of God, practised in this way. Daniel was cast into the lyon's den, and Herod sought to slay the Lord's Christ, and some at Rome sought to make division in the church of Christ (viz.) by flattering words and fair speeches to deceive the hearts of the simple. But saith the spirit, Such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own bellies; and saith the Apostle Peter, Through covetousness and feigned words, they shall make merchandize of you. To conclude this article, we see that flattery in matters of worship has been, and now is a cloak to blind men and lead them out of the way, and serves for nothing but to advance pride and vain glory. Shall we praise you in this? We praise you not.

Secondly—You salute us all as saints in the faith and order of the Gospel, wishing all of us all blessings for the time present, and to all eternity. This is not the language of Canaan, but of Babel, to salute men of all persuasions, as in the faith and order of the Gospel; this is the voice of the false prophets, which daubed with untempered mortar, sewing pillows under all armholes, crying peace when there is no peace. Is this your way to enlighten the dark corners of the earth? Surely, this is darkness itself.

Thirdly—You highly extol freedom and liberty of conscience to men of all persuasions, affirming it to be most pleasing to God, and tending most to love and peace, and for the tranquility of any people. And you say, that we are not insensible of this as well as you. To this we say, Amen; and you well know it hath been our faith and practice hitherto.

Fourthly—We take notice how you praise the love and peace that dissenters of all ranks entertain one another with in this government, and it is as you say to your admiration, and you suppose that under God it is owing to the choice liberty granted to Protestants of all degrees in the Royal Charter graciously given us, and to the discreet and wise rulers under whose conduct we enjoy this happiness. We answer, This happiness principally consists in their not allowing societies any superiority one over another; but each society supports their own minnistry of their own free will, and not by constraint or force upon any man's person or estate, and this greatly adds to our peace and tranquility; but the contrary, that takes any man's estate by force to maintain their own or any other minnistry, it serves for nothing but to provoke to wrath, envy, and strife, and this wisdom cometh not from above, but is earthly, sensual, and devilish. In these two we hope you are real and hearty, and do it not to flourish your complements; otherwise, you make a breach upon the 3d commandment. This is but a preface to make room for your request, which is,

Fifthly—That we would be pleased, according to our power, to countenance, protect, and encourage your minnisters in their coming and preaching in this town of Providence. To which we answer, We admire at your request, that you should imagin or surmise that we should consent to either, inasmuch as you well know, that as for witnessing for God, your minnisters was never set up by God, but have consecrated themselves by their human learning, and that you have changed His ordinances, and for your greediness after filthy lucre, some you have put to death, others you banished on pain of death, others you barbarously scourged, others you imprisoned and seized upon their estates, and at this very present you are rending towns in pieces, ruining the people with invincible charges, which makes many decline your minnistry, and for refuge fly to the Church of England, others to the dissenters of all persuasions, and you like wolves persue; and wherever you find them within your reach, you seize upon their estates, and all this is done to make room for your pretended minnisters to live in idleness, pride, and fullness of bread. Shall we countenance such a minnistry for Christ's minnisters? Nay, verily; these are not the marks of Christ's minnisters, but a papal spot, and such a spot is abhored by all pious Protestants; and since you wrote this letter, the constable of Attleborough has been taking away the estates of our dear friends and pious dissenters to maintain their minnister; the like hath been done in the town of Mendon. Is this the way of peace? Is this the fruit of your love? Why do you hug the iniquity of Eli's sons, and walk in the steps of the false prophets, to bite with your teeth, and cry peace; but no longer than men put into your mouths? But you prepare war against them, and Christ bids us beware of such as comes to us in sheep's cloathing, but inwardly are otherwise; and your cloathing is so scant that all may see your shame, and your teachers teach like Gideon, who taught the men of Succoth with the briars and thorns of the wilderness.

Sixthly—You freely confess, that we entertain you kindly at all times. We answer, We hope we are all so taught of God to love our enemies and to do good to them that hate us, and pray for them that despitefully use us; and since you admire the love and peace we do enjoy, we pray you to use the same methods, and write after our copy; and for the future, never let us hear of your pillaging conscientious dissenters to maintain your minnisters. O let not this sin be your everlasting ruin.

Seventhly—You desire that all former injury done by you to us, may be buried in oblivion. We say, Far be it from us to revenge ourselves, or to deal to you as you have dealt to us; but rather say with our Lord, Father, forgive them, they know not what they do. But if you mean that we should not speak of former actions done hurtfully to any man's person, we say, God never called for that, nor suffered it to be hid, as witness Cain, Joab, and Judas are kept on record, to deter other men from doing the like.

Lastly—You desire of us to improve our interest in Christ Jesus for you at the throne of grace. Far be it from us to deny you this request; for we are commanded to pray for all men, and we count it our duty to pray for you, that God would open your eyes and cause you to see how far you have erred from the way of peace, and that God would give you godly sorrow for the same, and such repentance as is never to be repented of; and that you may find mercy and favour of our Lord Jesus Christ at his appearing. And so, hoping as you tender the everlasting welfare of your souls, and good of your people, you will embrace our advice, and will not suffer passion so to rule as to cause you to hate reproof, lest you draw down divine vengance on yourselves and on the land, we, your friends in the town of Providence, bid you farewell.

Subscribed for and in their behalf,
By your ancient friend and servant,
For Christ his sake,
JONATHAN SPRAGUE.

A CHILD ANGEL.*

BY PARK BENJAMIN.

"I want to be an angel," said a child,
As on his mother's face he looked and smiled.
It was the twilight's hour, and Evening's shade
Fell, like sweet peace, on stream and hill and glade.
One after one the stars broke in the sky,
And tender airs came murmuring softly by.
The Night was holy—shedding such a light
As beamed on Bethlehem in the holiest night.
O'er all the heavens the child's beseeching eyes
Wandered in silence, full of deep surprise;
He watched and marveled, till his soul ran o'er
With joy, and hope and love, ne'er felt before.
"What means my son?" the mother mildly said—
And the young child declined his little head,
Whispering once more in sorrowful reply,
"I want to be an angel and to die."
"And why, my darling?" "Because Heaven is there,
High up beyond those stars, so pure and fair,
Where angels live and love the God, who gave
His word to comfort, and His Son to save!"
The mother called him to her knee and wept—
Wept with the child till he sank down and slept
Upon her bosom; then she meekly rose,
And took him to his chamber's calm repose.
She knelt and prayed such prayers as mothers pray—
That God would guide him through life's stormy way,
That he might give his heart to God, and stand
Forever gazing on the blessed land!

A few brief months passed o'er the boy—and lo!
Gone from his eyes was their translucent glow—
White were his cheeks, his lips all thin and pale,
Like roses blanched by winter's early gale.
Sick unto death he lay—but no alarms
Could fright her darling in her mother's arms,
Still on her face she fondly looked and smiled—
"I'm going to be an angel," said the child.

PERSECUTION IN SWEDEN.

The Independent says that Fredrick Nellsson, a Baptist missionary colporteur, a native of Sweden, has been subjected to a regular old-fashioned religious persecution by the bigoted Lutheran clergy of that kingdom. Having essyed in vain to bring him to submit to their consistory, the clergy appealed to the secular arm, and he was regularly tried, on the 11th of March, 1850, for the crime of preaching the Gospel without permission of the Lutheran Church authorities! He was convicted on his own confession, and sentenced to be banished from Sweden. On his trial he presented a written document, setting forth his manner of life, conversion, creed, and present evangelical labors among his own countrymen. We give two extracts to show his spirit. Let Sweden take care how she expels such men from her soil.

"As a professor of the Protestant religion," he says, "I have always, from the time when God through his grace led me to a true knowledge of his Son Jesus Christ, and a living faith in him, which happened in the year 1834, believed it to be not only my privilege, but my bounden duty, to seek the truth from its own proper spring—the Holy Scriptures; which by the Lutheran Church are acknowledged to be the fundamental rule of whatever in religion is taught, believed, or practiced. From them have I derived the doctrinal views which I entertain. Through the study of the New Testament alone I have been convinced of the views I hold in relation to baptism, the Lord's Supper, and the government of Christian churches. But I have never, though I consider it my duty to teach these views, enticed any one to apostatize from the Lutheran Church, and never reviled that church or her minister; but have simply set forth what I deemed the truth of Holy Scripture, for the consideration of those who have conversed with me.

* * * * *

"I have now labored in my native land for more than ten years, according to my own opinion, for the spiritual and eternal welfare of my countrymen, urged to do so by Christian love. The Love of Christ alone could induce me to resign what were to me promising temporal prospects in America, in order that I might labor in my native land for the honor of the Lord and the best interests of my countrymen. How painful to me, therefore, is the thought, that this my beloved country, which I love next to my own soul, now intends to drive me from her maternal bosom. O that the Lord may preserve her from this disgrace, I will not say sin, of banishing, in this enlightened time of the 19th century, one of her humblest children, for no other crime then that of having acted according to his convictions, derived from the Word of God."

HOW SOME PEOPLE LIVE.

A philanthropic lady, who has the charity and courage to explore the dark side of New York city life, lately received a request to visit a worthy family, now in extreme destitution. She says:—

"While mounting the stairs leading to their room, I heard what was evidently intended as an attempt at singing, but which to me sounded more like crying; and, on entering, found two girls, the eldest of whom, about 15 years of age, was busily engaged in binding shoes, while the younger was sweeping the floor. 'Is your mother at home?' I asked. 'Yes, ma'am, but she is lying down,' was the reply; and while the younger went to call her, I asked some questions of the elder. 'Is your mother sick?' 'Yes, ma'am, no, ma'am, not exactly sick, at least I don't think she would be sick if it wasn't for her trouble,' answered the poor girl, on whose cheek I now observed traces of tears. 'What do you get for binding those shoes?' 'Four cents a pair, ma'am.' 'And how much can you earn a week?' 'When we feel pretty well, we make about a dollar and a half.' 'And what rent do you pay?' 'Three dollars a month, ma'am. We had a nice large room and bed-room before we moved, but that was $5 a month, and mother had to take a lower rent,' said the girl. Just then the mother entered; and from her I heard what indeed I had already learned, that she had three children, the youngest a boy, lame in his feet; that her husband, who had always neglected her, had left her about a year ago, and was now profitably employed at his trade in a distant city; but that previous to his departure he had offered marriage to a young girl in New York, to whom he had written regularly ever since; while to the wife he had written but seldom. The girl, however, having heard that he was a married man, had sought out the wife and brought her his letters; and in confirmation of this, I saw his letters, both to the wife and to the girl, as also one from his employers to the wife, replying to some queries of her's respecting him, and speaking well of him as a workman. She further told me that she had been compelled to sell or pawn all her furniture, piece by piece, till she had only a table, a few chairs, a straw bed, and one sheet left. I saw that she could scarcely restrain her tears, and the two girls wept outright. I asked her if she attended church. 'Ah,' she exclaimed, 'when I hear the church bells, I feel as if I should fly—as if I could not stay away, but I have neither hat, shoes, nor dress, and so I can't go.' 'Have you any bread in the house?' I inquired. 'No, ma'am,' eagerly interposed the little lame boy. 'Have you had any breakfast?' 'No, ma'am,' said the child. Upon which the mother explained, that she had received her usual 'shoe money' the night before, but on paying her rent, had but 25 cents left, and was already owing at the grocery. I immediately sent for a loaf and some milk, and as I beheld the eagerness with which it was hailed, I could not help thinking, could some of our good farmers witness this scene, they would surely remember it when they gather in their harvest; and by sending us of their abundance, enable us [the Home] to meet such cases with a more effectual aid."

On another occasion, she visited a woman who had, a day or two previous, applied as a beggar for bread:—

"To-day I have found her, very much as she described, and have seen but few more degraded and deplorable looking places than the little attic room where herself and five children find a shelter, for it cannot be called a 'home.' Not a regular house-keeping utensil was to be seen; two or three parts of chairs, an old table, a dirty straw bed, without bedding or pillow, seemed to be the worldly all of these six human beings. The stairs and passage-way leading to the room may not be described, for seldom has any thing more revolting met the eye of the visitor. And yet, the poor woman was contented with her lot, 'for there is many a one worse off, and not able to keep their children with them.' 'And how do you manage to employ your children—you keep them either at work or at school, I suppose.' 'Well, ma'am, the eldest, a girl of sixteen, sews with me for the shops down town. It's but little we get, but it pays our rent, and provides us a little food, and enables me, now and then, to get a rag of clothing for the children. The second has been to live out, but she is at home at present. The next two, who are boys, I tried to keep in school, but the boys put upon them for their shabby clothes, and I could not get them to go, so they go about picking chips, and gathering such fire wood as they can find. The youngest, a girl of six, is weakly and a cripple, poor child.' 'But do you feel satisfied to have your little boys out on the street, instead of going to school? don't you think they will be likely to grow up wicked, and come to the House of Refuge or State Prison?' 'Well, ma'am, it is hard to part with them, but I believe it would be better for them.' After some more conversation, she consented to have places found for two of her children, and we cannot but hope that some of them will be saved from beggary and ruin."

How many hundreds of similar pictures of want and wretchedness might be found in this great city! Who can wonder where the alms-house and the prison find their tenants, when children are raised in wretchedness and ignorance, the very recital of which makes one shudder with horror!

One reason why the world is not reformed is, because every man would have others make a beginning, and never thinks of himself.

A man seldom attacks the character of another without injuring his own.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

The nearer our Anniversaries approach, the deeper is our anxiety that the occasion should be both interesting and profitable. We bespeak the fervent prayers of our people in their behalf. Questions of importance may come up for consideration; and wo be to us, if we have nothing but human wisdom to guide us. We shall need the wisdom that is from above. May He, who gives liberally, supply us abundantly.

The action of the Missionary Society last year, determining to adopt Haiti as one of its fields of labor, and directing the Board to take immediate steps towards sending out one or more laborers, may possibly require reconsideration. Hitherto, the Board has not been able to carry out the instructions of the Society, no suitable missionary having offered himself. In the mean time, such changes in the political and social condition of that country have taken place, that the expediency of planting [illegible] mission there is very much questioned, even by those who were, at first warmly in favor of it. The Republic has been metamorphosed into an Empire; through the agency of Romish priests, Government has been made to assume an attitude of hostility towards Protestants, and Protestant missions are consequently eyed with jealousy; white persons are reported to have suffered decapitation for words spoken, in which the suspicious jealousy of the reigning monarch discovered treason; and it is most probable, that the unsettled state of affairs, throughout the Empire, would, at present, render the successful prosecution of missionary labor out of the question. What has become of Bro. Jones, who, some two years ago, embraced our sentiments, but has notwithstanding continued to labor under the patronage of the Baptist Free Mission Society, which sent him out, we do not know. Six months ago, we heard that that Society had determined to withdraw their patronage from him; and about two months ago, we were informed that they had actually sent out orders for him to return. We were also advised, that he had made arrangements to take passage for the United States by the first vessel from Port-au-Prince. Since that time, we have heard nothing. Whether some new developments in Providence have changed his mind, and induced him to continue in the field; or whether he has become an object of suspicion, and has been cast into prison; or whether, in the fearful gale of July, which raged about the time he was expected to set sail, he was lost, we know not. We trust, however, that God has spared him, and that we shall behold his face among us as a witness to the down-trodden Sabbath of the Bible. Should he arrive in season to attend our Anniversaries, the facts which he may furnish, together with his counsel, may be of much use in helping us to a wise conclusion with regard to the occupancy of Haiti as a missionary field.

Our Tract Society, also, is an institution which needs to be managed with wisdom, that it may prove an efficient agency in accomplishing its great design. We do not know what propositions, affecting its interests, may come up for discussion at the ensuing meeting. But we hope, that such measures will be adopted, as will show a determination not to let it flag for want of support. Much has been already accomplished through our little publications, and, by the grace of God, much more may be done.

The consultation which is to be had in reference to our Educational Interests, will call for the exercise of much wisdom, and perhaps—in view of differences of opinion that may arise—of mutual forbearance. We are happy to know, that there is among us a growing sense of the importance of a thorough education. Now and then, there is one who uses discouraging words, always taking the De Ruyter Institute, under its quondam management, for his text. But, generally, we think, our people are disposed to do what is right. Here, by the way, we may as well remark, that we by no means regard the money originally invested in the De Ruyter Institute as a loss to the denomination. It is a loss in nothing but dollars and cents. True, the Institute may not have been wisely managed. Nevertheless, it was the means of giving an impulse to the cause of education among us, such as had not been given before, and the denomination is now far in advance of what it would otherwise have been. It is impossible to throw us back where we once were. As for the loss of a few dollars, what is that to be always whining about? The experience which we have gained is probably worth all the cost to which we were subjected, to say nothing about other advantages. We are persuaded that our brethren are not so groveling as to calculate profit and loss solely by dollars and cents. There is a higher standard by which to measure our advantages, one which looks to the intellect—to the morals—to the heart. We trust, that at the approaching consultation it will be seen that our brethren consider money of no value except as it serves to elevate and ameliorate the condition of man.

We cannot conclude without once more expressing our wish that much fervent prayer may be offered in view of the approaching convocation, and that there may be a large attendance.

P. S.—We are gratified in being able to say to our readers, that since the above was in type, Bro. Jones and his family, accompanied by two Haitien converts to the Sabbath, have arrived in this city, after a passage of sixteen days from Port-au-Prince. He reports a discouraging state of things in regard to missionary operations in that country, the Emperor having given orders that Protestant missionaries shall confine their labors exclusively to the towns, and not go into the country to make converts. His sable majesty is actually made to believe, by the representations of the Romish priests, that Protestant missionaries pay their converts ten Spanish dollars a head, and has accordingly ordered that this shall not longer be done!

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 11.

GLASGOW, August 16th, 1850.

The Sunday Postal Delivery Inquiry was committed by Government to a Committee consisting of the Postmaster-General, the President of the Board of Trade, and one of the Secretaries of the Treasury. Having invited documentary evidence upon the results of the workings of the new arrangement, they now have, as I anticipated, declared against the recent alteration. They recommend that on Sundays there be a single delivery, with the least labor consistent with the public requirements, and under such arrangements as will allow those employed to attend public worship on alternate Sundays. In rural districts, they recommend no change from the practice existing at the time when the new regulations came into operation. The report itself, (with, I presume, the evidence on which it is founded,) although stated to have been laid on the table of Parliament, has not yet appeared. As Parliament was prorogued yesterday, just after the above abstract had been given of the result, little opportunity was afforded of discussing its merits—the only remarks of members that are this morning telegraphed being in approval. I do not expect that our Sunday friends will readily induce Parliament again to renew the recommendation which led to the recent suspension of Sunday deliveries; while, on the contrary, I look for an extension of Sunday postal work as the ultimate result of the discussion they have provoked. By the inquiry which this has induced, not a few, both of friends and of foes, have been led to see that the putting of Sunday in the place of the Sabbath, is a mere human invention, without the slightest support from the New Testament. To aid in this, I have had the privilege of having inserted a letter on the subject in each of the three latest numbers of the London "Illustrated Historic Times;" and, unless the decision intimated above prevent farther discussion, I hope yet more fully to be allowed to show that the change is apostacy.

Mr. Gorham was inducted on Sunday last. Is this to be considered as a termination of the case at last? This is doubtful. The party with whom the Bishop of Exeter acts, and of whom, in this case, he may, in one sense at least, be regarded as the legal representative, I believe to be more in earnest than their Evangelical brethren or opponents. The Tractarians are also a wealthy party; so that, although it is stated that the expenses already incurred in the case amount to £80,000, if it be possible to adopt farther measures according to law, it is probable that this will be done. And it is said that the Bishop has intimated a determination to institute an action on the ground of heresy in Mr. Gorham's writings. This action he is to bring into the Arches Court—where the Judge sits as the official of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Committee of the Metropolitan Church Union sought to present an Address to the Archbishop, signed or voted by 2,500, praying that he would withhold his consent to the induction of Mr. Gorham—but he declined to receive it. The day before that of the induction, some incivility was shown to Mr. G. by the curate officiating in the parish, who also refused to continue to fulfill the office under the new Vicar, in which refusal he persisted, even after being reminded that legally he was bound to give notice before leaving. The curate was put in by the Bishop of Exeter in 1847, during the prolonged litigation, and may be presumed to be a man of kindred spirit.

As Sir F. Kelly said in the Court of Exchequer that the real object aimed at by the Bishop, was the revival, in all their power, of the Houses of Convocation, so have his sympathizers avowed their conviction, that this is the only remedy for all their sorrows. Such an aggrandizement of those so Popishly inclined, would do little for the promotion of the truth as it is in Jesus. Counter-declarations have, however, been made. An Address from Reading, signed by 420 laymen, sent to the Bishop of Oxford, declared their "entire approval" of the judgment of the Privy Council; adding, that the efforts of the Tractarian party tend to plunge us again into Popish darkness. The Bishop, in replying, as might be expected, deeply lamented the tone of this Address. Perversions to Rome continue among noted individuals; among these, Archdeacon Wilberforce, brother to the Bishop of Oxford, was alledged to be, which was afterwards denied, and the rumor probably arose from what I presume is true, (not having seen it contradicted,) that the wife of the Archdeacon has joined the church of Rome. It has more recently been stated, that the Archdeacon has been cited to the Ecclesiastical Court for unsound doctrine, and the statement seems to be well founded. It would be a set-off against the Bishop of Exeter's prosecution of Mr. Gorham for heresy. Exeter himself, two months ago, was reported to be on the eve of following to Rome his notorious chaplain, the Rev. W. Maskell—but the authority was at the time declared to be questionable. If, however, he could be assured of fare equal to any of the previous perverts, his love of power would lead him onwards. I know not whether the movement of Dr. Wiseman, who goes immediately to Rome to get a Cardinal's hat, may not open some suitable place for the Bishop of Exeter, should Government deem his continued opposition to their "lawfully constituted" authority sufficient for deposition. To the lovers of Rome's mummeries no little gratification is however afforded in the Church of England, if they please. At the consecration of the church of St. Barnabas, in London, lately, at which the Bishop of London took part, they celebrated an octave, or festival of eight days, which closely approximated to Rome's scriptural pageants.

I observe to-day, that a Mr. McBeth is intimating Lectures to be delivered in New York on religious subjects, and therefore judge it right to advert to his case, as he was formerly a minister in this city. He was connected with the Free Church here, and being a man of talent, had a large congregation. He has just been deposed by that Church for immorality, having fled from their discipline when about to be tried for the offence. It is said that the evidence put the matter beyond the possibility of question. It was, however, the second accusation of the same character; and although the decision of his Presbytery was reversed by the General Assembly, and he was again allowed to return to his charge, the evidence to me appeared so conclusive, that I was not surprised that in less than a year his guilt was again exhibited, so as to leave no doubt on the part of the Church Courts. In such circumstances, it were derogatory to the God of purity to give countenance to his discourses, while no indication is given of repentance.

THE FREE SCHOOL QUESTION.

A strong effort will be made at the coming election in the State of New York, to get a vote against the Free School Law of 1849. We are glad to believe, that most of our readers will give the law their hearty support—not because it is perfect in every respect, but because it will be vastly easier to remedy its defects than to get another free school law passed when this is once voted down. The following extracts from some of our exchange papers will show that there is a necessity for the friends of the law to be on the alert.

The Freeman's Journal—(what a name for such a paper!)—the organ of one branch of the Roman Catholics of this city, says:—

"This is our programme: To try and carry, at the election next fall, the repeal of the law establishing Free Schools throughout the State; and to follow up this, as quickly as possible, by repealing the Free School Law of this city. To effect this good object, non-Catholics will probably adopt as many methods as they have different motives for desiring it. We hope that most Catholics will be ready to act with other opponents of the State Free Schools, fervently and effectively."

The New York Tribune, in calling attention to the fact that on the 5th day of November next the people of the State of New York are required to elect a Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Clerk of the Court of Appeals, Canal Commissioner, State Prison Inspector, &c., says:—

"Even more important than these elections do we esteem the vote to be cast at the same time for or against the continuance of the Free School System enacted by the Legislature of 1849, and this year partially put in operation, under the embarrassment of a most determined and unscrupulous opposition. No device, no trick, will be spared to make the poor believe that they may vote to defeat the law, yet not vote the overthrow of the Free School principle, but we confidently trust all such devices will be hopeless. If the entire electoral population of our State shall but clearly understand and appreciate the truth that to vote for the repeal of the law is to decree the downfall and annihilation of Free Schools, and a return to Rate-bills and Pauper Exemptions, we believe the majority against repeal cannot fall short of One Hundred Thousand."

The Free School Clarion—the paper established at Syracuse by authority of the Free School State Convention—thus defines the position of those who are in favor of keeping our present law, and making it better:—

"To vote down the law would be childish, if the majority are in favor of any law for Free Schools. It would be saying that the State of New York have not wisdom enough to make a Free School Law to satisfy themselves. For, if the law is bad—as it is—then amend it. To vote down a law would be saying we are incapable of amending it. This would appear childish to the whole civilized world, and, after accomplished, to those who did it.

"Our position is this: In favor of Schools absolutely free to ALL; property to pay the tuition therein; and in favor of amending the present law, so that the requisite amount over the public money shall be assessed upon the property of the whole State."

NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL CONVENTION.

A National Educational Convention met at Philadelphia last week, and was attended by over one hundred delegates, representing New York, Massachusetts, Michigan, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, District of Columbia, New Jersey, Delaware, Ohio, Maryland, Louisiana, Iowa, Maine, and New Hampshire. Dr. Nott, of Union College, was chosen President; Prof. Joseph Henry, Rt. Rev. A. Potter, Prof. John Griscom, and G. F. Thayer, Vice Presidents; P. P. Morris and John Kingsbury, Secretaries. Interesting reports were received from delegates relative to the condition and progress of education in the various States which they represent. The most important business, however, was the adoption of a Constitution for a National Association of the Friends of Public Education, to go into effect next year. We give below the leading provisions of the Constitution, and shall probably print some of the reports at an early day:—

The Society is to be called "The American Association for the Advancement of Education." The object is stated to be, "to promote intercourse among those who are actively engaged in promoting education throughout the United States—to secure the coöperation of individuals, associations and legislatures, in measures calculated to improve education, and to give to such measures a more systematic direction, and a more powerful impulse.

Members of the last and present Conventions may become members of the Association on subscribing to the constitution and paying an admission fee of $2; and, in like manner, professors of colleges, universities, incorporated academies, Normal and high schools, State and county superintendents, and members of State Boards of Education, three delegates from each State, county, or other educational association, and such persons as may be nominated by the Standing Committee, and elected by a majority of members. Distinguished educators and friends of education in other countries, may be elected corresponding members by a vote of two-thirds. Members may become life members by paying in advance $25, and receive copies of all published transactions free. By paying an additional dollar, the other members, can, in like manner, receive copies of the transactions free.

The Constitution provides that there shall also be in Philadelphia a permanent place for the reception of Documents, Reports, and other papers belonging to the Association, which shall be under the care of an officer who shall be elected for the term of five years, and be entitled Corresponding Secretary and Curator.

The time of the next meeting is fixed for the 3d Tuesday in August, 1851, and the place is Philadelphia.

MR. CHAPLIN AND THE CAZENOVIA CONVENTION.

In the account we gave last week of the Fugitive Slave Convention, it was stated that Gerrit Smith gave $500 towards the fund for the defense of Mr. Chaplin. The truth is, that Mr. Smith, with his characteristic generosity, on reading an account of Mr. Chaplin's arrest, wrote immediately to Hon. Wm. H. Seward, at Washington, authorizing him to draw on Mr. Smith for $5,000, if needed, for his immediate bail. At the Convention, however, Mr. Chaplin's friends would not allow Mr. Smith to give anything, preferring that the friends of Mr. Chaplin, and the people at large should have the privilege of raising the money among themselves. But should there be any deficiency on their part, Mr. Smith will foot the balance.

Mr. J. C. Hathaway, who had just returned from a visit to Mr. Chaplin in his prison at Washington, made a statement of facts in the case. The Marshal of the District and the jailor treated Mr. Hathaway politely, and gave him (and a dearest friend of Mr. Chaplin's who was with him) ready admittance into the prison. He stated that he found Mr. Chaplin the same calm, dignified and gentlemanly man we had all seen and known him in his intercourse with the world. Though suffering somewhat from the injuries inflicted upon him at the time of his arrest, he was slowly recovering. He entered freely into conversation, giving a full and correct account of the whole transaction. He stated that he had never seen the slaves whom he took into his carriage until they accosted him on the road side that night, and did not know that they were armed; that as for himself, he never carried deadly weapons upon his person, and that he had nothing of the kind about him the night of his arrest, and that the story of his firing a pistol was a sheer fabrication. He admitted that the persons both in the carriage and outside of it, exchanged several shots. When his carriage was first checked, and his horses were seized, he supposed he was attacked by a band of highwaymen. The next instant he was struck a heavy blow on the side of his head with a bludgeon, which completely stunned him. When consciousness returned, he found himself upon the ground, and several persons around him, and some of them on him with their knees, and throttling him. He supposed they were going to kill him—expected nothing else, until in the midst of the struggle, he heard the voice of Capt. Goddard, the Chief of the Police, whom he recognized, and to whom he immediately appealed to save his life. He was then bound and taken back to the city and locked up in the jail, all covered with blood from wounds inflicted upon him. In the day time he is allowed the range of a narrow hall about 4½ feet wide by 18 long, but from 5 o clock P. M. to 6 o clock A. M. he is shut up in a narrow, close, hot cell, only about 5 or 6 feet square, with little or no ventilation. He sleeps on, or rather in, a little, old, narrow, hollow, trough-like straw cot, without any sheets or pillow; and eats his food sometimes on a window-sill, without table, chair, stool, or even knife or fork. Such is the fate of the noble hearted W. L. Chaplin. Had he been aiding American citizens out of Algerene slavery, he would have been glorified by all the people.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.—The New York Tribune is now in its tenth year. It has a corps of twelve editors and reporters, thirty-seven printers, two proof-readers, thirteen pressmen, engineers and other laborers in the press room, four permanent correspondents in Europe, three at Washington, two in Canada, two in California, one in Mexico, one in Havana, one in Central America, beside others in the various cities of the United States. Its entire force, including carriers, &c., is 130 persons. The issues of the paper are 18,600 daily, 41,400 weekly, 1,700 semi-weekly, 3,300 for California, 500 for Europe, making in all 160,200 sheets weekly, and 8,330,400 annually. It consumes seven tons and a half of paper weekly, and 150 lbs. of ink. Among its editors are several names familiar in the republic of letters, such as Horace Greeley, C. A. Dana, J. F. Cleveland, Bayard Taylor, and Geo. Ripley.

EDUCATIONAL EFFORTS AT THE WEST.—The Friends of Franklin College, Ind., recently held a meeting at which they deliberated long and anxiously in regard to the means of relieving the College from its embarassments. It was done by the ministers present giving their individual notes in shares for the debt of $10,000, and appointing four agents to raise the amount. The following account of a touching appeal by "Father Teasdale," is given by the editor of the Journal and Messenger:—

"He rose, spoke of the goodness of God—said he had been trying to preach the Gospel for fifty years. When he commenced he could not read a chapter in the Bible—felt keenly the want of and the value of an education. 'WHY NOT TRUST GOD, brethen,' said he. Enumerating his small possessions, he said, 'Leave me one horse, saddle and bridle, one bed, and some furniture, and you may take all the rest, with the land, TO SAVE THE COLLEGE!' This, enunciated with up lifted hands, with his breaking, piercing tones, and quivering frame, sent a thrill through every heart. The effect was sublime."

MISSIONARY MEETING IN PARIS.—Mr. Casalis, the indefatigable French Missionary in South Afrisa, says the Independent, has been spending fifteen months in France and Switzerland, to recruit his health, after an absence of seventeen years, and to rekindle the spirit of missions in the Protestant churches by telling the things he has seen and done and suffered in the land of darkness. He has now returned to his field of labor, reinforced by two assistants, Mr. and Mrs. Jones. A very interesting meeting was held in Paris, July 23, on occasion of their departure. Mr. Grandpierre, pastor, a Director, Mr. Casalis, and Mr. J. Delaborde, President of the Committee, successively addressed the meeting. The latter excited a special interest by the ingenious parallel he made between the scene they were witnessing, and that which is described in the last verses of Acts 20, which Mr. Delaborde read, substituting the words, the missionary, for the name of Paul.

THE WORK OF THE DAY.—The following remark of Rev Dr. Campbell, editor of the British Banner, is as applicable to this country as to that with special reference to which it was made:—

"All things considered, we think the great work of the day ought to be the revival of religion in the midst of the churches, and its extension throughuot the whole land. Population on all hands is multiplying; multitudes on every side are hourly perishing, while the means of salvation come most lamentably, most alarmingly, most culpably short of the necessity."

DEATH OF MISSIONARIES.—The Boston Mail says that information has been received of the death of Mrs. Bushnell, wife of Rev. Mr. Bushnell, missionary of the American Board in West Africa. She first went to Africa in 1837, as a teacher. She died in the triumphs of faith. On her dying bed she bequeathed the sum of $56 24 to the American Board, "as a dying thank-offering for having had the privilege of laboring thirteen years (including two years spent on a visit to the United States, on account of health) on on the shores of Western Africa."

MISSIONARY TO SANTA FE.—Rev. G. W. Kephart left this city, says the Cincinnati Christian Herald, for Santa Fe, on Tuesday of the present week. He is sent out by the American Missionary Association. He goes from here to Independence, Mo., thence by stage to Santa Fe, availing himself of the line of stages just started on that route. This, if we mistake not, is the first missionary enterprise that has been started for that very important field. Funds for the support of the mission, to the amount of about $1,000, have been contributed in this city.

GENEROUS DONATION.—Several Missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church, destined for California and Oregon, sailed in the Cherokee, week before last. In arranging for their passage, Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall, on behalf of the Pacific Steamship Company, generously deducted eight hundred dollars from the regular price.

ARRIVAL OF A MISSIONARY FAMILY.—Rev. Hosea Howard, Missionary of the American Baptist Union, in Burmah, arrived recently at this port, in the British bark Ellora, with his wife and six children, by the way of the Isle of France. They were wrecked on their passage, and carried thither by an American vessel.

ARRIVAL OF JENNY LIND.—About 1 o'clock on Sunday last, the steamer Atlantic, having on board the distinguished songstress, Jenny Lind, reached her wharf in New York. In expectation of this arrival, a large number of people—some say thirty or forty thousand—had congregated on the adjacent piers and shipping, as well as on all the roofs and at all the windows which furnished a view of the landing. The pier had been fitted up with triumphal arches of evergreens and flowers, on which were inscriptions welcoming the "Nightingale" to our shores. When she landed, it was amid a shower of boquets, and the huzzas of the people. With a good deal of difficulty, her carriage made its way through the concourse, and drove to the Irving House, where an enthusiastic reception awaited her, and where a large number of persons, of all classes were assembled throughout the afternoon and evening, and even at midnight, when a serenade to Mdlle. Lind was given by the Musical Fund Society.

A SLAVE FAMILY REDEEMED.—Two weeks ago we noticed the effort which a colored man in Washington, who had purchased his own freedom, was making to purchase that of his wife and grand-children, who were about being taken to a southern market. A letter from Washington says that he went to work in earnest among the members of Congress, and others holding offices, nearly all of whom knew him; and in the course of the week that he was limited to for purchasing them, he succeeded in raising twenty-eight hundred dollars of the amount. Although Col. Bliss was among the most liberal of the original contributors, he unhesitatingly loaned the father and husband the remaining four hundred dollars, giving him a year to repay it in, and longer if necessary. The poor fellow has returned to the city with his ransomed wife and children, the happiest man I most ever saw. They have each gone back to their old places of service, with hearts so overflowing with gratitude as to preclude their giving expression to their feelings.

EDUCATION OF THE DEAF AND DUMB.—A Convention of persons engaged in the Education of the Deaf and Dumb was held in New York last week. Among the measures adopted by it was the establishing of a periodical devoted to the cause of Deaf Mute Instruction, which is to be issued at Hartford under the editorial charge of Dr. Luzerne Rae. The publication will be a revival of the periodical entitled the "American Annals for the Deaf and Dumb," formerly established at the American Asylum in Hartford, but recently discontinued. The subject of an appropriation of Public Lands for the purpose of the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, also came before the Convention, and measures were taken to memorialize Congress in relation thereto.

ROUTE TO ALFRED.—There is scarcely a doubt that the Erie Railroad will be opened to Hornellsville, ten miles from Alfred, by the first of next week. Delegates to the Anniversaries from the eastern churches, should leave New York by steamboat Erie or Thomas Powell, from pier foot of Duane-st., on Tuesday morning, at 6½ o'clock, in which case they will reach Corning or Hornellsville the same night. Tickets to go and return, can be obtained at the captain's office on board the boat.

ANOTHER VICTIM OF THE SLAVE POWER.—The (Salem, Ohio) Bugle, says that Richard H. Dillingham, the young Quaker from Morrow county, in that State, who was convicted more than a year ago in Tennessee for aiding the escape of slaves, died of cholera on the 30th of June, in the Penitentiary at Nashville. He was a young man of excellent character, and his death adds another to the victims of the slave power.

DESTITUTION IN NEW JERSEY.—The Mount Holly Mirror says that a colporteur has, during three months, visited over 150 families in Burlington county, N. J., and reports an utter destitution among them of the Scriptures and all knowledge of their subjects; 150 families are without the Bible, 77 being in the single township of Pemberton, near the "pines."

THE CHRISTIAN CHRONICLE, Philadelphia, enters upon its fifth year with elegant new type, and enlarged in size. Its proprietors promise, that "in mechanical execution, it shall rank second to no religious journal in existence;" and that no effort shall be spared "to fill its columns with the best and most interesting thoughts that can be found within the limits of its legitimate sphere."

MEETING OF THE AMERICAN BOARD.—The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions hold a meeting at Oswego, N. Y., next week, commencing on Third-day, Sept. 10. It is expected that the attendance will be very large.

BAPTISTS IN WALES.—Good tidings have been recesved from the Baptist churches in Wales. There are 126 churches in the counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth, and they eeport a clear increase of six thousand thrhe hundred and ten members.

ENERGY AND PERSEVERANCE.—Col. MUNROE, the Military Governor of New-Mexico, is a Scotchman, who entered the service of the United States during the War of 1821, as a private. He has risen to his present position by reason of the performance of distinguished feats of valor on many a bloody field. It is said that, at the time of the original enlistment, he was exceedingly illiterate, but has become an accomplished gentleman and able soldier, by dint of hard study, coupled with native talent and indomitable courage.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, Aug. 26.

A motion to take up a resolution fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress, failed—twelve only voting in favor of the same.

The Fugitive Slave Bill was read a third time and passed without a division, after a few words from Mr. Dickinson declaratory of his views in its favor.

A resolution authorizing a subscription by the Secretary of the Senate, for three thousand copies of a compilation by Aaron H. Palmer of statistics relative to the commerce of the East, was taken up. Mr. Benton opposed the resolution, and went into a general history of the purchase of books by Congress, opposing and denouncing the practice in toto, regarding it as iniquitous in the conception and still more iniquitous in its progress. Mr. Foote replied, after which the resolution was indefinitely postponed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House refused to suspend the rules to appoint a special day for the consideration of the Cheap Postage Bill.

The Bill on Post Routes was then considered and amended, but no final action had on it.

The Appropriation Bill went through the same process; Mr. Bayly made a speech proving the bill to be very economical; an attempt was made to expunge the appropriation of $30,000 for books to new members, but 98 gentlemen voted for the books.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, Aug. 27.

The Senate passed a Bill for the relief of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, and spent the rest of the day in Executive Session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House adopted several amendments to the Appropriation Bill and rejected several others, and then passed the Bill, 62 to 130. Among the amendments was one paying Mr. Rives fifteen thousand dollars for reporting and publishing in daily Globe two thousand columns of proceedings of Congress; another, appropriating ten thousand dollars to bind the Congressional Globe and Appendix.

IN SENATE. FOURTH DAY, Aug. 28.

The Senate took up Mr. Clay's Bill purporting (falsely) to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia, which was made the special order for Second-day next.

The Bounty Land Bill, lately passed in the House, was then taken up, and several amendments agreed to. The subject was not disposed of when the Senate went into Executive Session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Utah Bill was taken up and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The Texas Boundary Bill then came up, and Mr. Inge moved that the question be on its rejection. Mr. Hilliard made a speech in favor of it as a measure giving peace to the country. After some further debate, in which several gentlemen participated, the vote was taken, resulting in 34 for and 168 against the rejection of the bill. Mr. Boyd then moved to amend the bill by adding the substance of the Senate bills organizing New Mexico and Utah. On this motion a running and rather confused discussion arose, intermingled with decisions of the Chair and appeals therefrom, till finally the House adjourned without coming to any decision.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, Aug. 29.

The Senate amended the West Point Appropriation Bill by raising the salaries of the Professors to a uniform rate of $2,000, and then passed it.

The Bounty Land Bill was then taken up, and the question being on the amendment of the Committee on public Lands, according to which the soldier who does not wish to locate his land himself may receive a hundred dollars in money instead of a land warrant, Mr. Mason proposed an amendment by which military land scrip should be receivable in payment for public lands, no matter by whom presented. Some discussion arose upon it, but was not concluded when the Senate went into Executive Session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

After disposing of morning business, the House took up the Texas Boundary Bill. Mr. Boyd made a speech on his amendment, adding California, New Mexico, and Utah, the gist of which was, that he favored non-intervention, and wanted to see peace restored.

Mr. Clingman then offered an amendment, cutting off the southern part of California, and making it into a Territory on the plan of the bill organizing New Mexico, and made a speech in favor thereof.

Mr. Root moved to put on the Proviso, against which and its mover Mr. Brooks made a speech, to which Mr. Crown of Miss. made a short reply, and the House adjourned, having done nothing.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, Aug. 30.

The Bill granting certain lands to the State of Michican, to aid in the construction of a ship canal, connecting Lake Superior with Lake Michigan, Erie, &c., was debated at length, and finally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, when the Senate went into Executive Session, and subsequently adjourned over to Second-day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House took up the Bill to extend Jethro Wood's Patent for a cast iron plow, discussed and laid it on the table.

The Texas Boundary Bill was taken up, and Messrs. Clarke of New York and Gorman of Indiana each made a speech at it, and the House adjourned without taking any vote.

CALIFORNIA EMIGRATION.—The final result of this year's emigration across the plains, registered at Fort Laramie, is 37,570 men, 825 women, 1,126 children, 9,102 wagons, 22,878 horses, 7,650 mules, 31,502 oxen, and 5,754 cows. Making a liberal allowance for those who have passed without registering, and for those still behind, there were 42,000 souls, and 9,720 wagons, on the trail about the middle of last month. Of this number, from 8,000 to 10,000 are on their way to Oregon, with the intention of settling in that country, and visiting the gold mines next season. The prairies are now said to have assumed their wonted air of solitude.

European News.

The steamer America, from Liverpool, brings European news to Aug. 17, one week later.

Parliament has been prorogued by the Queen.

The French National Assembly has adjourned, and the attention of the French nation is now principally employed by the progress of the President through the Provinces. With some few exceptions, he appears to have been very favorably received by the people.

The potato disease is spreading in numerous districts in England and Ireland, and it is generally admitted that it will take a large per centage off the crop. The other crops generally promise well.

Some further skirmishes have taken place between the Danes and the Holsteiners, in which the latter appear to have come off victorious. There are rumors of an approaching settlement of the quarrel, under the auspices of Russia, England, and France.

On the 8th of August, there was an explosion of the laboratory of the artillery of Gen. Willisen, by which there was great loss of life and property; 91 persons killed by the explosion have been buried, and 35 were wounded, some severely, and 11 put down as missing. Many bodies were so mangled that they could not be identified. Twenty-two cadets of the Artillery School are among the killed. Scarcely a house in the town has entirely escaped from the concussion. The effect of the catastrophe on the public mind had been very depressing.

Copenhagen letters report the King of Denmark's left-handed marriage with a dressmaker.

FOUR DAYS LATER.—On Sunday last, the U. S. Mail Steamer Atlantic arrived at New York, with Liverpool dates to August 21, four days later. She brought one hundred and forty-five passengers, including Jenny Lind and her attendants. Our friend and correspondent, Wm. James Stillman, was among the passengers.

The news by this arrival is not important. A difficulty in Piedmont, between the Government and the Church, is reported, which has resulted in the arrest of Archbishop Franzoni for treason. Nothing new has transpired in Schleswig-Holstein. Louis Napoleon was still prosecuting his journey through the provinces. The Queen of England was about proceeding to Scotland.

The Austrian clergy have presented a petition to Government to prevent the attendance of Jewish physicians on Christians who are dangerously ill.

On Sunday, Aug. 18, the port of Liverpool was visited by a severe storm, which caused a great number of outward-bound vessels to put back. A boat was upset in the river, and nine persons drowned. The brig William Rushton, bound from Laguna, in Mexico, to Liverpool, was run down in the channel, by the steamer Minerva, and seven of the crew drowned. A serious accident happened to a steamer in Loch Lomond, in which Lord Gough, the hero of India, was voyaging, but fortunately no lives were lost.

Execution of Prof. Webster.

On Sixth-day morning last, at a quarter to ten o'clock, Prof. John W. Webster paid the penalty affixed by law to the crime of murder. On the previous afternoon his wife and three daughters visited him in his cell, where they remained from two until past six o'clock, and departed, it is said, in ignorance of the fact that the husband and father was to be executed on the following day. Immediately after they left, a guard was placed in his cell, and continued with him until the next morning. During the evening, it is said, he was perfectly free in conversation, confining himself wholly to moral and religious subjects. He read the Bible and other books with a great degree of earnestness and sincerity. He conversed and read until 12 o'clock, when he laid down upon his cot, spread upon an iron bedstead, and slept until half past four next morning, apparently as sound and restful as under ordinary circumstances. On arousing from his slumbers, he engaged in devotional exercises by prayer and reading of the Scriptures. Rev. Dr. Putnam, Prof. Webster's spiritual adviser, arrived at the jail about 7½ o'clock, and immediately proceeded to the prisoner's cell, where devotional exercises were held. At 9½ o'clock Sheriff Eveleth summoned to the rear office of the jail those gentlemen whom he had requested to be present as witnesses, and there read to them the order of what was to follow. From the jail office, the Sheriff proceeded to the prisoner's cell, followed by the witnesses and other deputies, where prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. Putnam, he being the only officiating clergyman present. No other services were held. The prisoner, during prayer, was in his cell in a kneeling position. Shortly after, at 9.20 o'clock, High Sheriff Eveleth, attended by his Deputies and the prisoner, accompanied by Dr. Putnam, came out and ascended the platform of the scaffold, the prisoner taking his position upon the drop. The prisoner was dressed in a black suit, apparently the same clothes that he wore during his trial. Before the cap was drawn over his eyes, he shook hands with jailer Andrews, Mr. Holmes, and last with the Sheriff, and thanked them for their kind treatment to him. Sheriff Eveleth then said:—

"In the name of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and in accordance with the Warrant of the Chief Executive, I now, before these witnesses, proceed to execute the sentence of the law upon John W. Webster, convicted at the March term of the Supreme Judicial Court, of the murder of Dr. George Parkman."

This said, the Sheriff placed his foot upon the fatal spring, and in an instant more the victim was launched into eternity. He gave several struggles and all was over.

Great excitement exists at Toronto, Canada, in consequence of the recent sale by Government of the principal toll-roads leading into that city. James Beatty, of Toronto, and Mr. Hoople, of New York, are the purchasers. Public opinion is so strong that it is thought the bargain will be quashed.

INTERESTING FROM TEXAS.—A dispatch dated at New-Orleans, August 27th, says that the Texas Governor's Massage was referred to a Committee of both Houses—13 in the Senate and 21 in the House. The first resolution, passed unanimously by the Committee, was as follows: "That Texas will maintain the integrity of her territories at all hazard." On the 16th, a bill was introduced into the Senate authorizing the Governor to raise five regiments of 1,000 men each—the pay same as the United States troops of the same class, each volunteer furnishing his own horse and arms. The bounty, half a section of land for three months service, whole section for six, two sections for twelve months. The Governor is authorized to command personally. Capt. Love has returned from an exploring expedition up the Rio Grande. He ascended 1,400 miles with a keel-boat, and reports steamboat navigation practicable 1,000 miles. Indian depredations, murders, &c. continue.

OUTRAGE IN TYLER COUNTY, TEXAS.—A young lady, the daughter of a Mr. Houston, residing at Village Creek, having strolled into the woods, a short distance from her father's residence, she was unexpectedly seized and immediately gagged by a negro, who made great efforts to violate her person. She is said to be much injured, the negro having beat and bruised her considerably by striking her in the face and otherwise abusing her. On the alarm being given, he was pursued by a number of gentlemen and overtaken in Caney Settlement, where he had taken refuge in the school-house, but finding himself closely pressed, he endeavored to make his escape, when several guns were discharged at him, two loads taking effect in his body, which so disabled him that he was soon apprehended. The father of the young lady he endeavored to violate was sent for, and after hearing his statement, and deliberating upon the matter, the citizens unanimously proposed hanging the villain, which was immediately done.

THE NEW MEXICAN REPRESENTATIVE TO CONGRESS.—The last advices from New Mexico brought intelligence of the election of William S. Messervey, as a Representative to Congress, by a majority of 500 over Hugh N. Smith. The Salem Register says, "Mr. Messervey is a son of Capt. Wm. Messervey, of Salem. He removed from Salem to St. Louis, where he resided for several years; then engaged in the trade to Santa Fé and Chihuahua; was established in Chihuahua when the war broke out; was taken prisoner by the Mexicans; released by Doniphan's expedition; accompanied that command to Gen. Taylor's line of operations; made a visit to Salem, and returned to Santa Fé after the peace was established. He is a young man of ability, and capable of doing credit to the new State, should he be allowed to take his seat."

SUMMARY.

In New York, one day last week, Thaddeus Rufus Rathbun was arrested by officer Crossett of the Lower Police Court, on complaint of Dr. Francis Bacon, who charges that the accused assaulted him in the Astor House. This Rathbun is the individual who, about a year since, attempted to kill his mother at Rathbun's Hotel, by cutting her throat with a razor. He was at the time in a deranged state of mind, caused by excessive dissipation, and was placed at the Lunatic Asylum on Blackwell's Island, where he remained eight months.

J. F. Maubant, T. Bronson, M. Miller, and J. DeLisle, went on board the steamer St. Francis, at Cincinnati, bound for Arkansas. Having robbed a fellow passenger, Milton Chamberlain, of Cincinnati, of $1,600, they left at Shawneetown, Ill., leaving a carpet bag behind them. This bag was subsequently found to be on fire, and exploded. It had seven canisters of powder in it, only one of which went off; the others were thrown overboard by the engineer. Three persons only were burned by the powder. It is supposed that the villains intended to destroy the boat.

The Buffalo Courier says: We were informed yesterday, by M. C. Story, Esq., who is now doing some of the heaviest, if not the heaviest work on the Erie Railroad, that the entire balance of the line, from Corning to Dunkirk, will be finished and in complete running order on the first day of May, 1851. Mr. Story's contract covers the most formidable work to be done. It is 12 miles in length. He is now working one thousand men daily, and is about to put on five hundred more.

A train of cars, with over 300 passengers, left Atlanta, Ga., on the 14th ult., and when within a few miles of Oglethorpe it detached a bar of iron, or "snake head" from the track, which passed through the cars, throwing two of them off the track, and killing or mortally wounding three persons, beside seriously injuring some five or six others.

Rev. C. C. Royce was drowned in Seneca Lake, near Eddytown, a few days since. He was in a small boat with two ladies, when the boat capsized. Being a good swimmer, he secured the ladies to the boat, and started to swim for assistance. He was drowned before reaching the shore. The ladies were taken off by a skiff.

The Directors of the Hudson River Railroad have concluded the contracts for that important work, and the whole line from Poughkeepsie to Greenbush, opposite Albany, will soon swarm with laborers. It is the confident expectation of the Directors that the road will be finished and in running order by the 1st of November, 1851.

A telegraphic dispatch from Cleveland, Ohio, says that Gen. Hinton, the principal agent of the Ohio Stage Company, was, on the 29th of August, arrested on suspicion of having been engaged in the extensive mail robberies which have occurred in Ohio for the last few years. He was left under guard at the Weddell House, but succeeded in making his escape in the night, and has not since been heard of.

We learn from the Chicago Tribune, that an epidemic, very much resembling cholera, has made its appearance in Milwaukee. On Friday there were forty-seven deaths, and on Saturday sixty-two, making one hundred and nine in two days. The disease is not called cholera, but dysentery and bloody-flux. It is confined mostly to the German population.

A new and very important periodical is about to be commenced at Washington, called the U. S. Postal Guide, to be conducted by Hon. Peter G. Washington, late Auditor of the Post-office. It is designed to convey needed information to those connected with our sixteen thousand post-offices, and to the public generally, of the laws, orders, decisions of courts, &c. Charles M. Willard, Esq., is the associate editor. Published monthly, at $1 a year.

In Perry, Me., Fanny, aged five years, daughter of Amos A. Gardner, was burned to death by her clothes taking fire. She ran to her father, who was making hay in the field, and, setting it on fire, he barely escaped death by the flames. Fanny still fled, and her mother, who had risen from a sick bed, pursued her until the poor child sunk down dead.

A young woman about eighteen years of age, daughter of Michael Barry, of Boston, undertook to hasten the kindling of a fire in the stove by pouring camphene on the lighted chips, and before she could turn away, the flames burst up and came in contact with her dress, burning her so badly that she died in the course of three hours.

Three-cent pieces have been issued from the Mint at Philadelphia. On one side are the words "United States of America," within which is a circular wreath inclosing the numerical "III." On the reverse side is the Liberty Cap, inscribed with the word "Liberty," and surrounded with rays. Underneath are the figures "1850."

The usual commencement exercises at Middlebury College were attended Wednesday morning, August 21. A class of nine were graduated. Some eight or ten were admitted to the degree of A. M. The degree of D. D. was conferred on Rev. G. C. Beckwith, and Rev. Lyman Gilbert, of Mass., and the degree of L L. D. on Rev. Albert Barnes, of Philadelphia.

A dispatch dated Baltimore, Aug. 27, says that the Southern presses do not generally relish the Fugitive Slave Bill, as it has passed the Senate, and regard it as intended to seduce Virginia, Maryland, and Kentucky from the common cause of the South. The papers appear unanimous in asserting that no law can be effectual to recover runaway slaves.

At Louisville, on the 28th of August, a fatal affair occurred at a house of ill-fame, where a man named Figg shot Lizzie Schermerhorn, and then shot himself with the same pistol. He died soon afterward, and the woman was not expected to live.

Sunday before last, several rowdies belonging to Baltimore, proceeded to Laurel Factory and attacked the church there during divine service. They broke the windows of the church, and committed other acts of violence, when the congregation arrested five of the rioters, but all of them subsequently escaped but one, who is in jail.

Wednesday of last week was the Anniversary of the Battle of Long Island, one of the most disastrous that happened to the American arms during the War of the Revolution. Washington lost more than a thousand men; Major Gen. Sullivan, and Brig. Gens. Lord Stirling and Woodhull were among the prisoners.

A public meeting has been called in Buffalo to devise means for the protection of Emigrants from foreign countries from those gross impositions which are daily practiced upon them, by coöperating with the American Emigrant Friend's Society of the city of Philadelphia.

Brig Washington, Capt. Newton, arrived from Cardenas, whence she sailed on the 14th ult. Capt. N. says that Lopez was expected there daily with another invading force. There was great excitement among the people in consequence, and extensive preparations were being made to repel the new expedition.

On Saturday, Rev. Mr. Pullen, of Frankfort, Me., left home for Oldtown, on an exchange of pulpit. He was unwell, and after arriving at Oldtown cut both his legs and wrists and each side of his throat. He was not expected to recover, although alive at the last accounts.

The late storm did immense damage at Halifax, N. C. Buildings and fences were blown down, and crops prostrated in every direction. On Mr. Crowell's farm several houses were blown down, injuring a number of negroes. His cotton was torn up by the roots. The Railroad bridge over Quankey Creek, 70 feet high and 150 long, was blown down by the violence of the gale.

Miscellaneous.

Chaplin and Torrey.

By a Correspondent of the New York Tribune.

I stole an hour the other morning to pay a visit to Wm. L. Chaplin, now in jail, on the charge of aiding the escape of slaves. Mr. Chaplin having been nominated for the Presidency, and being the first candidate in the field, is now a public character, and should be properly introduced to the public. Whether he reaches the White House or the Penitentiary, whether in the opinion of mankind he deserves apothesis or purgatory, William L. Chaplin is a gentleman and a scholar. Were it possible that he should be elected to the highest post of honor in the gift of the country, the easy self-possession, the bland and open manner with which he receives visitors in the national lock-up at Washington, would grace the saloons of the Presidential mansion. Mr. Chaplin is a graceful, easy, and somewhat pungent writer, devoting his talents and his energy to what he considers to be the interests of humanity In that capacity I have known him for several years, our personal acquaintance being very slight. It was not, therefore, until I saw him in jail that I studied the liniaments of his countenance with interest, and endeavored to make an estimate of his character. I will vouch for the fact that there is not a man in America whose face beams with a more genuine radiance of benevolence, whose whole demeanor exhibits more of that absolute repose so much vaunted in the highest circles of society as the ne plus ultra of good breeding, and whose phrenological developments indicate, at the same time, so clear a capacity for perception, coupled with good scanning faculties. He is, I should judge, eminently qualified to make friends—to enlist the sympathies of all those by whom he is surrounded. Indeed, that fact is already obvious in the state of feeling around the jail, and in the community here, so far as the character of Mr. Chaplin is at all known. There is, so far as I can discover, no hostility toward him. About the harshest thing that is said, is that he was prompted by mistaken benevolence. Even his captors speak well of him, while the officials, from the Marshal down to the turnkeys, have apparently a friendly interest in and in some cases almost a veneration for the man and his misfortunes.

It so happens, that I was employed as counsel in the case of Rev. Charles T. Torrey, who, you may recollect, died in prison some four years ago in Maryland, confined there for this same offense against slaveholding laws. I visited Mr. Torrey in the Baltimore jail, assisted him in his several attempts to obtain admittance to bail, and felt the atmosphere by which he was surrounded. It was in a great measure one of bitter, unrelenting malignity, exasperated by the defiant spirit of the captive. He employed his leisure in jail in instructing a dozen slaves confined along with him in the ways and means of elopement, and nearly all of them escaped within a few weeks after they left the prison. He denounced the cruelties which he saw practiced around him with indignation. He was the regular Rob Roy McGregor of dare-devil philanthropy, and was hated with a corresponding cordiality. The time will come when Charles T. Torrey will figure in romance, and even the literal story of his numerous forays over the border would be highly romantic. I think no man ever lived who possessed a more desperate courage. A touch of his character will be perceived in the following circumstance:—Hon. Reverdy Johnson was engaged as the leading counsel in his case, and at the very first interview Torrey informed him that he had had the pleasure of helping off one of his slaves, to which Mr. Johnson good naturedly replied, that he (the slave) was a good-for-nothing fellow, and the last he had, so that he thought he was rather under obligations.

I have mentioned Mr. Torrey to contrast the sentiments entertained toward him four years ago in Baltimore and those entertained now in Washington towards Mr. Chaplin for a similar offense. It is in part the result of the difference in the character of the men to which I have alluded.

The Fugitive Slave Convention.

Address of the Fugitives to their Brethren.

AFFLICTED AND BELOVED BRETHREN,—The meeting which sends you this letter is a meeting of Runaway Slaves. We thought it well that they who have suffered as you now suffer, and drank of that cup of bitterness from which you now drink, should come together to make a communication to you. The chief object of this letter is to tell you how we find ourselves, and in so doing you can judge whether the prize we have attained is worth the price of the attempt to gain it. The heartless pirates who compel us to call them masters, who persuade you that those who undertake to obtain your freedom are worse off than you are at the south, are liars. Before we left them they told us that the abolitionists would take and sell us; but, on the other hand, they are the fugitives' brethren, and the only complaint is that there are so few of them—most of them are members of the American Anti-Slavery Society and of the Liberty Party. Here we get wages for our labor—we have schools for our children, and can hear and learn the Bible. Some of us take great part in civil elections, but most of the priests and churches at the North are in league with the South, and are afraid to advocate the abolition of Slavery. Including our children, we number here and in Canada about 20,000 souls; the population in the Free States are, with few exceptions, the fugitive slaves' friends. We are poor. We can do little more for your deliverance than to pray to God for it. We will furnish you with pocket compasses, and in the dark nights you can run away. We cannot furnish you with weapons—some of us are not inclined to carry arms—but if you can get them, take them, and, before you go back into bondage, use them, if you are obliged to take life. The slaveholder would not hesitate to kill you rather than not take you back into bondage. Numerous as the escapes from Slavery are, they would be still more so were it not for the masters' protection of the rights of property. You even hesitate to take the slowest of your masters' horses, but we say take the fastest. Pack up provision and clothes, and either get the key or force the lock and get his money and start. We regret to say to you, that it is not every one of the Free States in which the fugitives can find an asylum. Last year several were taken back from Pennsylvania. We would not advise you to stop in the District of John McLean, because he is a great man and your enemy; and as he is looking to the Presidency of the United States, he is the Southerner's friend; but the safest place to steer for is New York State. There are three points in your conduct when you come North to which we would call your attention:—1st, Keep clear of all Sectarian Churches that will not preach the abolition of Slavery from the pulpit. 2d, Join no political party, neither Whig, Democrat, Free Soil, nor any other. 3d, Send not your children to white schools, for there are schools for colored children. The colored men of the North turn their backs to Pro-Slavery Churches and political parties. In closing, we cannot forget you, Brethren, for we know your sufferings, and our last words to you are, to be of good cheer, and do not despair.

Address of the Convention to the Liberty Party.

BRETHREN,—You are to hold a Convention at Oswego to nominate a candidate for the Presidency, for which office there have been several persons named, Gerrit Smith, Wm. Goodell of New York, and T. Julian Lemoine. Mr. Smith declines in toto, and the others will not say they will accept. We therefore recommend the nomination of William L. Chaplin, the champion of the Abolition party, who now lies bound in chains in Washington. Can a man be found more competent? He is a father to the poor, and a friend to the fugitive slave. It will be said that he is a candidate for Lieut. Governor; but if he should be elected for both, the term of office of one expires before the commencement of the official term of the other. We recommend meetings to be called in every free State and every County, and let the name of Chaplin be heard in the morning, at noon, and in the evening, in the byways and in the pulpit, as one of freedom's martyrs. Let every voter in the Northern States, at the coming election, vote for no person for Congress who is opposed to the election of Wm. L. Chaplin. With these remarks we leave you to Divine grace.

The Peach Season.

If it were the custom in this country to count time by moons, as do the imaginative children of the East, we should insist on calling the present the moon of Peaches. The harvest of that most luscious of fruits has fairly commenced, and our streets and markets are fragrant from morning to night with the ripe, balmy odor that exhales from the piled baskets ank pyramids. The fruit department of Washington or Fulton Market, of a morning, presents as luxurious a picture as one could wish to see. There are all shades and varieties, whose juice is like liquid topaz, still warm from the sunbeams in which they have baskec, to the pale, white, spicy kind, that ripens in the shade. There are generous freestones that separate almost with a touch; "clings," persistent, and reluctant to yield their hoarded sweetness; dark red varieties, streaked with crimson veins, and many others which the palate can readily describe, but whose exquisite differences of flavor and flagrance are not so easily particularized by the pen. What subtle influence of beauty and luxury dwells in the long sandy levels of Southern Jersey, and the monotonous fields of Delaware, that they should bring forth this choicest infrutation of all delicate and volatile sensations!—this King of Fruits, who, though transplanted to our soil, still shows on his cheek the swarthy flush of the sun of his native Persia, and retains in his breath the sweetness of the Schiraz roses which there clustered about his feet? Da Vinci, we believe it was, gave his scholars a bunch of grapes to copy as the most complete lesson in color, outline, light and shadow. Could the good artist have seen what we daily see in our streets he would have given them, instead, a basket of peaches.

The quantities of this fruit brought to our market daily would seem astonishing to a stranger, and especially to a European, where the fruit is of a much inferior quality, and cultivated to a much smaller extent, than in this country. On Monday about 32,000 bushels arrived here, in seven steamboats, four of which were from Washington, N. J., two from New-Brunswick, and one from Amboy. Yesterday, some 70,000 or 80,000 baskets arrived, the greater part of which were of middling quality, and sold at from 12½ cents to 37½ cents per basket. The better qualities, which have just begun to come in, command $1 25. Farmers from New-Jersey say that the crop this year, in that State, will be larger than ever before known. Only those earliest in the market will command a price beyond the freight and cost of gathering. One farmer, named Raybauld, in the South part of New-Jersey, will require two steamers most of the time for a fortnight, to bring his crop to market. [Tribune.

Martin Van Buren.

A model presiding officer was Mr. Van Buren. The attentive manner in which he listened, or seemed to listen, to each successive speaker, no matter how dull the subject, or how stupid the orator, the placidity of his countenance, unruffled in the midst of excitement, the modest dignity of his deportment, the gentlemanly ease of his address, his well-modulated voice and sympathetic smile, extorted admiration from even an opposing Senate; while the proper firmness he displayed on all occasions, the radiness with which he met and repulsed any attack upon the privileges or dignity of the Chair, the more conspicuous in contrast with the quiet indifference with which he entertained any merely personal assault, gained him the good will of all beholders.

He had served an apprenticeship to his high office by a Senatorial career of six years, and qualified himself by the proper discharge of the duties of one position for the more responsible duties of the other. The peculiar delicacy and decorum which he had manifested during that term of service, in times of high party excitement, and in a decided minority, had won him great renown, and seemed to justify the general belief that he was intended for a larger sphere of action. Always self-controlled, he never uttered a word, direct or by inuendo, either from premeditation or in the heat of excitement, which need have wounded the feelings of a political opponent, in open or in secret session. Master of his own passions, he soon learnt to command those of other men By study of hinself, he acquired a knowledge of mankind. With a countenance always open, and though, always conceled, he invited without returning, confidence. Indeed, the character the great modern poet gives to one of his heroes will serve as an epitome, mutatis mutandis, of Mr. Van Buren's:

> "He was the mildest, mannered man,
> That ever scuttled ship or cut a throat;
> With such true feelings of the gentleman,
> You rarely could divine his real thought."

A New Orleans Humor.

A correspondent of the Buffalo Express writes from New Orleans as follows:—

"We had a pleasant incident on Tuesday last, which relieved for a little time the monotony of our quiet existence. Perhaps you are aware that there is in New Orleans a 'charitable' association, yclept the 'Sheet Iron Band'—that is, they are charitable indirectly. Whenever any old gentleman blessed with plethora of purse, who should be thinking of closing his earthly matters, manages to buy or coax some blooming maiden to marry him, or when some rich widow, 'fair, fat, and forty,' entices a 'nice young man' to her arms, forthwith appears a notice for the 'Band' to meet at the rendezvous. They obey the order with frolicsome alacrity, are marshaled by their chief, and at dusk take up their line of march for the residence of the happy pair, armed with tin pans, cracked kettles, tin trumpets, horns, and in fact every instrument or article capable of producing a harsh and discordant sound. Arrived at the domicil of the probably unconscious couple, their leader gives the signal and the 'concert' commences with a grand overture, composed expressly for the 'Band.' Imagine, if you can, the racket, the awful uproar, which two or three hundred men can make when they set to work with a will. It is loud enough to 'vex the drowsy ear of night' with a vengeance, and set any bride of weak nerves crazy. The 'concert' lasts until the bridegroom comes to terms, i. e. sends out a check for a handsome sum for the Orphan Asylum. Something of this kind we had on Tuesday evening. An old bachelor of forty-five had married a youthful maiden; the 'Band' was called together and had already taken up the line of march, when an envoy from the frightened bridegroom met the head of the column, bearing a check for $250. This was satisfactory; the Band gave three cheers for the happiness of the wedded pair, and the order was given 'to the right about—march.' Since the formation of the 'Sheet Iron Band,' they have actually extorted $45,000 as donations to the different charitable institutions of the city."

The Emperor of Hayti.

His color is the dingiest coal-black; but he has not the thick lips and other characteristics that usually accompany this complexion. He is an uncommonly fine rider, and on horseback appears easy and graceful. When dismounted, he has quite a dignified and gentlemanly bearing. I had seen him often on horseback, and had judged that he was nearly or quite six feet high, and that his weight was about two hundred. But as I stood within a few feet of him when he dismounted at church, I was surprised to see him two or three inches shorter, and several pounds lighter than I had supposed. Before, I had always seen him as he was riding rapidly through the city, bowing and dispensing his smiles to the crowds he was passing; and I had been perplexed to reconcile his face, which appeared amiable and benignant, with what I knew of his character; but the nearer and longer view afforded by this occasion, relieved me of this difficulty, for I could see in the face before me an index of the merciless, blood-thirsty heart, that subsequent statements will too clearly demonstrate that he carries. He was dressed, as he has always been when I have seen him, far more richly than I have ever seen any of our military officers dressed. He wore the common crescent-shaped military cap, with rich plumes, and heavy golden trimmings. His coat was blue broadcloth, with standing collar. The entire front of his coat, the collar, the seams of the sleeves, and the back, the edges of the skirts, &c., were overlaid with heavy golden trimmings. Besides this, various figures were wrought in gold upon the back and other parts of the coat, so that comparatively little of the cloth was visible.

But a part of his vest could be seen, as his coat was buttoned with one button near his neck; but all that did appear showed nothing but gold. His pantaloons were white, trimmed on each side of the seams with gold lace. He was not however in full dress, as he had on common boots, instead of a pair most richly trimmed with velvet and gold, which he sometimes wears.

From the fact, as I suppose, that the services of the day were for the dead, the Empress and other court ladies were dressed in black, so that there was but little chance for extravagant display. Many of them, however, had on quite rich jewelry, and as a general thing there was more of grace and dignity of manner among them than most persons will be apt to suppose. [Independ't.

Quakers in England.

After passing the Toleration Act, tithes and church rates still exposed the Quakers to the persecutions of the clergy, who were inclined to show no mercy. The number prosecuted on these grounds from 1600 to 1736, were 1180; of whom 302 were imprisoned, and 9 died in prison. The list of these cases exhibited many instances of clerical rapacity and hard-heartedness, as—W. Francis, confined nineteen months for a groat; Adam Lawrence and Elizabeth Vokin, between six and seven years for nine shillings for both of them; A. Anderson and son, eleven months for one penny; Thos. Kipling, two years for marraige fees; Israel Fell, four years for ona shilling; Daniel Abraham, nearly three years for twenty pence: John Constantine, five years, for the tithe of a little garden; James Binin, aged 91, blind and deaf, several months for tithes; Elizabeth Hughes, widow with six children, sixteen months tithes, pretended to be due from her mother; Robert Grimes, for fifteen shillings, about a year, till he died; Joseph Smith and Thomas Bird, for a church rate, eight years and four months; Boswell Middleton, for two pounds, five years; and again, four months after his liberation, two years more for tithes. SIGNIFICANT SUGGESTIONS.—A correspondent of the Christian Chronicle blames the Baptists of Virginia for not giving proper support to their college at Richmond. He supposes they out-number all the other denominations in the State, and their "wealth is immense." The institution is said to be well located at the capital, where it has no rival. "And yet the college is languishing in a pitiful manner," and has only three graduates. He says:—

"Methodists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians, are alive to the importance of education. Their colleges abound, and their high schools are springing up everywhere. They stand by them, keep their claims 'continually before the people,' and often convince Baptists that they are better than ours. Consequently the children of our brethren swell the number of Pedobaptist institutions, and very naturally, not unfrequently, of Pedobaptist churches. I am introduced to an Episcopalian lady, cultivated, wealthy, influential, zealous, and am told she is the daughter of a Baptist brother. How, then, I inquire, happened it that she is an Episcopalian? O, she was educated by Mrs. So-and-so, or in such a seminary! Here is a Presbyterian gentleman of distinguished ability and usefulness. He is the son of Baptist parents! Well, is it not strange that he was not better instructed? Not at all. He was educated in a Presbyterian college!"

DOMESTIC TROUBLES OF A KING.—The last steamer from Europe brinys news that the King of Denmark, Fredrick VII., has married a dress-maker. This prince has been married twice before to princesses, and has separated from them, not being able to live in harmony, a difficulty in which he has not always been thought innocent. His first wife was his cousin Wilhelmina, whom he married in 1828, when he was Crown Prince. After living with her several years, they quarreled so that his father banished him from Copenhagen; in 1837 they were divorced, and the year after she married another man. The Crown Prince waited three years before following her example. His second wife was the princess Caroline of Mecklenburg Shcelitz. From her he was separated in 1846, their marriage being about five years duration. Divorce seems to be quite common in the princely families of Denmark. It remains to be seen whither the King will be a better husband to his new wife than to his former ones. [Tribune.

WORK IF YOU WOULD RISE.—Richard Burke being found in a revery, shortly after an extraordinary display of powers in the House of Commons by his brother Edmund, and questioned by Mr. Malone as to the cause, replied, "I have been wondering how Ned has contrived to monopolize all the talents of the family; but then, again, I remember, when we were at play, he was at work." The force of the anecdote is increased by the fact, that Richard Burke was considered not inferior, in natural talents, to his brother. Yet the one rose to greatness while the other died comparatively obscure. Don't trust to your genius, young man, if you would rise; but work! work! work!

A LARGE HOUSE.—There is a building in process of erection, in Cherry-st., N. Y., 240 feet deep, with 35 feet front, intended for cheap tenants, which will probably contain more families than any other one concern in the city. A partition wall runs through the center, thus making the entire width of each tenement—outside of walls—17½ feet, which is divided into two rooms and a half. The length of each separate dwelling, walls included, is 20 feet, making 24 residences on a floor. The building is to be a six-story one, which gives one hundred and forty-four distinct residences under one roof.

COCOANUT SUGAR.—A new mode of obtaining sugar has been recently discovered in Ceylon. It is obtained by cutting off the stem of the cocoanut flower, attaching a vessel to it, and evaporating the liquid thus obtained, which is said to flow from the tree in quantities almost incredible. The sugar thus obtained is described as equal in quality to that furnished by the sugar cane—and the milk or sap of the cocoa tree can be obtained in almost any quantities. But how many years a tree that is tapped in this way will exist, is not stated.

SERVING "UNCLE SAM."—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that an account has been presented to the Treasury Department at Washington, on the part of Wm. Burns, late Clerk of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi, for upward of $4,400. This account is made up of a per diem allowance for attending upon Court. Of this attendance, 662 days, at $5 a day, is charged for keeping open the Bankrupt Court by direction of the Judge; and a report which this same Clerk had made to the Secretary of State under a resolution of Congress, and published by direction of the House of Representatives, shows that, during that 662 days for which Mr. Burns wishes $3,310, there were but three cases of Bankruptcy pending in the Court of which he was a Clerk.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON AND HALLEY.—Sir Isaac Newton set out in life a clamorous infidel; but on a nice examination of the evidences for Christianity, he found reason to change his opinions. When the celebrated Dr. Edmund Halley was talking infidelity before him, Sir Isaac addressed him in these or like words:—"Dr. Halley, I am always glad to hear you when you speak about astronomy or other parts of the mathematics, because that is a subject which you have studied and well understand; but you should not talk of Christianity, for you have not studied it. I have, and am certain that you know nothing of the matter." This was a just reproof, and one that would be very suitable to be given to half the infidels of the present day, for they often speak of what they have never studied, and what, in fact, they are entirely ignorant of. Dr. Johnson, therefore, well observed, that no honest man could be a Deist, for no man could be so after a fair examination of the proofs of Christianity. On the name of Hume being mentioned to him, "No, sir," said he: "Hume owned to a clergymen in the bishopric of Durham, that he never read the New Testament with attention."

Census Items.

PLATTSBURG, N. Y. has a population of 5,590 The number in 1845 was 6,095, since which the town of Schuyler Falls has been erected out of the old town of Plattsburg, and has about 2,000 inhabitants, showing an increase of about 1,500 in the old town.

NASHUA, N. H., has 5,820 inhabitants; NASHVILLE (across the Saukegan) has 3,122; the two (old Nashua) 8,942; increase in ten years 2,880. The oldest inhabitant is Hezekiah Hamblet—94.

CONNECTICUT.—Bridgeport, 7,558; in 1840, 570; increase, 2,988, or 63 per cent. Number of dwellings, 1,103; families 1,461. The population of Derby is 3,824—including Seymour, which was set off in May last, 5,557; Birmingham, 1,250; Ansonia, 1,017.

NEW YORK.—The city of Oswego has a population of 12,199, against 6,818 in 1845, and 4,658 in 1840. Syracuse, about 22,000. The first Ward, (formerly the village of Salina,) 4,514. Chatham, Columbia Co. 3,840; Claverick, 3,213; Stockport, 1,655. Pittsford, Monroe Co. 2,064; gain since 1845, 214.

Buffalo has a population of 50,000; in 1840, 29,000. [illegible]keepsie, 11,080; in 1845, 9,079. Alexandria, Jefferson Co. 3,175. Henderson, Jefferson Co. 2,240—in 1840, 2,480.

WISCONSIN.—population of Beloit, 2,700. Of Wanwatosa, 2,082. Of Wheatland, 1,193. Oshkash has a population of 1,392. A large increase in all the towns since the last numbering.

INDIANA.—Indianopolis, 8,034—increase since August, 1849, 1,530.

ABDUCTION OF A SLAVE.—We learn that information has been received here by Mr. Ro. C. Stannard, that a valuable maid servant of his, named Jane, who was in attendance upon Mrs. Stannard and child at Newport, R. I., has deserted her mistress, and thrown herself upon the tender mercies of those immaculate philanthropists, (God save the mark!)—the Abolitionists. Having been reared in the family of Mrs. S. and ever received the kindest treatment, they felt but little hesitation in taking her with them on their Northern tour; but they have found out that the confidence they reposed in her was misplaced, and that she prefers freedom—the freedom to die of starvation and want—to a life of nominal bondage in which she was surrounded with comfort and plenty.

A CASE OF LONGEVITY.—John Vanhooser living in the county of Jefferson, Tenn., is in the 122d year of his age. Until recently, the Knoxville (Tenn.) Register tells us, he was in the habit of walking to and from that town on calls of business, a distance of five or six miles, without experiencing fatigue. He is a German by birth, emigrated to this country about one hundred years since. He was in several of the most important battles of our Revolution. He voted for Gen. Washington for President of the United States, and bossts that he never failed at any election for President, from that time to the present, to vote. Recently one of his daughters, a lass of eighty years of age, paid him a visit, and found the old gentleman in his usual health. We doubt if another such case of longevity can be found in the United States.

Variety.

Rebecca Smith, of the town of Henderson, Jefferson Co. N. Y. relict of Ahira Smith, deceased, has spooled and quilled the yarn for 1,000 yards of cloth, and knit 60 pairs of stockings, within the last ten months, beside attending to her household duties, usually making her own and two other beds daily, and all this at the age of 90 years in February next.

The longest passenger train upon the records of the Boston Railroad was brought into Boston from Worcester, by three locomotives. It consisted of forty-six long cars and carried between 2,700 and 2,800 persons —load enough, certainly. They all came to Boston to see a show and were themselves a greater show than they came to see.

Among the laws passed by the Legislature of New-Hampshire at its last session, we find one for submitting to the people at the next annual election, the question—whether it is expedient for the Legislature to enact a law to exempt the homestead of families from attachment and levy, or sale on execution, to the amount of five hundred dollars.

The following is a list of some few leading articles received from the West during the past week by the Albany and Schenectady Railroad:—6,177 boxes cheese—401,472 lb; 906 packages butter—81,556 lb; 251 rolls and boxes leather; 139 boxes domestic cotton and woollen goods; 188 bales wool; 219 boxes Congress water; 1,249 doz. brooms; 15 car loads of cattle; 13 do. of hogs; 11 do. of sheep.

A new nectarine has been recently introduced into England from Syria, called the Stanwick nectarine, which is recommended in almost extravagant terms. It is pronounced "in excellence, as far beyond all other nectarines as a green gage plum is beyond all other plums."

Coffee, which has now come so generally into use, originally came from Arabia, where it has been known from time immemorial, but was brought into use in England in the year 1653.

A London paper says that by breaking off the top of the letter h a very tempting advertisement to invest in certain Railroad stock was entitled "Purchase of Railroad Snares."

The first saw-mill was erected near London, in the year sixteen hundred and thirty-three; but afterwards demolished, that it might not deprive the laboring poor of employment!

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

TUITION—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. EXTRAS—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

FOREIGN MISSION.

The following extracts from a letter of Bro. Wardner, dated Jan. 7th, of the present year, will be read with interest. The suggestions in reference to setting apart missionaries to their work by solemn fasting and prayer are deserving of the most serious consideration. Such exercises would be a fit accompaniment, not only of the designation of missionaries, but of the ordination of all ministers of the gospel.

Allow me to suggest an idea which has weighed heavily upon my mind during the last three years. I notice in the Acts of the Apostles, that whenever persons were set apart to any calling of more than ordinary importance, and especially to that of a missionary, their designation was accompanied with fasting, prayer, and the laying on of hands. I believe it is generally admitted, that the Apostles, in all important religious movements, were prompted by the Holy Spirit; and therefore their acts have been recorded for our instruction and imitation. Surely, the Holy Spirit would never descend to things which are unworthy of our notice. And if the holy Apostles regarded such undertakings of such importance that they deemed it befitting them thus to humble themselves before God in meek reliance upon His almighty arm, how much more would it become Christians at the present day? If my understanding of this matter is correct, it seems to me that a very important duty was omitted in the designation of your first missionaries to the heathen. It seems to me that that day should have been spent in fasting and prayer by the denomination, beseeching the God of missions for His interposing hand. I have ever since felt remorse because I allowed delicacy to deter me from expressing my feelings upon that subject. You may consider these remarks as intrusive; but as I learn that others are ere long to be set apart to the same work, I thought it a fit opportunity to relieve my mind of this burthen.

You will probably learn, before this reaches you, that Bro. Carpenter's cook has been baptized, and that we have enjoyed one communion season conducted in Chinese; both of which occasions were deeply interesting and solemn. Since his baptism, Le-Chong manifests more boldness and decision, and the evidences of a work of grace in his heart grow brighter. I conversed with my teacher last summer concerning baptism, who expressed a wish to defer it till the coming year. I took considerable pains to enlighten his mind concerning that duty, and the danger of delay. He afterwards made up his mind to go forward, and the day was set; but on the day preceding, he was called home in consequence of the sickness of his child; and taking this as an indication of Providence that he had done wrong in changing his purpose, he again determined to postpone it till the time he had previously fixed upon. He still gives increasing evidence of being a renewed man, and I hope the time is not far distant when I shall enjoy the privilege of leading him into the baptismal waters. My cook, of whom I wrote last May, has left, before which he gave sad evidence that he had not properly counted the cost. I still have occasional interviews with the cripple, of whose case I then made mention. My fears concerning him have in a measure been verified. His chief desire seems to be for the loaves and fishes. He has made considerable advancement in knowledge, and by the grace of God it may be blessed to his salvation. The sister of Bro. C.'s deceased teacher still manifests considerable interest, and says to keep the Sabbath. The school in which Mrs. W. was engaged last spring has not been revived again.

We continue our chapel exercises twice each week. This seems like doing small business; yet it is about as well as we can do in the way of preaching in our present location. We made an effort last summer to keep up a daily exercise, but soon found that we should have to preach without hearers if we continued. For several months afterward our congregations were less than before. Had we a preaching place on a public street, we might gather a congregation at any time. But it is difficult to enlist the minds of even a few to lay aside their business every day to listen to doctrines so much in opposition to their views and practice. For the last two or three months our congregations have been gradually increasing, and there is a marked improvement in their behaviour, during the time of worship.

The last Chinese Repository contains a short history of the different missions in Shanghai, and the one preceding gives an account of the dreadful ravages of the cholera in Bangkok. But as I learn that some members of your body take that periodical, I will refrain from making extracts.

Active measures have been taken by the English, under the sanction of the Chinese authorities, during the last season, for the suppression of piracy on this coast. The result has been, that between 200 and 300 vessels have been captured, with but little loss to the victors.

The recent news that has reached us concerning the accession of Gerrit Smith, Esq., and Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Morton to the list of God's witnesses to His down-trodden and despised truth, has caused our hearts to leap for joy. Most heartily would we extend to them the hand of sympathy and brotherly affection. It seems that the Lord is preparing the way for a mighty overturn in regard to that subject. The strong-holds of Popery seem rapidly to be giving away; and may the Lord hasten the work in righteousness, before the prints of the cloven foot become permanently enstamped upon his sacred word.

In my last letter to you, I mentioned that in the Chinese version of the Scriptures, 1st Cor. 16: 1, 2, has been translated to read, "On the first day of every week, let each one of you lay by as God hath prospered him," &c. The Greek eauto is omitted, which makes a very different passage of it from that written by St. Paul. But, thank the Lord, the measure of this world's iniquity will be filled up by and by, and man's devices will come to nought, and then will God be worshiped in spirit and in TRUTH.

On the 24th of last month, a meeting of the missionaries was held, to take into consideration the propriety of appointing a Committee to translate the Old Testament, as the translation of the New will probably be completed in May or June next. A majority were in favor of appointing a committee to proceed to that work immediately after the other is completed. This measure we, in connection with several others, opposed, for the following reason, viz: That as this committee must necessarily be composed mostly of those engaged in the present version of the New Testament, therefore an opportunity should be given for their constituents to judge whether their work has been properly performed, before committing to them another so important work, inasmuch as it was previously voted, that this committee should be the final judges of the version. The question is to go before the missionaries of the other stations before it can be finally settled.

In regard to the terms to represent God, and the ordinance of baptism, arrangements have been made so that any one wishing to publish can insert such terms as may best suit his views. There is now no copy of the New Testament that any one can conscientiously put into the hands of a Chinaman who does not favor the use of Shangte to represent God, and washing ceremony to represent baptism. This lack we feel most deeply. As soon as possible, we hope to be furnished with means to print Testaments. Could means be provided in season, we might unite with the Baptists, and thus render the expense much less. I think they would assent to a version that we could use. They will probably publish soon after the above-named version is completed.

On the 2d of this month, a meeting of all the missionaries in Shanghai (except those of the London Society) was held, when petitions were drawn up to present before the British and Foreign Bible Society, the American Bible Society, and the American and Foreign Bible Society, soliciting funds to publish Testaments, in which Shin shall be used to represent the Deity. These petitions were signed by all present except one. They are now to be sent to the other five stations for signatures, and then forwarded.

Yesterday Bro. C. and myself attended the dedication of the chapel belonging to the American Episcopalians, just finished, and situated in the heart of the city. It was an interesting season. The congregation nearly filled the house, numbering a thousand or more. The house erected by the Church of England missionaries, situated within the city walls, was opened last Sixth-day. When will the Seventh-day Baptists have a chapel, where such congregations can be secured?

The past year has been an eventful one in China, as well as elsewhere. During the year, twenty missionaries have been removed from the different stations along this coast. Thus the laborers in this harvest have been diminished. This may have been permitted to show men the folly of relying too much upon human effort.

Though sickness and death have prevailed on every hand, yet God has delivered us from their ravages, and we are permitted once more to wish you a happy New Year. Our prayer to God is, that you may be guided in all your deliberations by his unerring Spirit, that success may attend all your laudable efforts for the promotion of truth, and that the year upon which we have now entered may be marked by a more bountiful outpouring of His Holy Spirit, both in heathen and Christian lands, than any of its predecessors.

"O DEATH, WHERE IS THY STING?"

"The business of a Christian," said Dr. Watts, during his last confinement, "is to learn the will of God as well as to do it. If I were in health, I could only be doing that, and that I may now do. The best thing in obedience is a regard to the will of God; and the way to get that, is to get our inclinations and aversions as much mortified as we can." Mr. Parker noted the following expressions as they fell from his lips: "I should be waiting to see what God will do with me. It is good to [illegible], as Mr. Baxter, 'What, when, and where God pleases.' If God should raise me up again, I may finish some more of my papers, or if God can make use of me to save a soul, and that will be worth living for. If God has no more service for me to do, through grace, I am ready. It is a great mercy to me that I have no manner of fear or dread of death; I could, if God please, lay my head back and die without terror, this afternoon or night. My chief supports are from my views of eternal things, and the interest I have in them. I trust all my sins are pardoned through the blood of Christ. I have no fear of dying; it would be my greatest comfort to lie down and sleep, and wake no more."

SABBATH SCHOOLS—THEIR UTILITY—No. 3.

Various are the means that have been blessed in the conversion of the thousands who compose the visible church. They have all aimed at this one thing—to teach the way of life. God has access to the heart through the medium of the intellect. An uneducated Christian, we have never seen, neither do we expect to see. If we must be taught before we are Christians, the mode of instruction should be adapted directly to our individual circumstances. The minister preaches from the pulpit the truth of God. Probably the doctrine he advances may not be understood by many of the children who are capable of knowing and doing the will of God. It is not customary for such to ask the minister for an explanation, but in the Sabbath School all this can and should be done to their perfect understanding. Let the teacher require of his class to tell him the text of the last sermon they have heard, and as much of the sermon as they can remember; and may we not suppose that seed thus cultivated would spring up and grow?

The Sabbath School Teacher can have access to multitudes who are out of the reach of the minister. If a minister preaches three sermons a week, he will need at least half the week for study, or else he will do injustice to his calling. Ministers must attend to their duties to their own families, visit the sick, the dejected, and the inquiring, bury the dead, attend properly to the benevolent affairs of the Church, and many other calls that need not be mentioned; and we see at once, that the minister cannot frequently visit and personally instruct all the children of his congregation, and it should not be required of him. Many are probably better adapted to this work than the minister. Although he should labor to become "all things to all men," yet he is so accustomed to deal with the great truths of God, that it may be difficult for him to become as a child, and use those simple metaphors that they can appreciate and understand. And if he could, often the diffidence of the child, arising from the thought of his being a minister, would forbid it.

The Sabbath School Teachers may be messengers of salvation to those under their charge. Though their work may progress silently and unobserved, and they may not receive wordly distinctions and honors, be assured that if they are faithful, they are doing a great work; they are laying a foundation upon which to build in future days. They are inclining those little immortals committed to their charge in the path that leads to heaven. They are sowing seed that they should water with their tears, and watch while they pray for its abundant increase.

A few days since, in company with my wife and several friends, I went on a visit to some old acquaintances living on Staten Island. There being no regular ferry on that part of the island, our crossing was attended with some inconvenience. We engaged a waterman (whose vessel had gone ashore there during the late storm, and to float which they were digging a canal,) to take his small boat and carry us to the opposite shore, where our friends lived. As we drew near the shore, we saw boys and females very busily engaged on the green fronting the house, it being a gradual slope of some distance from the house to the water's edge, studded with very ancient and gigantic willows, apple trees, and other shrubbery. They were fixing seats, hanging ropes upon the limbs of the trees for swings, washing and cleaning the boats, erecting awnings under which they were to spread some large tables, &c. And all this was for the accommodation of a Sunday School, that was to meet there in the afternoon for a pic-nic. About two o'clock the company began to assemble. Their enjoyment was soon discoverable from their activity. Some climbed the large willow trees, there being seats made in them and steps to ascend; some took to the swings, some to the boats, some were running from place to place, while some sat quietly upon the seats, apparently satisfied in seeing others happy. This was truly a pleasant sight—the beautiful green grass, the shady grove, the broad river, or Staten Island Sound, with the steamboats and other water craft of all descriptions constantly passing; the beautiful villages in sight with their rich verdant landscape; the happy group of children with their Superintendent, Pastor, and Teachers, all were engaged to make each other happy. Truly, it was a pleasing sight. I almost wished myself a boy again, and I could not forego the pleasure of joining with them in their innocent sports. The children were then invited to the awning, where arrangements were made for a rich repast—bread, butter, cheese, cakes, melons, and nuts. After the children had eaten, then those who were older were served. The provisions had been sent in by the friends, and there was enough for all. During the afternoon a young man made his appearance among us, who was introduced to the company as a mute, now engaged as a Teacher in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum in New York. There being but few who could talk with him, of necessity his society was restricted, but he engaged in various sports to amuse the children. I was requested to address the company, and this young man was to follow me in talking by signs. Thinking that he would most interest them, and as it was getting late, I chose that he should proceed, and I would occupy what time remained. He commenced and gave an account of Christ's stilling the tempest, as recorded in the fourth chapter of Mark, which he did so correctly and intelligently that all who were familiar with the facts recorded could understand it. His mother acted as his interpreter. He then gave us an illustration of the passions, such as admiration, veneration, fear, reverence, anger, jealousy, suspicion, hatred, love, joy, vanity, pride, &c. Afterward he illustrated the seasons—spring, summer, autumn, winter—and it was truly entertaining and instructive, both to the aged and the young. I then spoke a few moments upon the necessity of a wise improvement of advantages. Finally, the company began to disperse, bidding each other a hearty good night. We were glad to be thus providentially permitted to enjoy this rich treat—a time never to be forgotten by us—and we left it more and more impressed with the importance of Sabbath School instruction.

W. B. GILLETT.

NEW MARKET, N. J., Sept. 1, 1850.

THE DEATH OF AN INFANT.

How peacefully they rest,
  Cross folded there,
  Upon his little breast,
Those tiny hands, that ne'er were still before,
But ever sported with his mother's hair,
Or the plain cross that on her breast she wore!
Her heart no more will beat,
  To feel the touch of that soft palm;
That ever seemed a new surprise,
Sending glad thoughts up to her eyes,
  To bless him with their holy calm;
Sweet thoughts, that left her eyes as sweet.
  How quiet are the hands
  That wove those pleasant bands!
But that they do not rise and sink,
With his calm breathing, I should think
  That he were dropped asleep;
  Alas! too deep, too deep
    Is this his slumber!
    Time scarce can number
The years ere he will wake again.

* * * * *

He did but float a little way
  Adown the stream of time,
With dreary eyes, watching the ripples play,
  Listening their fairy chime!
    His slender sail
    Ne'er felt the gale;
He did but float a little way,
  And putting to the shore,
While yet 't was early day,
Went calmly on his way,
  To dwell with us no more:
No jarring did he feel,
No grating on his vessel's keel!
A strip of silver sand
Mingled the waters with the land,
  Where he was seen no more:
  O, stern word, never more!

Full short his journey was; no dust
  Of earth unto his sandals clave;
The weary weight that old men must,
  He bore not to the grave;
He seemed a cherub who had lost his way,
And wandered hither; so his stay
  With us was short, and 't was most meet
That he should be no delver in earth's clod,
  Nor need to pause and cleanse his feet,
To stand before his God.

MR. FINNEY IN ENGLAND.

The British Banner, of July 24, gives highly encouraging accounts of the results of Mr. Finney's preaching in the Tabernacle Moorfield, London. He continues to preach five times a week, and never complains of fatigue, even in the hottest weather. And "while he never tires himself, it is the same with his hearers—they never tire." Less informed people, Dr. C. says, who hear him only once or twice, sometimes doubt whether he is sound in the faith. "But," he adds,—

"Those who hear him, as we have heard him, for three months, will be at perfect ease upon that point, being fully satisfied of his perfect soundness in all respects, although he does not preach all points in every sermon, and does not always base his addresses on gospel considerations to the extent that is customary in England. There is one striking peculiarity which often exposes him to the charge of heresy, but which, we think, constitutes his most remarkable excellence: in speaking to the multitude, he always addresses them, not as unfortunate, but as criminal; ever pressing upon them the doctrine, that nothing prevents them from repenting and believing but their pride and love of sin; and he never calls on men to do anything other than repent and believe—nothing to obtain faith and repentance. Under his preaching no man could ever have been led to conclude that there was no sin in unbelief—none in impenitence. The result is, a remarkable cogency in his appeals. The Atonement—the love of the Father—the abundance of mercy—these points are exhibited in all their fullness, and men are summoned to an immediate surrender. But it could never be gathered by the sinner, from his addresses, that any power is necessary either to dispose or to enable him to receive the truth. Mr. Finney addresses him as if no such help or power was either needed or provided; and in this we must contend that he pursues the true Apostolic path, from which much preaching of modern times has grievously deviated. But, when Mr. Finney comes to address Christians, and to speak of the operations of the Spirit, he pours himself forth in strains to which an Apostle would have listened with approbation.

"Up to this present time, notwithstanding the effect of summer upon metropolitan audiences, his congregations are at all times as crowded as ever; and the effect during the last two or three weeks seems to be greatly increased. It was never our lot to be present on an occasion of more overwhelming solemnity than that which characterized the services of the Tabernacle last Lord's-day evening. The house seemed full of the Divine presence. At the close of the lengthened service, we do not think that less than a thousand people left the Tabernacle—while the church remained behind for prayer—to go to the British Institution in the capacity of 'inquirers,' to be more especially addressed."

MOUNTAINOUS PORTION OF KENTUCKY.

A sad picture of the moral and religious destitution of the mountainous region of Kentucky, is given by a writer in the Banner of Peace. The writer, who has labored two years as a colporteur in the district which he describes, says, that in no place in any of these counties is there regular preaching oftener than once a month, and in some neighborhoods not oftener than once in two or three years. The principal denominations are Baptists, Methodists, Reformers, and New Lights. The writer knew of only two Presbyterian families in all these counties. The Methodist ministers are the most intelligent and zealous, but are too few in number to be able to supply many places with preaching even on the week days once a month. A large majority of the Baptist ministers and members are "anti-mission" in sentiment, opposing benevolent institutions, and equally opposed to giving their ministers any pecuniary support and to their making any preparation for the pulpit. Some of these ministers are very illiterate, being hardly able to read, and many wholly unable to write. As might be expected, the standard of piety is low, church discipline is greatly neglected, and general indifference exists on the subject of religion.

In one county only two persons were in the regular habit of maintaining family worship; and in others both minister and members habitually neglect and some even oppose it. In all these counties the writer knew of only two or three places where prayer-meetings are statedly held, and in some large churches not a single member ever prays in public. In some neighborhoods many kinds of labor, hunting, fishing, and visiting are common employments upon the Sunday, and many professors of religion think it not wrong to chop their fire-wood, or start on a journey, or go visiting on that day. In one county containing 5,337 children of school age, not a single district school was taught, and that too when the county was entitled to draw $3,133 from a State school fund! Gross intemperance, as might be expected, and all forms of immorality, are exceedingly prevalent.

[Watchman and Reflector.

THE METHODIST MISSION IN OREGON.

Letters have been received at the Mission Rooms of the Methodist Episcopal Church from the Rev. Mr. Roberts, superintendent of the missions of that Church in Oregon, which communicate intelligence of considerable interest. The communication from Mr. Roberts extends from the 1st to the 11th of June. He says that he had then received no letters from the United States for seven months and a half. Mrs. Roberts was seriously indisposed, having received some injury by a fall from a horse. Mr. Roberts reports that laborers are becoming more scarce and wages higher every day. He can procure no one to do the necessary work around the mission premises, and sees no prospect of relief in that particular. The Rev. Mr. Parish, a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, having received the appointment of Indian sub-agent, had left his ministerial charge to assume the duties of the office. Mr. Roberts describes the appearance of the country in June as exceedingly beautiful, and traveling as quite good. The mail from Oregon city was received at Salem, where his letter is dated, regularly every week, and a steamer was daily expected. Referring more directly to the religious condition of the country, and the affairs of the mission under his care in Oregon, Mr. Roberts speaks of a camp-meeting recently held as a time "of great interest and profit," and adds that four others are about to be held. He mentions, also, the pleasant Christian union that exists among the evangelical clergymen, ministers of the Protestant Episcopal Church preaching at the camp-meeting and taking active part in the devotional exercises. The Oregon Institute is efficiently and successfully conducted by Rev. Mr. Doane and wife, but an assistant teacher is greatly needed. A District School has been erected, but no teacher can be obtained at less than $125 per month. More laborers from the United States are needed to occupy the field rapidly opening to the mission.

Rev. Mr. Owen's letter includes from the 1st to the 8th of July, and relates exclusively to his mission work. He had heard that the Board were about to send six additional ministers, and recommends the division of the mission field into two districts, each embracing nine circuits. The principal difficulty under which the mission labors is the want of houses of worship, and residences for the missionaries. Should any additional help reach him in August, he would make an exploring tour of the whole field embraced in the proposed enlargemet of the mission, and expected to take up collections for the parent society. Mr. Owen asks earnestly for school teachers. A clergyman, Rev. James Rogers, a graduate of the Wesleyan University, teaches a school of more than thirty scholars, by which he realizes a profit of more than two hundred dollars per month. It is in contemplation to found a University, the Board here having resolved upon sending out a competent teacher; also to establish a book concern, embracing the issue of a weekly periodical. Mr. Owen speaks confidently, also, of the ability of the mission Church in California themselves to support any ministers of the right sort whom the Board may send out. His words are—"You need not give yourselves any uneasiness about their support."

A LONDON PICKPOCKET.

The first meeting of the Shoreditch Bible Association was held in the church, which was very much crowded. Some weeks afterwards the collectors called on a widow, who kept a grocery shop, for her subscription, which she had always paid cheerfully. As they were going away, she said:

"Gentlemen, I have got a young man, a lodger, who is always poring over the Bible; I dare say he would subscribe."

The collectors were introduced to him to solicit his subscription.

He answered, "I certainly will," and gave them a guinea, and desired them to put down his name as a subscriber of sixpence a week.

The gentlemen were astonished, and hesitated at taking so much, and wished to return a part.

He answered, "No, I owe my all to the Shoreditch Bible Association."

About a month afterward the committee wished to increase its number. The young man was proposed and accepted. But when the matter was mentioned to him, he warmly replied,

"No, gentlemen, you must pardon me, I am not worthy to form a part of your committee. If you want more money, I will gladly give it; but to act on your committee I cannot."

They in vain pressed the matter, and wished to know his reason.

About [illegible] requested his landlady to desire the gentlemen to wait upon him when they called, (he had regularly paid his subscription through the medium of his landlady,) as he wanted to speak to them; which they did.

"Now, gentlemen," said he, "my lips are unsealed; I take my departure for America this week. Here are five guineas. I will now tell you my short history. Two years ago I was one of the most profligate young men in the city of London. I was a common pickpocket. At your anniversary, seeing your church crowded, I, with several of my companions in iniquity, entered, in order to pursue our sinful practices. From the crowded state of the church, we were separated. I got into the middle aisle, just in front of the speaker. The first words I caught were, 'Thou shalt not steal!' My attention was fixed; my conscience was touched; the tears began to flow. In vain did my companions make their signals to commence our operations. As soon as the meeting closed, I hurried away, threw myself into the first coach I found, drove to my lodgings in the west end of the town, paid my rent, took away all my things, and came into this part of the city, in order to hide myself from my companions; and providentially found this house. I immediately inquired for a Bible, and for the first time in my life began to read it. I found the convictions of the evil of my conduct increased, and I hope I have now found peace and rest in believing on the Savior whom the Bible reveals."

QUESTIONS FOR LIQUOR DEALERS.

BY PRESIDENT WAYLAND.

1st. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which is spreading disease, poverty, and premature death through my neighborhood? How would it be in any similar case? Would it be right for me to derive my living from selling poison, or from propagating plague and leprosy around me?

2d. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which is debasing the minds and ruining the souls of my neighbors? How would it be in any other case? Would it be right for me to derive my living from the sale of a drug which produced misery or madness; which excited the passions and brutalized the mind, and ruined the souls of my fellow men?

3d. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which destroys forever the happiness of the domestic circle—which is filling the land with women and children in a condition far more deplorable than that of widows and orphans?

4th. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which is known to be the cause of nine-tenths of all the crimes which are perpetrated against society?

5th. Can it be right for me to derive my living from that which accomplishes all these at once, and which it does without ceasing?

6th. Do you say that you do not know that the liquor which you are selling will produce these results? Do you not know that nine hundred and ninety-nine gallons produce these effects for one which is used innocently? I ask then,

7th. Would it be right for me to sell poison on the ground that there was one chance in a thousand that the purchaser would not die of it?

8th. Do you say that you are not responsible for the acts of your neighbors? Is this clearly so? Is not he who furnishes a murderer with a weapon considered an accomplice?

If these things be so—and they are so, who can dispute?—I ask you, my respected fellow-citizens, what is to be done? Let me ask, is not this trade altogether wrong? Why then should we not altogether abandon it? If any man think otherwise, and choose to continue it, I have but one word to say: My brother, when you order a cargo of intoxicating drinks, think how much misery you are importing into the community. As you store it up, think how many curses you may be heaping together against yourself. As you roll it out of your warehouse, think how many families each cask will ruin. Let your thoughts then revert to your own fireside, wife, and your little ones, then look up to Him who judgeth righteously, and ask yourself, my brother, IS IT RIGHT?

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 12, 1850.

DESTINY OF THE WICKED.

Paul speaks of a class of persons "whose end is destruction." If that be their end, certainly there is no other state upon which they can enter afterwards. How much is implied in the term destruction, we need not now stop to inquire. It is sufficient for our present purpose to know, that that is the final condition of those whom he characterizes as "the enemies of the cross of Christ;" from which it is clear, that he did not teach the final holiness and happiness of all mankind.

As briefly as possible, we propose to consider the final destiny of the wicked.

I. Our first proposition is, that the wicked will certainly be punished. This needs no other proof than the fact that they have violated the divine law. It cannot be supposed that they have violated the law, and yet that no penalty lies against them; for law, without penalty, is not law—it is only advice. But the Scriptures clearly teach that God has given a law, to which he holds men accountable. The transgression of this law is sin, (1 John 3: 4); and all have sinned, (Rom. 3: 23).

II. They are not punished to the extent of their crimes in this life.

1. It is impossible that they should be. A rational creature is justly held responsible for the consequences of his actions; and it is certain that the consequences of a life of sin extend far beyond the earthly career of him who leads it. He exerts an influence in forming the characters of those who live after him; and they, in turn, of those who live after them. Generations may pass, before the consequences of a course of wickedness cease. An infidel, such as Paine, or Voltaire, or Hume, not only does all the mischief he can while he lives, but he writes a book, full of blasphemies, and breathing out malignity against Christ. This book lives to corrupt the world, after the author of it is dead. It continues its corrupting influence, generation after generation; perhaps to the end of time. Was the infidel author punished for this while he lived? If so, he was punished in advance—he was punished before his sins were finished. (See Jas. 1: 15.) In that case, he was punished more heavily than he could feel to be just. But God, before he punishes, will first "convince all the ungodly of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed." Jude 15. No one shall find cause to say that the punishment is unjust, but "every mouth shall be stopped." Every one shall feel the justice of what he suffers.

2. It would be inconsistent with the nature of the gospel dispensation. Those who maintain that men are punished for their sins in this life, overlook an important distinction between law and gospel. According to the strictness of law, man is brought to trial for his crimes without delay. "IN THE DAY thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." But according to the gospel, "sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily." The effect of the mediation of Christ is to modify the administration of divine government, so as to stay the execution of punishment for a season. Space is put between the transgression and the punishment, and that space is the sinner's season of probation. It is astonishing what looseness of views on this point obtains among those who argue that men suffer in this life the full desert of their crimes.

By way of objection to this view, it is sometimes pretended, that the doctrine of prompt and immediate punishment is of much more salutary tendency than the doctrine of punishment in the future life. It is argued, that upon the supposition that space is allowed for repentance, upon condition of which full forgiveness is granted, the sinner feels encouraged to go on in his wickedness. Whatever force there is in this objection, those who are so ready to urge it may be reminded, that it was seen by the Preacher some three thousand years ago. "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the hearts of the sons of men are fully set in them to do evil." Eccles. 8: 11. We have no doubt, that at the great winding up of affairs, it will be found, that thousands of thousands have made this abuse of divine goodness. And if men were to be excited to obedience simply by the fear of punishment, we should say, at once, that the objection constituted a solid argument against the truth of our doctrine. But it is the power of the gospel—faith working by love—rather than the fear of punishment, which moves men to obedience. Besides, it must be admitted by every candid mind, we think, that the force of this objection lies, not so much in the tardiness with which punishment is executed against the sinner, as in the uncertainty, in his mind, that it will be executed at all. He vainly imagines, that because it is so long delayed, it will be averted altogether. And if the gospel gave no assurance sufficient to dispel such an illusion, we should yield the argument without hesitation. We should admit, that it would be better to deal with sinners promptly, according to the strictness of law, than to put them on probation according to the gospel. But, fortunately for our argument, the gospel gives this very assurance. The resurrection of Christ from the dead is proof positive that punishment will at last be inflicted, though it be long delayed. See Acts 17: 31.

3. Facts show, that in this life the righteous are often made to suffer more than the wicked. The 73d Psalm is an instructive lesson on this point. From it we learn, that God's people are an afflicted people: "waters of a full cup are wrung out to them." The are "plagued all the day long, and chastened every morning." And so seldom are their seasons of relief from sorrow, that they sometimes are almost ready to think that God has forgotten to govern the world. "They say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the Most High?" They are almost ready to think that it is "in vain that they have cleansed their hearts, and washed their hands in innocency."

What, on the other hand, is the condition of those who "speak wickedly concerning oppression, and set their mouth against the heavens?" They are on the very height of prosperity. "There are no bands in their death, but their strength is firm; they are not in trouble as other men; their eyes stand out with fatness; they have more than heart could wish." It is only in "their END," that the difference between them and the righteous becomes signally manifest. Their end, the Apostle says, is destruction. The Psalmist says so too. "Thou castest them down into destruction. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! They are utterly consumed with terrors."

The truth of what the Psalmist teaches is confirmed by the whole history of mankind. The righteous, in many cases, lead lives of suffering; the wicked flourish and spread themselves like the green bay-tree. They have their portion in this life. It is of no use to attempt to neutralize the force of this argument, by saying that we do not know how much the wicked may suffer in their own consciences, or how many secret troubles they have that the world knows nothing about. The word of inspiration declares expressly, that "they are not in trouble as other men."

4. To say, as some do, that every man suffers the full penalty of his sins in this life, and that there is no possibility of escape, is to flatly contradict the word of God. The Psalmist, identifying himself with the people of the Most High, says, "He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities." Ps. 103: 10. They were punished or chastised, it is true, but not to the extent which their transgressions deserved. They did not suffer the full penalty, because forgiving mercy interposed to prevent it, as the succeeding verse shows. "For as the heavens are high above the earth, so great is his mercy towards them that fear him." The marking of iniquities, and the exercise of forgiveness, cannot go together. Ps. 130: 3. 4. When forgiveness is exercised, full punishment for sin is not inflicted. "Mercy rejoiceth against judgment."

Our conclusion is, that the punishment of the wicked will be hereafter. But we shall resume the subject in a future number.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 12.

The Sunday Postal Delivery—Sunday Steamers—Prize Essay on Sunday Sanctification—The Wesleyan Conference—Mr. Gorham—Church Convocations, &c.

GLASGOW, August 23d, 1850.

The Sunday Postal Delivery has not yet been resumed, although this may be expected immediately. The first reactionary wave from the agitation of the question has already broken upon our city. The Commissioners to whom the Government Inquiry was entrusted, suggested that where the letter-carriers had not formerly been employed on Sunday, the old practice of delivery at the post-office window should be continued—which, of course, can only be to such as choose to call or send. This has hitherto been the Glasgow method. This week, however, one of the city daily newspapers has thrown out a hint that this is the proper time for considering whether it would not be better to have the delivery on Sunday by the carriers as on other days, avoiding the unseemly scenes which often take place among the crowds collected at the post-office, and affording greater security against fraud. On the following day, a correspondent urged the adoption of the new plan; and although nothing more has yet been done in the matter, it is not improbable that ere long the innovation will be made—thus tending to assimilate Sunday to the other "working days."

At the Annual Meeting of Proprietors of the London, Leith, Edinburgh, and Glasgow Shipping Co., held this week, a question was put as to the result of an inquiry agreed to at a former meeting, as to whether sailing on Sunday between Leith and London could not be discontinued. The answer given was, that "every inquiry that had been made went to show that it was impossible to avoid Sunday sailing; and that, if this Company gave it up, others would just take its place, and the practice be as general as ever." One of the proprietors said, however, they had the satisfaction of knowing, that they had offered to the rival Company "to have alternate sailings on Sunday," which had been rejected. There is little doubt that their gains would be materially affected were they to abandon this traffic; but their love of Mammon, more than their love of supposed duty, constitutes the only impossibility alluded to. The same reason operates in cases less open. The river steamers do not sail on Sunday on the Clyde, although those plying to Liverpool, Dublin, Belfast, &c., make their arrangements so as to arrive on that day. It has, however, just been stated, that the hands belonging even to the river boats are employed on Sunday in cleaning, overhauling, and repairing, in the ports where they lie; and that, although the use of the hammer is avoided, this occasions more labor to the men in effecting their purpose in a less noisy manner. Thus it is that there is sometimes much seeming respect for the traditional holiday, when there is no reality.

A correspondent to one of the London papers, dating from Basle, says that the Sunday question is occupying more attention in Germany than it did. In December, 1847, an intimation was extensively made, that two prizes, one of 150 ducats, and the other of 100 ducats, would be given for the best Essay on Sunday Sanctification. The returns have been made, and the prizes are awarded—the first to Pastor Oschwald, of Murthalen, in the canton of Zurich, Switzerland; and the second to the Rev. Dr. Liebetrut, of Wittbrietzen, in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia. The Essyists are classed, 25 "pastors and ministers;" 3 "candidates of theology;" 1 schoolmaster; 3 workmen; and 3 others, who are not named nor designated. Of the Essays, "several were opposed to the principles of the programme," and others were set aside for other reasons; so that, "only ten manuscripts were worthy of closer consideration."

The Wesleyan Conference, which was met in London, has finished its session, having throughout maintained a bold front towards the dissatisfied of the Methodist body. Some other denominations allow as little reference to the Word of God, when views inconsistent with their "standards" are broached among them; but the Methodists, in their reverence or idolatry of Wesley, are more ready to avow, or at least to make evident, even to themselves, their calling this man "master," than most others in the present day. His writings fairly supplant the Scriptures, appeal being made to them as the only standard, unless where his will is supposed to be farther embodied in the "Rules" of Conference. The late President, in a speech which he made relative to the divisions now rending their churches, gave expression more to the awe with which he contemplated a meeting with the spirit of Wesley than the account which as a steward he has to give to Wesley's Lord. While the Conference were in session, an opposition Assembly was also in deliberation in London. It consisted of representatives delegated by the disaffected members throughout the land. They complain much of the tyranny of Conference, but we do not perceive that spirit of entire surrender to the "Lord of All" exclusively, which we desiderate. They, however, suggest a means of rendering more pliant those who lord it over God's heritage, which, if adopted, will doubtless be efficacious in effecting their object. They call to their members, "Stop the supplies."

Even when intimating the induction of Mr. Gorham, we were doubtful whether that would be the end of "the Great Gorham Case." Had the Bishop of Exeter been an ordinary person, it might have been presumed that when he sent in the Letters of Institution into the Arches Court, he thereby succumbed to the powers through whom he receives his wealth. But he is no ordinary man; and it will not be according to his will if Mr. Gorham have either peace or pleasure in the diocese of Exeter. True to his well-known character, the Bishop, having failed in all the courts, and having done his best to excommunicate the Archbishop of Canterbury, has just addressed a long letter to the church wardens of the parish of Bampford-Speke. He tells them that their new pastor is unsound in the faith—that he examined him, and found him heretical, but that he had no power to keep him out of their fold—that he would have done so notwithstanding of the decisions of the Courts, had not the Archbishop shielded him—but that what they, the church wardens, have now to do, is to watch carefully for the utterance of heresy, should Mr. Gorham be so bold, after what he has suffered, as to preach it, and to note carefully his words, that he, the Bishop, may depose him.

The resolutions of the clergy double-meeting in London, on being presented to the Bishop of London, he expressed his great desire that the Church in Convocation should have the sole power of deciding questions of doctrine, but that until she obtain this, each Bishop must decide in his own diocese. It has often been suggested, to such as the Bishop, that by renouncing the connection with the State, and the emoluments which she derives from it, the Church may any day obtain the power the Bishop thus desiderates—at least over her own adherents. But this is not the thing desired. The High Church or Popish party aim at keeping all the power they have, and getting more. The Bishop of London has been conspicuous in this effort. In the Parliament just prorogued, he introduced into the House of Lords a Bill for taking out of the hands of the Privy Council the power which they exercised in Mr. Gorham's favor. He strove hard to get a new Court of Appeal for the decision of questions of heresy; but a salutary dread of the old ecclesiastical scenes of despotism and cruelty defeated the attempt, although in the Lords the Bishop had 51 voting with him for the third reading, against the majority of 84 by whom the Bill was cast out.

The weather has been less favorable for the past week than formerly, but a considerable portion of the English harvest, and a portion of the Scotch also, has been cut. The grain crops are stated to be good; but of the potato, accounts are unfavorable. Although these accounts are contradictory, there seems to be no room to doubt that the Lord has again extensively blighted the crop over all the land. It is believed that four times as many were planted this year as last in Ireland. While, therefore, the loss may be great in that unhappy land, there may still be left much food for the people.

DEATH OF MR. JUDSON.

The death of Rev. Adoniram Judson, the widely-known and eminently-devoted missionary, is announced as having taken place on the 12th of April, on board a French barque, bound to the Isle of Bourbon, in which he had taken passage for the benefit of his health. His remains were committed to the deep in the evening following his death. In December last, Mr. Judson's health began to fail. In January he went down from Maulmain to Mergui by steamer, and returned apparently better. He soon failed again, however, and resorted to Amherst, where he spent a month without receiving much benefit. About the last of March his muscular strength gave way, and he was completely prostrated. A long sea voyage was then thought by the physicians to be his only hope; and accordingly he took passage for the Isle of Bourbon, accompanied by Rev. Mr. Ranney, whom the mission had appointed for that purpose. He was carried on board the barque in a litter, on the 4th of April, and got out to sea on the 8th. The sea-breeze seemed to revive him, and he directed Mr. Ranney to write to Mrs. Judson, "that he had a strong belief it was the will of God to restore him again to health." Four days afterward, however, he died, and was buried in the sea.

Dr. Judson was the son of Rev. Adoniram Judson, a Congregational clergyman in Plymouth county, Mass. He received his collegiate education at Brown University, with the original intention of pursuing the profession of the law; but experiencing a great change in his religious views soon after graduating, he entered the Theological Seminary at Andover. During his residence at this institution, a profound interest in Foreign Missions was awakened among the students, which resulted in his determination to devote his life to the missionary service. Leaving his native land, among the first Missionaries sent forth by the American Board, in company with Samuel Nevill, Luther Rice, and Samuel Nott, he arrived in Calcutta in 1812. In consequence of studies during the voyage, he was led to change his opinions on the subject of baptism, and a short time after his landing received immersion from the hands of one of the English missionaries in Calcutta. His sermon on that occasion, which produced a deep impression on the religious world, is a master-piece of logical argument, Scriptural research, and grave eloquence. After connecting himself with the Baptist denomination, he selected the Burman Empire as the seat of his future labors—at which post he has remained, with brief intervals of relaxation, for nearly forty years. His efforts and sufferings in the prosecution of his mission are well known. He was a man of high and resolute courage, of remarkable self-reliance, of more than common mental ability, and of devotion to the performance of his duty, almost without a parallel in modern times.

LIBERTY OF THE PRESS IN GEORGIA.

A beautiful illustration of the liberty enjoyed by the press in Georgia, has just been furnished. It seems that a paper called the "Georgia Citizen," published at Macon, recently contained a letter from a correspondent at Atlanta, in which was an allusion considered offensive by the slaveholders of the place, who immediately got up a meeting, and appointed a committee to wait on the editor, Dr. L. F. W. Andrews, to demand the name of the author of the letter in question, and to require the discontinuance of the paper. Mr. Andrews gave the author's name, and discontinued the paper for the time being, although he did not agree to its permanent discontinuance. We copy the offensive paragraph, that our readers may see how sensitive and fearful of the light these Southerners are.

ATLANTA, Aug. 21, 1850.—Among the numerous buildings that are now in process of erection in this city, is one of brick, in full view of, and scarcely a stone's throw from the Atlanta Hotel, which is designed as a depot for the safe keeping and sale of negroes. Two thirds of our people who know the purpose for which it is intended are opposed to its completion, but as yet I have heard of no steps being taken to prevent it. On Sabbath last, however, the heavy rain with which we were visited, washed away nearly one-third of the eastern wall—thus showing (to the minds of omen believers at least) that Providence disapproves the unhallowed purpose for which the building is designed. For my own part, I am free to say I should rejoice to see it razed to the ground as often as its owner rebuilds it."

BAPTISTS IN OREGON.—Interesting letters have recently been received from David T. Lenox, said to be the first Baptist who emigrated to Oregon. It appears that a convention has lately been holden there for the purpose of forming an Education Society and establishing an institution of learning. There is a great demand in the country for books. Money is abundant, and "infidelity stalks about at noonday." Mr. Lenox says:—

"I emigrated to this country in 1843, passing innumerable hordes of Indians, making my way over rivers and mountains, being preserved in a wonderful manner, making the first wagon road to the falls from the United States, and when crossing the Cascade range of mountains we found ourselves situated in the Wallamette Valley, one of the loveliest places on earth. Here I found the Jesuits in lively operation. At Oregon City they have a large nunnery, also a school taught by the priests; also another nunnery farther up the Wallamette. This calls not only upon Baptists, but upon the Protestant world, to awake and pour into this land the true light of the gospel. There are now seven Baptist churches in Oregon, containing one hundred and thirty members. The "Wallamette River Baptist Association" was constituted in June, 1848, with five churches. Since that time, two other churches have been constituted. There are also two Anti-Mission Baptist churches."

ANNUAL MEETING OF CHURCHES.—The annual convocation of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches in Rhode Island and Connecticut was held on Sabbath and First-day, Aug. 31 and Sept. 1. The congregations were large, and I think a strong desire for a revival pervaded the minds of those present. Four sermons were preached, from the following texts: Hosea, 10: 12—"It is time to seek the Lord." Hosea 14: 1—"O Israel, return to the Lord thy God, for thou hast fallen by thine Iniquity." John 15: 5, 6—"I am the vine, ye are the branches," &c. Isaiah 43: 10—"Ye are my witnesses." Many such meetings are rendered comparatively useless by the want of some definite plan upon which to conduct them. In this case, had a request been extended to the ministers to spend a week in visiting from house to house, and preaching in the evening, no doubt great good would have resulted. May there yet be a pentecostal season for these churches.

THE SANDOWAY MISSION.—The success of Mr. Abbott's labors among the Karens has been truly apostolic. The last number of the Macedonian condenses a late communication received from him, and gives some highly interesting facts. The number of churches connected with the mission at Sandoway is forty.

"Besides these, there is a large number of congregations, having some baptized Christians, who meet for worship regularly, but are not organized, and have no settled pastors. During the last year, 544 were baptized, eight were excommunicated, and 20 died, making a net increase of 216. But these figures do not convey a just idea of the progress of truth. Connected with all the congregations in Burmah Proper, there are very many candidates for baptism, some of a most interesting character, who are waiting for ordained pastors to administer the rite. The churches have exceeded expectation in their liberality, although they are very poor, and those in Burmah Proper are oppressed in a degree beyond what we can conceive. Eight native preachers are supported entirely by their churches, having, in a noble spirit of Christian self-denial, voluntarily declined further aid from the mission. Besides these, including five itinerants, there are thirty-seven aided by the mission, receiving on an average twenty rupees each."

MORMONISM CONFRONTED.—The "Latter-day Saints" have lately made themselves conspicuous at Boulogne, France, in the exhibition of their fooleries and blasphemies. Several of the promoters of this imposture issued their placards for a lecture, and called on different persons with whom they left their tracts. Three evangelical ministers—Rev. Mr. Cleave, Episcopalian, Rev. Mr. Cater, Baptist, and Rev. Mr. Robinson, Independent—challenged them to a public disputation. They accepted the challenge. Two chairmen were appointed, one for each side, to keep order, and an umpire to act in case the two did not agree. The disputation was kept up for three nights. There were four points of discussion; 1st, Joe Smith's religious pretensions; 2d, the book of Mormon as a divine revelation; 3d, the mission of its promoters; and, 4th, the validity of the mission of those who impugn the tenets of the Mormonites. The correspondent of the London Patriot, who furnishes the particulars of this debate, states that a more thorough exposure of a most wicked imposture has seldom been given. To test the Mormon system, which is founded partly on Mark xvi. 17—"These signs shall follow them that believe; they shall speak with new tongues," &c.—a paper was shown one of the disputants with the Lord's Prayer written on it in three languages. On being requested to say which of the three was the Greek, he pointed out the Japanese!

MISSIONS IN AFRICA.—At a meeting held in the Missionary Rooms, New York, on the first Monday of Sept., Mr. Walker, of the Gaboon station, West Africa, was present, and made some interesting statements. He represents one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of the missionary enterprise there as arising from the jealousy of the tribe, who count it a great matter to have seen a white man, and especially to have one reside among them, and are consequently unwilling to have others see as much as themselves, preferring to enjoy the honor exclusively. A large tribe from the interior is now rapidly approaching the coast, and threatens to supplant to a great extent the present objects of Missionary labor. They are vigorous, muscular, and of larger stature. Numbers of them are seen at Mr. Walker's late station, seventy miles inland. One young African lad, having determined to learn to read, made such progress as to master the English language, and read with a considerable degree of fluency, in the course of two or three weeks. Mr. W. says the young negro is "no more apt to learn than the children of American parents, but just as much so." The slave trade, according to Mr. W., has almost entirely ceased.

DEPOPULATION OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—At a recent meeting in New York, Mr. Parris, missionary from the Sandwich Islands, communicated intelligence of much interest touching the melancholy process of depopulation that is everywhere apparent in those islands. He says the custom of recruiting the crews of vessels attached to the mercantile marine with natives of the Sandwich islands, would of itself ultimately effect a great reduction of their population; but disease is by far the most potent agency tending to the same result. The most destructive of the diseases are the measles and the whooping cough, introduced by foreigners. Behind these, however, is the influence of disease which had its origin before the introduction of the marriage relation, and which aggravates all others with a deadly intensity. Mr. P. says its presence is almost universal. Scarcely one can be found who is free from it, and it is transmitted from parents to children. It pervades the physical constitution of the natives.

A BLOW TO HINDOOISM.—A letter from Mr. Hume, dated at Bombay, May 22d, says that the new law promulgated by the English Governor, which stipulates that a change of religious opinion shall not involve a loss of caste, has produced the greatest excitement among the Brahmins, and that a powerful though unavailing effort will doubtless be made to effect its repeal. The Hindoos regard it as the heaviest blow struck at their religion. The following is the law referred to:—

"So much of any law or usage now in force within the territories subject to the East India Company as inflicts on any person forfeiture of rights or property, or may be used in any way to impair or affect any right of inheritance by reason of his or her renouncing or having been excluded from the communion of any religion as being deprived of caste, shall cease to be enforced law in the camps of the E. I. Co. and in the camps established by royal charter in the said territories."

THE ERIE RAILROAD.—The Hornellsville Extension of the Erie Railroad is open, making the line from Piermont 320 miles long. It is said that the Erie Road has never failed to open its Extensions on the day promised—a remarkable instance of promptness in the history of railroad building. The business of the Road for August has been very favorable, the freight business having largely revived. The receipts will probably reach $130,000. The Hornellsville Extentension will add largely to the September traffic. In relation to this Road, a Buffalo paper says:—

"All travelers who have passed over this Road concur in the opinion, that in the perfection of its construction, and luxury and elegance of its cars, and the skill and promptitude of its management, it has no equal in this State, and no superior in the Union. The track being six feet wide, greater safety and comfort are secured, and the regularity and swiftness with which the trains are run are in the highest degree satisfactory. Arrangements are made by which through tickets to New York can be had at the office of the Erie Road in Buffalo."

STORM AND FRESHET.—The severe rain storm of Monday, Sept. 2d, caused a freshet on most of the rivers in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, more disastrous perhaps than has ever before been experienced. Bridges, aqueducts, houses, crops, and live-stock, were swept away in many places. The damage to property was immense, and is estimated by millions. A large number of lives were also lost; 16, it is said, at Schall's Forge, above Port Clinton; 14 at Jones's Forge; and several between Mount Carbon and Schuylkill Haven. In the vicinity of Philadelphia, a party consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Edmund P. Gatchell, and another gentleman and his wife, on their return from a visit to the country, missed their way while driving over the inundated roads, and were precipitated into a gully, where three of the party were drowned, namely, the two ladies and Mr. Gatchell.

STATISTICS OF BENEVOLENCE.—We see it stated, that from 1810 to 1848 inclusive, twenty-five millions six hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and fifty-seven dollars have been contributed in the United States for Bible, Missionary, and other Evangelical objects of benevolence; and of this sum $5,547,090 have been contributed to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The receipts of the American religious benevolent societies for 1849-50, amount to a total of $1,212,233. The receipts of the British religious benevolent societies in the same time amounted to $3,226,035. The London list, however, embraces many societies not included in the American enumeration.

THE PEACE CONGRESS.—An English paper says that the bulk of the English members of this Congress arrived at Calais on Monday night, on their way to Frankfort. They were 420 in number, and these, added to those who have preceded them, will bring the deputation up to 500 or above. The American deputation will amount to from 50 to 70. Among the Frenchmen who have already set out are, MM. Emile de Girardin, and De Cormenin, one of the Councillors of State. The train, consisting of 24 carriages, specially engaged, started for Frankfort on Tuesday morning.

STATE AGRICULTURAL FAIR.—The Fair of the New York State Agricultural Society, held at Albany last week, was very numerously attended. Last year the receipts were about $8,000; this year they are said to be about $12,000. Over 60,000 single tickets were sold, and between 20,000 and 30,000 season tickets.

THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW for August is a very good number of that always readable and instructive quarterly. Its table of contents embraces the following articles:—"The Scottish Universities," "Pendennis—the Literary Profession," "The English Language," "Messrs. Stephenson and Fairbairn's Tabular Bridges," "The Liberties of the Gallican Church," "Wordsworth," "The Method of the Divine Government," "In Memoriam," "Trial of Prof. John W. Webster," "Christianity in India." Published by Leonard Scott & Co., 79 Fulton-st., N. Y.

THE NEW YORK REFORMER is the title of a temperance and general newspaper just started at Watertown, N. Y., by L. Ingalls, A. H. Burdick, and L. M. Stowell. It is industriously edited, neatly printed, and well worth the subscription price.

General Intelligence.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, Sept. 2.

The Senate spent most of the day in debating the Bounty Land Bill. Nothing new was said or done in relation to it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

An ineffectual attempt was made to get in a resolution requesting the President to communicate the result of R. R. Gurley's mission to the Republic of Liberia.

The Texas Boundary Bill was made the special order for every day at 12 o'clock till disposed of. The House adjourned at 2 o'clock, without having done anything.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, Sept. 3.

The Bounty Land Bill was taken up, amended in several particulars, and laid over.

The bill to create the office of Surveyor-General of the Public Lands in California and grant lands to settlers, was considered. Various amendments were disposed of and the bill was finally laid over.

Mr. Clay's Bill to abolish the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia was taken up. Mr. Clay briefly explained and advocated the Bill. Its object was to abolish the foreign Slave Trade in the District—the bringing of Slaves and placing them in dépôts, not for the purpose of sale in the District, but for sale and shipment to Southern States. The bill did not propose to interfere in the least degree with the sale of Slaves by one inhabitant of the District to another, nor to prevent such inhabitant going out of the District to purchase Slaves for his own use in the District. It was, in fact, a simple revival of the law of Maryland upon this subject, as that law existed at the time of the cession of a portion of her territory for the seat of Government. It was simply to exclude a traffic in the District, which had no connection whatever with that District—its only effect upon which was, to bring upon it the odium which attaches to that trade, which has been condemned and denounced so often and so justly.

Several amendments to the bill were offered, and one, giving the authorities of the District the power to enforce the authority conferred on them by the bill, was adopted, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Texas Boundary Bill was discussed by Mr. Daniel of North Carolina, who wished to amend the bill so as to abolish all laws which prohibit slavery in the territories. This, with an alteration of the Constitution, putting it out of the power of even three-fourths of the States to affect the institution of slavery in the States without their consent, would satisfy him.

Mr. McDowell followed, and denounced the Wilmot Proviso as nothing less than a deliberate proposition for disunion.

IN SENATE. FOURTH DAY, Sept. 4.

Mr. Clay's Bill to abolish the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia, was postponed.

Mr. Dickinson, from the Finance Committee, reported the General Post Office Appropriation bill. A motion to strike out the appropriation for mail services under the Bremen Steam Company's contract, was rejected, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

A bill to provide for a weekly mail by steamers from New Orleans to Vera Cruz and Tampico was taken up, amended and ordered to be engrossed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Richardson, from the Select Committee to inquire into certain alledged transactions of Thomas Ewing while Secretary of the Interior, presented a voluminous report and sundry resolutions condemning the payment of certain claims by the Secretary. A minority report was presented by Mr. Vinton.

The Texas Boundary bill was taken up. Mr. Clingman's amendment to Mr. Boyd's, proposing to organize Southern California under the name of Colorado, was lost—69 to 130. Mr. Boyd's amendment, providing a Territorial Government for New Mexico, was disagreed to—Yeas 98, Nays 106. Further proceedings were had, amid much confusion and several ineffectual motions to adjourn, when the House refused to order the bill to be read a third time—Yeas 80, Nays 126. Mr. Boyd moved to reconsider the vote, but gave way to an adjournment.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, Sept. 5.

The Senate adopted a Resolution calling for the report of the Commissioner to China. The engrossment of the Post Office Appropriation bill was reconsidered, and the bill was amended and passed. The bill to establish a line of mail steamers between New Orleans and Vera Cruz, was also passed. The Report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, for the payment of certain moneys to the Cherokee Nation, was concurred in.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House took up the Texas Boundary bill, and reconsidered the vote by which it had refused to order the bill to a third reading. The vote by which Mr. Boyd's amendment, providing a Territorial Government for New Mexico, had been rejected, was reconsidered. An excited debate and much confusion followed. Finally Mr. Toombs obtained the floor and proposed an additional section to the amendment of Mr. Boyd, to establish a Territorial Government for New Mexico, adding that "no citizen of the United States shall be deprived of his life, liberty or property, except by the judgment of his peers and the laws of the land, and that the Constitution of the United States and such statutes thereof as may not be locally unapplicable to the common law, as it existed with the British Colonies of America until the Fourth of July, 1776, shall be the exclusive law of said Territory on the subject of African Slavery until altered by the proper authorities." Sundry motions and amendments were offered and rejected, amid great excitement and uproar, when the question recurred on Mr. Toombs' amendment. A division was ordered, and the first part of Mr. T.'s proposition, that "no citizen of the United States shall be deprived of liberty or property in said Territory, except by the judgment of his peers and the laws of the land," was adopted, and the second part was rejected. After more confusion, unsuccessful motions to adjourn, &c., the question was taken on Mr. Boyd's amendment as amended by the first part of Mr. Toombs' proposition, and it was adopted—Yeas 106, Noes 99. The question was then taken on ordering the bill as amended, to a third reading, and lost by 8 majority—Yeas 99, Nays 107.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, Sept. 6.

After the consideration of routine business, the Bounty Land Bill was taken up. Mr. Seward submitted an amendment, which was adopted, extending the benefits of the bill to Marines. Mr. Walker moved an amendment providing that these bounty land warrants shall not be assignable in any case whatever. After considerable debate, without coming to a vote, the bill was laid over, and after action upon several private bills, the Senate adjourned to Second-day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Texas Boundary Bill came up again, on a motion to reconsider; and after a number of votes upon technical questions, the vote on its passage was taken, in the midst of much confusion, and carried—Ayes 107, Noes 97. This bill extends Texas up to the parallel of 36° 30', across the three degrees of longitude next west of the Indian Territory, thence running down to the 32d parallel and following it to the Rio Grande del Norte. It gives Texas Ten Millions of Dollars for her territorial claims waived. It organizes New Mexico without the Wilmot Proviso, and without any consideration for waiving it. It does not admit California into the Union, either with her Constitutional boundaries or otherwise.

SABBATH, Sept. 7.

The House of Representatives did a hard day's work on Sabbath. The California Admission Bill and the Utah Territorial Organization bill were both passed through all stages, just as they came from the Senate, and now only await the President's signature to render them laws of the land. California passed by the decisive vote of 150 to 57, and Utah by 97 to 85. A motion to affix the Wilmot Proviso to the latter was defeated by 78 to 69. By the provisions of these Bills, all the Territory acquired by the United States from Mexico lying westward of New Mexico as aforesaid, and East of California, is organized into another Territory under the appellation of Utah. (This Territory includes the Salt Lake region, or Great Central Basin of our Continent, in which the Mormons have set up their Ebenezer.) California is admitted into the Union as a State, with her chosen Boundaries and her Free Constitution; so that her two Senators and two Members already chosen may take their seats forthwith. The Territories of New Mexico and Utah are to be admitted into the Union as States, with or without Slavery as their People shall decide.

Three Days Later from Europe.

By the steamship Hibernia, from Liverpool, European news three days later has been received.

The Gorham dispute still rages. The power of the Crown to interfere in things spiritual, is now boldly disputed.

The crops in Ireland are said to be abundant, and the potato blight, it is believed, will be less general than was anticipated.

The Catholic Clergy of Ireland have commenced holding a National Synod, which is the first since the time of the Reformation.

An iron roof, 400 feet long and 100 wide, fell at one of the London Railway stations. Fortunately only one person was killed.

France looks stormy. The President has been turned out of a ball-room at Briançon; the room had to be cleared at the point of the bayonet.

The Holsteiners have dislodged the Danish out-posts at Kropp, and their whole army has left Rensburg and advanced in the direction of the Danish position.

Affairs in Germany are becoming more and more complicated. Several heavy failures are reported at Hamburg.

Mr. Circuit, a farmer at East Ham, has at the present time upwards of 600 people—men, boys, and women—employed in pulling, carting, and peeling onions for pickling, and they will be thus engaged for two months. He pays wages to the amount of £200 weekly, and the cost of each acre of onions averages £200.

On Sunday, Wombwell's rhinoceros died at Paisley, after a week's illness. It cost £1,000, but the carcase will be purchased for the Edinburgh Museum.

The cholera has been making some fearful ravages in Brunswick, since the month of June. According to official reports, as many as 800 persons have died.

All churchyards in London are to be closed forever on the 1st of July, 1851, when burials are to take place in the suburban cemeteries.

At the late sale of the King of Holland's pictures, two portraits by Vandyke were purchased by the Marquis of Hertford for £5,800.

A vessel arrived at London from New York has brought the large number of 112 cases of shoes, of American manufacture, as a portion of her cargo.

Some of the growers of strawberries for the London market, have as many as 25 acres of land planted with the fruit.

The number of cigars consumed in Austria, in 1841, was 9,700,000; and in 1849 no less than 59,000,000.

Several bales of carpets have arrived in London from China, being the production of that empire.

Twelve Days Later from California.

The steamship Empire City, from Chagres, with twelve days later news from California, arrived at New York on Fifth-day last, September 5.

The steamship Panama arrived at Panama from San Francisco on the evening of August 21st, bringing $2,300,000 in gold dust, and about 240 passengers. The Panama left Acapulco Aug 16; on the 17th the Cholera broke out among the passengers with sudden and most terrible violence. The following are the names of some of those who died before reaching Panama:—John McLanchy, of Plymouth Co. Ohio, aged 34 years; Norman Comerie, of Johnstown, N. Y., aged 24 years; Joseph Dale, of Philadelphia, (late of Lima); G. W. Sutton, of Madison Co. N. Y., aged 35; Joseph Ridgley, of Baltimore, aged 27; Capt. Ashby, of Mystic, Conn.; Capt. J. P. Manchester, of Martha's Vineyard; Capt. Robinson, of Buffalo, and about 40 others, whose names were not ascertained.

The news from the mines is good; the yields of gold are daily increasing as the waters recede. Extensive dams and trenches have been made in several parts for the purpose of turning the streams. An anticipation, shared in by most of the miners, is that when the waters suside there will be found an abundance of dust.

Since the sailing of the last steamer, the condition of the overland emigration has taken strong hold of public attention. The immense crowd who are coming to California by the route of the plains is beyond the capacity of that region to sustain their teams, and toward the latter end of the journey, when within about 300 miles of the Pacific side, about the sink of Mary's River, the teams have given out, and there will be an utter inability on the part of thousands to pass the Sierra Nevada, unless assisted from the California side, which is to be done.

Another great object of public interest has been the great number of murders and assassinations which have lately taken place in the San Joaquin mines, most of which have been traced to the foreigners of Spanish descent, and but one opinion is expressed, viz: that they shall and must quit the country, or abide, perhaps, extreme consequences. Meetings have been held to that effect, and some of the first citizens of the country are appointed to see the undertaking carried into effect.

A settlement has been formed at the eastern side of the Sierra Nevada, in the upper end of Carson Valley, by the Mormons, and from its agricultural capacities is likely to flourish, although the gold on that side has not been found in great abundance. A permanent settlement there will be of great importance to future emigration overland.

Runaway Slaves.

There was a tolerably pretty race in some of our streets yesterday morning, says the Washington Republic, between two handcuffed negroes and sundry other folks, the history of which we will relate.

Two negro men, belonging to Hon. Mr. Colcock, of South Carolina, whom he had brought from his home to wait upon himself and family in this city, made their escape from him two or three months ago; and, after diligent search, were found, a few weeks since, where they had been secreted by the servants of R. S. Coxe, Esq., in the manner described at that time. They were then placed in the jail for safe-keeping, where Mr. Colcock and a young gentleman (his nephew, we believe, who was about to depart for the South) took them from the custody of the jailor and started toward the southern mailboat. Two hacks were employed for the purpose, in the first of which the gentlemen rode, and in the other the negroes, who were handcuffed together. On the Avenue, near Ninth-st., the hack stopped, and Mr. Colcock and his friend went into a store to purchase another pair of handcuffs, for the securing their charge: the hack in which the negroes rode taking position outside of the other. This looked like a chance for escape, and the door of the hack was soon open, and the negroes gone! In a moment the alarm was given, but never did darkies scamper so swiftly! The two gentlemen pursued, the hue and cry was raised, and everybody joined in the race, though few new why. The handcuffs were not observed, and it was wondered by many how close the contest was! At length the younger of the principal pursuers was gaining close upon the fugitives, when one of them lifted a stone or brickbat, and would have leveled him to the earth, had not some other person done the like for him at that moment. In an instant the brace of darkies were surrounded, and what appeared strange was the coincidence of several slavedealers being among the crowd assembled. One of these, with true tact, made some remarks about getting rid of trouble, but Mr. Colcock replied emphatically, that $5,000 would not buy either of them. They were forthwith returned to the jail, to wait a more auspicious starting. On their arrival here one of the officers spoke to them of the folly of their efforts, when the fellow who had attempted to throw the stone remarked: "I have but once to die, and I'd sooner take the chance for it now than go home." What is strange is, that during all this fellow's life, prior to his present adventurous career, he was one of the most timid and amiable servants that ever lived. We understand they were both approved family servants, and great reliance was placed upon their fidelity.

About the time of the absconding of these slaves, two females of like character eloped, neither of whom has been regained. It is said that one of them, who was a very bright color, departed in the cars as a white lady, through the aid of a veil, and probably in charge of a white escort.

MAIL ROBBERY IN OHIO.—Gen. O. Hinton, a man hitherto considered a respectable character, and Agent for the "Ohio Stage Company," has been arrested at Cleveland on a charge of robbing the mails of some $17,000. The mode of his operations, according to the Plain Dealer, is as follows: He has been in the habit of traveling to and fro in the stages, professing always to be on business for the Company, and consequently a privileged character among the mail bags. He was suspected some time since, as several robberies took place when he was known to be on board. With an eye on him, the word was "passed along the line," and decoy packages, with money marked, were put into the mail on purpose to be stolen out. Whenever it was known that the General was about to travel, he was sure to be accompanied with one of these packages in the mail. If it passed on to its destination unmolested, its wrapper was changed and sent in another direction. At last the bait took. He was arrested in Cincinnati, and large quantities of the marked money contained in these packages found on his person. He was examined and bound over under a ten thousand dollar bond. He escaped from his keeper, however, and was still at large on the 29th. A reward of $1000 is offered for his recapture.

The United States have had six Presidents in little more than nine years. Counting from the 1st March, 1841, at which time Van Buren was President, there have been Van Buren, Harrison, Tyler, Polk, Taylor and Fillmore. The youngest of these Presidents at the time of his inauguration was Mr. Polk, who was then 49 years and 4 months, old and the next youngest Mr. Fillmore, who is at present 50 years and 6 months old.

JENNY LIND'S APARTMENTS.—Some of the daily papers publish column after column of matter relating to even the most unimportant movements of the Swedish Nightingale. One of them gives the following account of her rooms at the Irving House:—

"Her suite of rooms, consisting of a parlor, a drawing room, a dining room, and two bedrooms, were fitted up in magnificent style for her arrival, the furniture and paintings in them being valued at $7,000. In her drawing room, the furniture is all of the finest carved solid rosewood, covered with yellow and gold satin damask, the curtains of the same material, with fine real thread lace underneath. The tables of rosewood, marble, and Papier Mache richly inlaid with pearl. One of Boardman & Gray's Dolce Campana pianos is also in the apartment. Her chamber is no less gorgeously finished, the bedstead being covered with a canopy of the finest lace, and the coverlid of the most splendid purple satin, beautifully embroidered, and with a lace border."

EDUCATIONAL FUND IN WISCONSIN.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, who was recently at Janesville, Wisconsin, says:

"At this town I saw the Treasurer and Secretary of State, who, with the Attorney General, are the Commissioners of the University and Common School Lands, and who are now disposing of the lands at auction and by private entry, for the benefit of that fund. It is the crowning act of this young and vigorous State, that she has appropriated one section, or 640 acres, in every town in the State, for the purposes of education. These lands cannot be sold for less than the appraisal, which will range from $1 to $20 per acre. When all these lands are sold a most princely income will be realized, probably larger than any of the States of this Union. The lands are sold on a credit of ten years with 10 per cent. down and annual interest; and the amount so raised is immediately loaned in the County from which it is received. More than 1,200 acres were sold in Rock County, in three days, at an average of about $5 per acre."

BROWN UNIVERSITY.—The Providence Journal is informed by the Committee of the Corporation, that the proposed changes in the modes of instruction in Brown University will be made immediately; and that the system indicated in the report to the Corporation, will go into effect at the commencement of the ensuing collegiate year.

SUMMARY.

The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin says he has reliable information that the Governor of Texas, before convening the Texas Legislature, corresponded with the Executives of certain Southern States, soliciting aid against the General Government, and that it was secretly guarantied by the Governors of South Carolina, Mississippi, Georgia, and Florida. Those of Virginia, Alabama, Louisiana, and other States, refused, by letter, to countenance the project.

The Rochester Advertiser says that Romanta Hart, of Brighton, in Monroe county, raised from three acres one hundred and eighty-one bushels of wheat, by measure, being sixty and one-third bushels to the acre. The wheat was of a superior quality, and would probably overrun the usual weight—60 lbs. to the bushel. Brighton places old Monroe at the head in raising wheat.

Governor Hubbard, of Maine, has appointed three Commissioners for the purpose of establishing a reform school or house of correction. They are authorized to select a site, to obtain plans and estimates, and to make contracts for the necessary buildings. They are also directed and empowered to prepare a law for the establishment of the institution, and to devise a system for its government.

We understand that as one of the Central New Jersey Railroad trains was crossing the track of the New Jersey Railroad at Elizabethtown, the train of the latter came in contact with the former, crushing the hindmost car to pieces. Fortunately it did not contain a single passenger.

Havana was visited by a hurricane on the 22d of August; it blew with great violence, and did a great deal of damage to the shipping. All the vessels of war dragged their anchors about the harbor; many beautiful trees were injured, and the banana and plantain trees were almost all destroyed.

Mr. Edmund Lafayette of France, came passenger by the Atlantic, and has since attended the State Agricultural Fair at Albany. He is a grandson of General La Fayette and of the Count de Tracy. He, his brother Oscar, and his father George Washington La Fayette, were all at the same time Republican Members of the Chamber of Deputies.

Ferdinand Lasteyrie, who also came passenger in the Atlantic, is at present a Member of the National Assembly. He is accompanied by his wife, an accomplished American lady, niece of Gov. Seabrook of South Carolina, one of the most distinguished families in the South.

Capt. Williams, of the schr. Celerity, of New York, was recently arrested at Richmond, Va., for concealing slaves on board his vessel, was examined and remanded for trial in King William County. The impression is that he unwittingly involved himself.

On Friday night, Aug. 31st, a terrific gale sprang up on Lake Michigan, which continued during Saturday, causing great damage to shipping, &c. The gale was accompanied by heavy rain, nearly flooding the whole country of northern Illinois and Wisconsin.

The Ocala (Fla.) Argus of Aug. 10, says that a white boy was recently stolen by the Indians from the lower part of that country. The lad had been sent for a branding iron. The horse which he rode returned that night with the boy's suspenders braided in his mane. Investigation proved the vicinity of Indians. The Argus says that much excitement prevails. Families are again breaking up.

A writer in the Watertown Journal, [Jeff. Co., N. Y.] notices the ravages of a worm which is destroying all the Black Ash timber in that country. They spin as much web as to envelop the whole tree like a net, and they have already consumed every leaf of this kind of timber.

JENNY LIND'S FIRST CONCERT in America is fixed for the evening of Sept. 11, at Castle Garden, New York. The tickets for it were sold at auction on the previous Sabbath. The first ticket brought $225; the second $25; and so down to $5. 1,400 tickets were disposed of at an average of about $6,50.

The packet ship Star of the West, Capt. A. B. Lowber, arrived at Liverpool in 16 days. When three days out she was only 160 miles from New-York, consequently nearly the whole distance was accomplished in thirteen days.

E. Collier, the Cashier of the Havre de Grace Bank, has been committed to Belair Prison. The President, and all the Maryland Directors, are under arrest. The assets are not worth $5, with $90,000 liabilities.

There is a little baby out West, whose arm at the elbow can be encircled by a lady's ring. It is three months old, and weighs 1 2 3 pounds.

It is stated that the wheat crop of the United States, this year, will be the largest ever harvested. The effect of the abundance is already felt in the decline of flour.

Bishop Bascomb is considered dangerously ill, there being doubts entertained by his physicians whether he can possibly recover.

The two-hundred dollar prize offered by P. T. Barnum for the best song to be sung by Mdlle. Jenny Lind as a greeting to America, has been awarded to Bayard Taylor.

One night last week there was a fire in the hat store of W. H. Beebe & Co., Broadway, N. Y., which did damage to the amount of some $15,000.

In Plainfield, N. Y., Sept. 3d, by Eld. W. B. Maxson, Mr. D. DELOS WELLS, of DeRuyter, to Miss ARMINDA BEVIN, of Plainfield.

DIED.

August 8th, Mrs. BETSEY COON, consort of Aaron Coon, of Petersburg, Rensselaer Co., N. Y. Sister Coon was, we trust, in life and death, a Christian. Among us she was a steady light—a light which only ceased to shine here, when the lamp of life expired, to appear with a more effulgent brightness in that promised rest where sickness and old age are unknown. She had been many years in feeble health, and for the last few years she has been entirely deprived of the privilege of assembling with the disciples of her Master in the sanctuary. In her death the church and the cause of truth have lost a friend. She endured her sickness with fortitude and patience, until, in her 68th year, she fell asleep in Christ. Sister Coon was a native of Westerly, R. I., and in early life settled in this country, and joined the Church at Berlin. Afterward, when the Church at Petersburg was organized, she removed her membership to that Church, from which she is now removed in hope of a membership in the church in heaven. May we meet her there. J. S.

In Alfred, N. Y., July 14, 1850, of a lingering illness, ABIGAIL SHAW, daughter of Phineas K. and Malissa Shaw, in the 13th year of her age. She gave evidence to her friends of having been born again, and of resignation to the will of God.

In Alfred, July 26th, JANE E., daughter of David S. and Sarah Monroe, aged 4 months and 9 days.

In Alfred, August 10th, of dysentery, HANNAH HALL, wife of Bennajah Hall, in the 43d year of her age. She had for a number of years been a member of the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, and died in a state of reconciliation to the will of God.

In Alfred, August 31st, at the residence of her brother, Bennajah Hall, Miss EUNICE HALL, in the 60th year of her age. She was formerly a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin, but of late a member of the 2d Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred. The day before she died, she said that she did not wish to recover, but rejoiced in the hope of eternal life beyond the grave.

In Alfred, August 21st, JULIA ALIDA, daughter of Paul M. and Mary Ann Vincent, aged 18 months and 1 day.

In Wirt, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 19th of August, GUILFORD DUDLEY, only and very promising son of Alanson and Mary L. Kenyon, aged 5 years, 8 months, 17 days. Also, on the 21st of August, HELEN A. KENYON, daughter of the above-named, aged 1 year, 1 month, 19 days. "They were beautiful and very lovely in their lives, and in their deaths were not divided."

In Hopkinton, R. I., Aug. 28th, ELIZABETH MARIA, infant daughter of Josiah W. and Tacy Langworthy.

At Corning, Steuben Co., N. Y., August 28th, ZERVIAH L., youngest daughter of I. P. Lewis, of Sangerfield, and wife of Joseph S. Mabbett, in the 29th year of her age.

At the Columbia School, Arkansas, Aug. 11th, of congestive fever, GEORGE HENRY MAXSON, aged three years and twenty-nine days; also, near the same place, at the house of Mr. J. M. Craig, of the same disorder, SARAH LAVANTIA MAXSON, aged five years, eight months, and five days; only children of Geo. P. and Mercia M. Maxson.

In Leonardsville, N. Y., on the 4th inst., SAMUEL ADELBERT, son of Samuel and Almira Brand, aged eight months and six days.

The Illustrated Domestic Bible.

NOW PUBLISHING IN NUMBERS, on the 1st and 15th of each month. In addition to the authorized version, this edition contains Seven Hundred Engravings, Three Steel Maps, very full References, Poetical Portions in Metrical Form, Reflections, Notes, Questions on each Chapter, Dates for every day in the year, Family Record, Chronological Order, &c., &c.

The whole Bible will be completed in 25 Numbers of 56 pages each, making when finished a volume of 1,400 pages, small quarto, of very convenient size for family or private reading. It is peculiarly valuable for Sunday School Teachers. Every Sabbath School should have a copy of it, and it should be in every family where there are children. The Engravings are not introduced for show, but are real illustrations, and serve to explain the text. This feature will render it very attractive for the young, and will serve more than any other means to fix the Sacred Word permanently in the memory.

The N. Y. Recorder says: "It strikes us as better fitted to its sphere than any other similar work. We have great pleasure in commending it to our readers."

The Christian Observer (Phila.) says: "We cheerfully commend it as one of the most complete and convenient, as well as one of the cheapest Family Bibles that has appeared."

AGENTS WANTED to obtain subscribers in New York, Brooklyn, and other places. To Ministers, Theological Students, and others who would feel an interest in circulating such a work, the most liberal terms will be allowed. Address, post paid, Redemption of Lands Sold for Taxes.

STATE OF NEW YORK, COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, ALBANY, April 12, 1850.—Notice is hereby given, pursuant to section 76, of title 3, article 3, of chapter 13, of the first part of the Revised Statutes, as amended by chapter 183, of the laws of 1850, that unless the lands sold for taxes at the general tax sale held at the Capitol, in the city of Albany, in the months of November and December, 1848, shall be redeemed by the payment into the Treasury of the State, on or before the sixteenth day of December next after the date hereof, of the amount for which each parcel of the said lands was sold, and the interest thereon, at the rate of ten per centum per annum, from the date of the sale to the date of the payment, the lands so sold and remaining unredeemed will be conveyed to the purchasers thereof.

321 6w WASHINGTON HUNT, Comptroller.

State of New York.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, ALBANY, August 15, 1850. To the Sheriff of the City and County of New York:—Sir: Notice is hereby given, that at the General Election to be held in this State on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, the following officers are to be elected, to wit: A Governor in the place of Hamilton Fish; a Lieutenant Governor in the place of George W. Patterson; a Canal Commissioner in place of Jacob Hinds; an Inspector of State Prisons in place of David D. Spencer; a Clerk of the Court of Appeals in place of Charles S. Benton; a Representative in the 32d Congress of the United States, for the 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th districts, in place of J. Phillips Phœnix, Walter Underhill, George Briggs, and James Brooks. County officers to be elected for said County—Sixteen Members of Assembly; a District Attorney in the place of John McKeon—all of whose terms of office will expire on the last day of December next. And also a new Judge, in pursuance of chapter 205, Laws of 1850. The electors throughout the State are also to vote for or against the Repeal of the Act, entitled, "An Act Establishing Free Schools throughout the State," passed March 26, 1849, and an Act entitled, "An Act to Amend the Act entitled an Act Establishing Free Schools throughout the State," passed April 11, 1849.

Yours respectfully,
CHRISTOPHER MORGAN,
Secretary of State.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE, August 20, 1850.

I hereby certify that the above is a correct copy of the notice of the General Election to be held on Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November next, received this day from the Hon. Christopher Morgan, Secretary of State.

THOMAS CARNLEY,
Sheriff of the City and County of New York.

N. B.—All the public newspapers within this County will please publish this notice once in each week, until the election, and send in their bills for advertising the same as soon as the election is over, so that they may be laid before the Board of Supervisors and passed for payment. Sept5—te

Miscellaneous.

Three Celebrated Women.

Grace Greenwood writes from Washington to the Philadelphia Post:—

"I have met here three most remarkable and distinguished women—Miss Dix, Miss Bremer, and Mademoiselle Jagello, the heroine of Hungary. Of these, knowing you would like to hear, I will say all that I may with propriety, and in the space and brief time that remains to me to-day.

"Dorothea Dix, that good genius, that ministering angel to the criminal and maniac, the outcast of earth and the stricken of God—is, as you would suppose, a woman of most noble and prepossessing appearance. She is fair and slight, and looks but ill adapted physically for the life of self-sacrifice, endurance, and almost superhuman exertion to which she has consecrated herself. But her eye, though calm and mild and full of soft persuasion, also reveals the strength of a great soul—the wondrous magnetic power of a deep inward life. She has a gentle, even-toned voice, and her manners are simple and winning, yet dignified and womanly.

"Frederika Bremer is the most natural and individual character I have ever known. She is like no one in the wide world, I believe. There is in her nature all the charming varieties we find in the admirable women of her novels, and her transparent manner, her frank, earnest, and lively conversation reveal all to you when you come to know her. I think I never saw so warm and large, so sensitive and sympathetic a heart as hers. Phrenologists say that her head shows a remarkable development of benevolence and of all the kindly and affectionate organs. A most harmonious working together of heart, brain, and soul, does her life of goodness, power, beauty, and usefulness present.

"Apollonia Jagello is a striking but a fascinating and apparently a very loveable woman. She is quite handsome, and though not of commanding hight, with a symmetrical figure. She has much vivacity, and a certain childlike naturalness of manner altogether charming. But the mold of her fine lips indicates great firmness, and the fire of freedom and indomitable courage lightens out of her full dark eye."

Last Hours of Randolph.

In the spring of 1833, it was very evident to Randolph's friends that his days were numbered. Indeed, he had himself given up nearly all hopes of recovery, and yet he still talked of another voyage to England; but when he reached Philadelphia his strength completely failed him, and he sent for the late Dr. Parish, a physician in whom he had implicit confidence, and who was also his personal friend.

The Dr., finding him grow weaker and weaker, and not wishing to have the whole responsibility of attending him himself, suggested the propriety of calling in another physician. To this Mr. Randolph objected, saying:

"In a multitude of counsellors there is not always wisdom, but sometimes confusion; and, sir, the patient may die while the doctors are looking at each other."

In the course of the morning, Dr. Parish requested Randolph to permit him to go away for an hour or two, to visit some of his other patients. Randolph objected, and turning to his faithful man John, he said:

"John, do not let the Dr. leave me; I cannot spare him."

After a short time he added: "John, did you understand me?"

John replied, "Oh yes, master; I have locked the door and put the key in my pocket."

This prompt attention to his orders brought forth a smile of approbation, especially when Dr. Parish very good-humoredly and kindly seated himself at the bed-side, and made no further effort to get away.

Some time later in the day, Randolph turned towards the doctor, and said:

"I wish you to remember, sir, that I confirm all that I have done in emancipating my slaves, for whom I have made provision."

Dr. Parish expressed sincere gratification at hearing his declaration, but expressed a wish to call in some other witness, who might afterwards share with him the responsibility of making it public after his decease. Randolph then assured him that he had already mentioned it to others. The next day, however, in the presence of another gentleman, he again said:

"I confirm all that I have done respecting the freedom of my slaves, and making provision for them," adding emphatically, "and especially for this man!" laying his hand on the shoulder of his faithful John.

Finding himself growing weaker, and believing his end to be approaching, he called to John and desired him to bring his father's broach or shirt-pin, and place it in the bosom of his shirt, which was done, and evidently gave him pleasure. During the morning, he said to Dr. Parish:

"I am afraid, sir, you don't understand exactly about my slaves?"

The Dr. replied, that he believed he understood him fully.

"No sir," said Randolph, "you do not quite comprehend the case; for, according to our Virginia laws, you must not leave me until I die, or my declaration may lose its force, as you could not prove that I had not subsequently made a counter declaration."

Whilst the doctor was reading for Randolph, the word 'impetus' occurred. Dr. Parish pronounced it 'im*pe*tus,' laying the accent on the second syllable. Randolph, weak and dying as he was, immediately interrupted him with—

"Wrong, doctor; *im*petus if you please."

Shortly afterwards, while reading a chapter in the Bible, he read the word 'omni*po*tent;' accenting on the third syllable, Randolph exclaimed:

"Wrong again, doctor; 'om*ni*potent' is the word."

Randolph lay very quiet for some time, and then repeated the word 'remorse!' with great emphasis. Turning to Dr. Parish, he added solemnly:

"Bring me a dictionary, doctor; you do not understand the word; you cannot comprehend its full meaning."

There was no dictionary in the room, and he then requested Dr. Parish to write it down on paper. No paper being at hand, the doctor asked him if he should write the word on his (Randolph's) old cards, which lay on a table, to which he replied:

"Nothing more proper, sir."

When this was done, Randolph looked at it, and after a pause desired his man John to draw a line —— under the word. When this was finished, Dr. Parish not knowing what he meant, or what Randolph wished to be done with it, asked him if he should put the card in his pocket; to which he simply assented, without any further directions.

After Dr. Parish had finished reading the Bible to him, he said:

"I have looked to the Lord Jesus for mercy, and have hope, sir."

Next day he gradually grew weaker and weaker, until death at length released him from his sufferings.

Thus died John Randolph of Roanoke, and it may truly be said that Virginia lost in him one of her most faithful children and brightest ornaments. That he had his faults and his failings, his best friends will admit, but they who knew the nature of his physical sufferings, were ever willing to cast the mantle of charity over those weaknesses of human nature. No matter what difference of opinion there may be as to the erratic nature of his political course, there can be none as to his extraordinary talents. Friends and foes alike bear witness to the charms of his eloquence and the potency of his satire. In conversational powers he was surpassed by none, and rarely equalled by any of his cotemporaries. He had a memory of adamant, and a classical taste for the beauties of English literature. Quotations were at his command and almost invariably aptly applied.

Those who have heard his fascinating eloquence in the Senate or in the parlor, can never forget him.

Singular Vegetable Phenomenon.

The Knoxville (Tennesee) Register gives the following account of a singular and perhaps important vegetable phenomenon:

"About this time last year the cane upon several islands in the rivers of East Tennesee was discovered to be producing small grains, which very much resembled rye, both as to size and shape. It grew in heads, and was covered with chaff, like that of wheat. The production was then considered remarkable, and so unusual that not even 'the oldest inhabitant' had ever seen any thing of the kind. The conjectures respecting the cause of the appearance of this unusual grain were very numerous—many persons (and some of them skilled in botanic learning,) supposed that the cane had by some means been inoculated with wheat.

"This year we are told that the cane throughout East Tennesee is bearing, in almost incredible quantities, the same grain. At some places it would not be difficult to collect as much as twenty-five or thirty bushels per acre. Some persons owning cane lands have already gathered large quantities of the grain, which they find makes a flour equal in appearance to that of wheat, and equally as palatable when cooked in the form of cakes, &c. Hogs and fowl eat the grain as it falls from the cane, with the same greediness that they devour any other small grain. Another remarkable feature about the matter is, that so soon as the grain begins to mature the cane begins to die, and the indications now are that all the cane in East Tennesee will die out this season.

"It has been suggested to us that the farmers, by collecting this seed, might sow it upon their wood-lands, and thus have excellent cane pastures for their stock, as their can be little doubt but that the grain will germinate, especially in moist lands."

Education in the several States.

[Reports at the recent National Educational Convention.]

Louisiana has but recently organized a system of Common Schools. For a long time the efforts of the State were directed to the supporting of Colleges, of which three have been founded, but after the expenditure of much money and trouble, all the colleges have in a great degree failed. The first effort to establish Common Schools was made in New Orleans in 1841. Means were devised for their support, and in the Second Municipality of that city, in that year, there were 75 scholars in the schools. In the same Municipality now there are 3,000 scholars in the schools. In the First Municipality Schools there are now 1,300 scholars. Throughout the State, the example set by New Orleans has been productive of much good. The State, by its Constitution, adopted in 1845, provided for the establishment of a system of Common Schools, and directed the establishment of a University in New Orleans, to be supported by the State. Public Schools have been commenced throughout the State, and the Superintendent is actively engaged in thoroughly organizing them.

Massachusetts.—This State compels every town and city in her borders to educate its children. The State has no Superintendents, but has local Committees, and a Board of Education, the latter of which elect a Secretary, with a salary of $2,000 per annum, who exercises a supervisory care over the system. A poll is levied for its support, and officers are appointed whose duty it is to go from town to town and awaken an interest in education. Three Normal Schools are in existence there. The American Institute of Instruction, which receives an annual appropriation of $100 from the State, was established twenty-one years ago in Boston, and has published twenty-one volumes of its transactions. It is composed of the friends of Education throughout the Union. There is also a State Teachers' Association, to which the State gives yearly $150, and also $50 to the County Associations of Teachers.

Michigan.—During the past year much progress has been made, and much interest awakened by the Convention which met in Philadelphia last year. Education has been very much advanced in Michigan by the labors of that body. A building for a Normal School is in course of erection. There are about 50,000 children in the State who do not go to school.

New Hampshire.—The Schools in this State are entirely free, being supported by taxation on property. The office of State Superintendent has been abolished, and ten County Superintendents substituted.

New Jersey.—The School law of this State allows the towns and districts to appropriate a very restricted amount for the support of Schools. This amount is insufficient in many districts, some of which have petitioned the Legislature and received special charters, allowing them to appropriate a larger amount. In Burlington there is a Free School containing 300 scholars, which is supported by the revenue arising from an island in the Delaware River, left for that purpose 100 years ago.

New York.—Schools are not entirely free in this State, but great efforts have been made to have them so. The principle has once been endorsed by the people of the State, but has been referred to them again for a formal vote. Conventions have been held on the subject, and a deep interest is excited.

Land Monopoly.

BY REV. DR. L. BEECHER.

Hitherto the majority of mankind, who have tilled the earth, have been slaves or tenants. The soil has been owned by kings, and the military chieftains and nobles, and by them rented to landlords, and by these to still smaller dealers, and by these again it is divided and sub-divided, until the majority, who have paid the rent, sustained by the sweat of their brow, not only their own families, but three or four degrees of society above them; while they themselves have been crushed beneath the weight, and lived on the borders of starvation; the sickness of a week, and often of a single day, rendering them paupers.

The same monopoly of the soil has sent another large class of the community into manufacturing establishments, to work out their days in ignorance and hopeless poverty; and another to the army and navy, where honor and wealth await the few, and ignorance and an early grave the many.

The consequence of excluding such numbers from the position of healthful cultivators of the soil, has been ignorance, reckless indifference, turbulence and crime. Tortured by their oppressions and unrestrained by moral principle, they have been prepared for desperate deeds. Such a state of society cannot be made happy; the evil is radical, and can only be remedied by giving a new direction to the physical, moral and intellectual energies of men. We might as well band with iron the trees of the forest, and expect their expansion, or throw upon them in stinted measure the light and rain of heaven, and expect their luxuriant growth, as to cramp the mind by unequal institutions, and expect the development of its resources, in a happy state of society. Room for action must be afforded, and light must be poured upon the understanding, and motive pressed upon the heart. But, to accomplish this, the earth must be owned by those who till it.

This will give activity to industry, vigor to the body, tone to the mind, and by the attendant blessings of heaven religion to the heart. From agriculture, stimulated by personal rights, will result commerce, science, arts, liberty and independence.

The attraction of gravity is the great principle of motion in the maternal world, and the possession of the earth in fee simple by the cultivator, is the great principle of action in the moral world. Nearly all the political evils which have afflicted mankind have resulted from the unrighteous monopoly of the earth; and the predicted renovation can never be accomplished, until this monopoly shall have passed away, and the earth is extensively tilled by the independent owners of the soil.

Cure for a Foundered Horse.

Some three years since, I had the misfortune to founder a valuable horse. It was a corn founder of the worst kind—so much so that he could not take a step. Having had but little experience in horse flesh, I called on some neighbors, and they pronounced him incurable, and advised me to knock him in the head, as the speediest cure. I could not bear the thought of giving up so valuable and faithful an animal, and as a last resource, I applied to my "Book Farming." In an old number of the American Farmer, I found the following recipe for foundered horses, and although my faith was weak, I immediately applied the remedy with entire success:

"Have a tub of water, as near boiling hot as possible, and commence bathing his legs, beginning at the fetlock and going upwards. Care must be taken to begin at the fetlock and go up, for if the hot water is applied above it the hair will be taken off. When the leg which is foundered has been well bathed, wrap it in woolen blankets, and tie the blanket on carefully, and then saturate the blanket with hot water, beginning at the bottom and going up. Repeat the hot water once in two hours, until the swelling begins to go down. Give the horse a purge of sage tea, molasses and melted lard, say a pint of each; and should it be a bad case, bleed him in the neck."

As mine was a bad one, I followed all directions implicitly, notwithstanding the oft repeated assertions of the man that applied the water, that the hair would all be taken off. I had the satisfaction to see my horse speedily recover, and in a few days be ready for service again. This invaluable remedy, I might have never given to the public, had not the same horse again been foundered and again been cured by the same simple remedy.

Last Sunday morning I went into the stable, and found my horse foundered in his hind legs. He was in great pain, refused his food, and could scarcely move. I immediately drenched him with sage tea, molasses and lard, and applied the blankets and hot water; kept the blankets on all day Sunday, occasionally wetting them with hot water. Monday the horse was in fine order, with a good appetite, and at work in the harness. But for the American Farmer I should have lost my horse.

Butternut Sugar.

Knowing that our common butternut tree yields, upon being wounded, a considerable amount of sap, I was led to make a trial of it to ascertain whether a sufficient amount of saccharine matter was afforded to make it an object worthy of the farmer's notice. I accordingly tapped several trees that stood in an open field, from each of which I procured about four gallons of sap, which on being evaporated, yielded five ounces to the gallon of grained sugar. This sugar had a peculiar honey-like flavor, and would make better molesses than any other kind with which I am acquainted. It was observed that as it evaporated, it had a tendency to form into flakes of transparent jelley, which would render it necessary to be strained and clarified while it was very dilute.

This sugar does not partake of the medicinal properties of bark. It will be seen that the sap of the butternut yields about twice the amount of sugar that is afforded by the sugar maple, and the quality would be by most persons considered superior. In making sweet-meats and preserves, it would be by most housewives preferred to any other sugar. The experiment was undertaken too late to ascertain the amount of sap which one tree will yield; but I think it would be quite equal to that of the maple, of the same size, and growing in the same soil and situation.

The saccharine properties of the sap of this tree are common to the whole tribe of walnut, although they must differ considerably in the relative amounts in each species.

A Spy of the Revolution.

In the year 1776, when Gov. George Clinton resided in Albany, there came a stranger to his house, one cold winter's morning, soon after the family had breakfasted. He was welcomed by the household, and hospitably entertained. A breakfast was ordered, and the Governor, with his wife and daughter, who were sitting before the fire, employed in knitting, entered into conversation with him about the affairs of the country, which naturally led to the inquiry, what was his occupation? The caution and hesitancy with which the stranger replied, aroused the keen-sighted Clinton. He communicated his suspicion to his wife and daughter, who closely watched his every word and action. Unconscious of this, but finding that he had fallen among enemies, the stranger was seen to take something from his pocket and swallow it. Madam Clinton, with the ready tact of a woman of those troublesome times, went quietly into the kitchen, ordered hot coffee to be immediately prepared, and added to it a strong dose of tartar emetic. The stranger, delighted with the smoking beverage, partook freely of it, and Madam Clinton soon had the satisfaction of seeing it produce the desired effect. True to scripture, "out of his own mouth he was condemned;" a silver bullet appeared, which, upon examination, was unscrewed, and found to contain an important dispatch to Burgoyne. The spy was tried, convicted, and executed. The bullet is still preserved in the family.

An Ojibbeway Missionary.

During the sitting of the House of Commons on Saturday, a stranger was observed below the bar, to whom several members paid marked attention. On inquiry, we were informed it was the Rev. George Copway, otherwise Kah-ge-ga Gah Bowh, an American chieftain, who has visited England on his way to attend the Peace Congress at Frankfort. Twelve years ago he was the chief of a tribe of Ojibbeways, and a hunter in the woods; but having visited Illinois during the year 1838 and 1839, he was educated at the expense of some benevolent persons, and baptized, when he returned to his nation, determined to labor for the elevation of the Indian people. Having devised a scheme with that object, he is now seeking the means of carrying it out, and hopes to raise funds in Europe for the purpose. His project is, that the Indians of the northwest, consisting of about 100,000 souls, shall be granted for ever about 150 square miles of territory, between the falls of St. Anthony and the west of Minnesota, and by giving them a permanent settlement in this land, induce them to become farmers, and learn the arts of peace and civilization; and it is understood the American government is favorable to the scheme. He is a person of a commanding presence, and speaks the English language fluently. During his stay at Liverpool, at which port he arrived in the Niagara, two meetings were held, at which he detailed his plan, but what success is to attend the pecuniary part of it on this side of the Atlantic has not yet been determined.

Important Invention.

A new machine for extracting the juice from the sugar cane, an English invention, has been tried in the West Indies with entire success. The greatest amount of juice which the planters have been able to extract from one hundred pounds of cane, has never been over fifty-five pounds. One hundred pounds of cane, which had been cut for a month, was put into this machine, and in the short space of thirty-six seconds, seventy-eight pounds of the juice was produced. While the new mode of pressure extracts so completely the juice of the interior of the cane, its knots and rind are left completely untouched, which is an important advantage, as it is there the green wax and other objectionable matter is contained, and it is there that the old roller machine unfortunately pressed—a difficulty insurmountable in the roller system, yet effectually obviated by this new process.

The new machine consists of a square iron box, containing rollers, which are put in motion by steam. By the universal application of this invention, the sugar crops of the West Indies would be made one-third larger than now.

To Guard the Lungs while Threshing.

The following may be depended upon as a perfectly safe and convenient mode of guarding the lungs while threshing, as I have tested it for several years and never knew it to fail: Take a piece of fine sponge, about two inches thick in the center, so that it will fit the nose and the mouth, leaving it about three fourths of an inch thick over the end of the nose and mouth; moisten it well, and squeeze it out, so as to prevent its dripping; fasten on a string to the outer edge of the sponge, on each side of the face, and tie it back of the head, and one can work in a perfect smother for hours, I might say days, without any of those disagreeable sensations that are always experienced without such precaution. This will not obstruct the breath one tenth part so much as a piece of gauze will when drawn over the face. I would rather give one dollar per day for a sponge than to tend a threshing machine without it.

Death from the Bite of a Rat.—The London Times reports a case of death from the poison of the bite of a rat. John Williams, a clerk, having been present at a stable where a number of rats had been caught took one of them by the tail, whereupon it turned and bit him in the thumb. The wound bled very much, but it appeared trivial, and no danger was apprehended from it. On the second day following, the thumb and arm began to swell, and became much inflamed. Surgical aid was called, and such remedies were administered as the case seemed to require without affording relief, and on the next day the patient died.

Carrier Pigeons.—We hear from France of astonishing results obtained with carrier pigeons, by the Societies which in Belgium devote themselves to the production of this bird in perfection. They are trained so as to traverse the whole of France from one end to the other in less than a day. Recently a number were sent to Pampeluna in Spain to be let loose and return by flight to Brussels. On the 10th ult. the Pigeon-raising Society, called the Vissible of Brussels, let fly 63 pigeons from Lyons at 5 A. M. Prizes were given to the owners of the birds which should quickest reach Brussels. The first prize was won by Mr. J. Vanaelen, whose pigeon arrived 31 minutes past 2 o' clock P. M.; the second prize was won by a pigeon which came at 39 minutes past 2; the third at 20 minutes before 3. The distance from Lyons to Brussels by railroad is about 600 miles, which the first pigeon flew over in 7½ hours.

An Engineering Feat.—A Clever Engineering Feat has been performed at Thornes, Eng. A large chimney at Messrs. Mellin and Craven's dye-works had got out of the perpendicular, the top overhanging the base four or five feet, and the whole mass threatening to fall. Mr. Green, an engineer of Wakefield, undertook to remedy the defect. He cut out about four fifths of one course of bricks near the bottom, filling the cavity with a mixture of new lime and earth. The last brick was taken out during a heavy gale of wind. "As was expected, during the last operation the chimney began to move slowly, but still perceptibly; the new lime and earth gradually yielded to the immense pressure, and were removed, so that in three hours the open space of nearly four inches, and gone over at the top more than four feet to a perpendicular position."

A Family Poisoned by eating Mushrooms.—The family of Mr. Clute, living in he town of Castile, Wyoming County, N. Y., was poisoned some time since from eating mushrooms. They were gathered late in the afternoon, and after being cooked in the usual way, Mrs Clute and five of the children ate moderate quantities for supper. About 3 o'clock at night one of the children commenced vomiting, and within four hours all who had eaten were attacked with vomiting, which was speedily followed by purging. Medical assistance soon after was procured, but three children died from the effects, one in two days, another in three days, and the third in seven days after partaking of the mushroom. The rest of the family were in a critical condition for several days, but finally recovered.

The Pig and the Mocking Bird.—Mr. Gosse, in his History of the Birds of Jamaica, gives an amusing account of the mocking bird. The hogs are, it seems, the creatures that give him the most annoyance. They are ordinarily fed upon inferior oranges, the fruit being shaken down to them in the evening; hence thay acquire the habit of resorting to the orange tree to wait for the lucky windfall. The mocking bird feeling nettled at the intrusion, flies down and begins pecking away at the hog with all its might. Piggy, not understanding the matter, but pleased with the titillation, gently lies down and turns up his broad side to enjoy it. The poor bird gets into an agony of distress, pecks again, but increases the enjoyment of the luxurious intruder, and is at last compelled to give up in despair.

An Unfortunate Family.—Within the last twelve months, says the Cleveland Plaindealer, the family of Ex-Senator Norvell of Michigan has been nearly blotted out. The first calamity was the sudden disappearance of Mrs. Miller, (an only daughter, we believe,) under circumstances the most painful. Next the sudden death of Mr. Norvell on his return from a protracted search for his daughter. A few days since his son died at Saratoga. A short but sad history of a family which a few months ago saw nought in the future but the brightest promises of hope. It has been pretty satisfactorely ascertained that Mrs. Miller went to Europe instead of over the Falls.

Profligate Bees.—The most curious instance of a change of instinct is mentioned by Darwin. They bees carried over to Barbadoes and the Western Islands, ceased to lay up honey after the first year. The found the weather so fine, and the materials for honey so plentiful, that they quitted their grave, prudent, and mercantile character, became exceedingly profligate and debauched, ate up their capiial, resolved to work no more, and amused themselves by flying about the sugar-house, and stinging the negroes.

Saltpetre.—It is well known that saltpetre has the valuable property of removing the taint of turnip from butter, and a small quantity put into the churn with the cream renders the butter sweet and pleasant. In one case the butter from one cow was made twice a week; and to this quantity about a teaspoonful of saltpetre was added, and the butter-milk given to the pigs. It was observed that the pigs, (about two months old,) after drinking the butter-milk, were very uncomfortable, and, as little notice was taken of the affair, they got over it as best they might. However, it was not so the next day of churning; for both pigs were taken violently ill, vomiting and purging; and when all hopes of saving their lives were gone, they were put out of pain by killing.

Monument to Silas Wright.—The capstone of the monument to Silas Wright, late Governor of New-York, was laid at Weybridge, Vt., the birth place of Gov. W., on the 27th ult. The stone was laid by Maj. Gen. John Wool, who delivered a glowing eulogy before a large concourse of people, narrating the principal events in the life of the deceased statesman. Ex-President Van Buren made some appropriate remarks on the occasion. Francis P. Blair, Mrs. Wright, and other friends, were present. The monument is constructed out of grey marble of Vermont, and is the work of J. W. Jewitt. It has no other ornament but a profile of the deaceased, with his simple name below in raised letters.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year of this Seminary, for 1850 and '51, will commence the third Wednesday in August, and continue forty-four weeks, including a short recess between the terms, and one of ten days for the winter holidays.

The year is divided into three terms:—

The first, of 14 weeks, begins Wednesday, August 21st, and ends Wednesday, November 27th.

The second, of 15 weeks, begins Monday, December 2d, and ends Friday, March 14th.

The third, of 14 weeks, begins Tuesday, March 18th, and ends Tuesday, June 24th.

Board of Instruction.

GURDON EVANS, President,
And Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science.
Rev. JOSEPH W. MORTON,
Professor of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, and Moral and Intellectual Science.
Mrs. SUSANNA M. SPICER, Preceptress.
ADOLPH ROSENHAYN,
(Late of Friedrick Wilhelm College, Berlin,)
Teacher of German, Piano Forte, and Assistant in Greek and Latin.

Other competent Teachers will be employed as occasion may demand.

TEACHERS' CLASSES will be formed, as usual, at the beginning of the Fall and middle of the Winter Terms, and continue seven weeks.

In the Common Branches, classes will be formed at the commencement of each term; but in the higher, the interest of the student, as well as the welfare of the Institution, demand that a more systematic course of study be pursued.

In the Natural Sciences, Elementary Chemistry and Philosophy will be pursued during the Fall Term; Agricultural Chemistry, Astronomy, and Physiology during the Winter Term; Botany and Geology during the Summer Term.

Classes will be formed in Latin, French, and German, at the commencement of the Fall Term; in Hebrew, Greek, and Spanish, at the commencement of the Winter Term, and continue through the course of study.

In Mathematics, Geometry is studied in the Fall, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, and Astronomy, Surveying, Navigation, &c., in the Summer Term.

The course of instruction in Agriculture is thorougly scientific, embracing study and recitation in the best authors. Instruction is given in a well-furnished laboratory, in the analysis of soils, ashes of plants, manures, &c. and the modes of testing for their constituent elements. The attention of farmers who wish to give their sons a practical education is especially called to this department.

Board in private families, from $1 25 to $1 50. Many students board in clubs for 60 to 75 cents.

Tuition—to be settled upon entering school—from $3 00 to $5 00. Extras—For Drawing, $1 00; Oil Painting, $5 00; Chemical Experiments, $1 00; Writing, including stationery, 50 cents; Piano Forte, $8 00; Use of Instrument, $2 00; Agricultural Chemistry, including chemicals, apparatus, and fuel, (breakage extra,) $12 00.

It is very desirable that students should enter at the beginning of the term; yet they are received into classes already formed at any time.

For farther information, address Gurdon Evans, J. W. Morton, or Rev. J. R. Irish, President of the Corporation.

OUR FOREIGN MISSION.

Letters from our missionaries in China, dated as late as the 9th of May last, have been received, from which we proceed to make such extracts as we judge will be interesting to their friends and the friends of the mission. The following is from Bro. Wardner:—

We should be glad to cheer your hearts again with the news of conversions to Christianity; but we have no positive evidence that there have been any during the past year, farther than that another sister of Bro. Carpenter's deceased teacher (from accounts given by the family, and her own acknowledgement,) has commenced keeping the Sabbath. Those whom we believe to have passed from death to life, seem to be growing in grace, and in hope that they may eventually attain the statue of men in Christ Jesus. Their apparent steadfastness gives us much cause for rejoicing, and encourages us to hope that many more may taste the riches of God's love; for we believe He will suffer no souls to be lost that can in justice be saved. The sacrifice He has made to render salvation possible, was quite too precious to allow the thought, that He can look lightly upon any effort purposely put forth, or treat with indifference the feeblest petitions offered for that end.

My letter on this occasion must be chiefly made up of extracts from my journal.

Jan. 19. Met with missionaries to concert measures for getting the Scriptures printed, in which Shin shall be used for the appellative name of God. The difference of opinion among missionaries in regard to the name to be employed to represent God, is likely to prove a great detriment to their success. The Chinese say, we are regarded as worshiping different gods, and in regard to some who have several times changed the name, they are inquiring, Why it is that they change their gods so often?

One of our neighbors called with a niece of her's, (about 14 years of age,) whom she wished to sell to me for 16 dollars, because (she said) her friends were too poor to support her. I endeavored to show her the iniquity of making chattels of her fellow-beings, and to devise for her a better expedient. A short time after, I preached to a full house from the words, "Love thy neighbor as thyself," and dwelt at considerable length upon this point. This practice is not uncommon in China. I am told, that opium smokers frequently, after their funds are expended, sell their wives and children in order to gratify their appetites, and then beg in the streets, spending what they get for this drug, till they actually starve to death. The consumption of opium seems to be on the increase, as is shown by the increased quantity brought to this port.

23d. Sent copies of Mr. Morton's Circular to all the missionaries in Shanghai; having previously sent to those at Hong Kong and Canton, and subsequently to those at Ningpo.

29th. Received letters from home informing us that a mission to Hayti is determined upon, which caused us to clasp our hands for joy.

Feb 2d. In conversation with a missionary, allusion being made to the occurrence of last fall, he remarked that before seeing the books (from which those extracts sent you were taken) he, and others of his mission, had no idea how much cause we had for complaint in regard to what missionaries had done.

6th. Learned by a missionary, that the Catholics have given their Chinese converts a dispensation allowing them to labor on Sundays, as on other days, and yet without sin. Why should not all who receive the Sunday Sabbath at their hands, avail themselves of this accommodating dispensation? Those who have power to make a day holy, have power also to make it common.

15th. Met three beggars on the city wall, having a child, whom they earnestly begged me to accept; for, they said, he must starve, unless I did. I expressed my sympathy for the child, but told them that my circumstances would not allow me to take him. Giving the father what few cash I had, he turned away with a sad countenance to think his little son was doomed to such a fate.

18th. Fell in company with a Chinaman on the wall, whose attention I called to some coffins near by, and entered into the following conversation:—

Ques.—Where are the souls of those dead men?

Ans.—If they lived wicked lives, they are now in hell.

Q—Is there any living man without sin?

A—All Shanghai men are sinners.

Q—If they are sinners, is there any way by which they can escape hell?

A—None.

I then related the story of the cross, telling him, there was one way by which men might escape the penalty of sin, and obtain everlasting life.

25th. Received a call from a Chinese teacher. After conversing a while about the Bible and its doctrine, allusion was made to the works of Confucius, which I was reading, when he, with a very self complacent air, recommended that those who came to teach the doctrine of the Bible to the Chinese, should make themselves familiar with the doctrines of Confucius, and teach them to their own countrymen; for, he said, it was a doctrine that must endure to all ages—nations would cease to be, before they would come to naught. I replied, that Confucius had taught many good things, but his teachings were all confined to the things of this life. But the Bible not only taught us these things, but told us also of a future world, and the way of everlasting life, which Confucius did not profess to know any thing about; to which he gave a Chinaman's assent and made no reply.

March 4th. Learned that people in the country by reason of the famine, are tearing down their houses, and selling the materials to buy food.

7th. Met, by invitation, the translating committee, and made a few suggestions concerning a version of the Ten Commandments, which they had been preparing with the view of getting one that all could use, and thus securing unanimity; but found them unyielding upon those points upon which we suggested amendments, viz:—

1st. The retention in the second commandment of the term nyur seang, which the Chinese generally (whom we have consulted) say, includes only graven and molten images.

2d. The retention in the third commandment of an expression representing the breach of it as an unpardonable sin.

3d. In the fourth commandment, instead of using the imperative form of expression, "Remember the Sabbath-day," saying simply, "The Sabbath-day is a holy day." Also the omission of the definite article in speaking of the seventh day, and the omission of the pronoun "thou" in the enumeration of those who were to observe it.

4th. The omission of the word neighbor in the ninth commandment.

None of the missionaries have adopted this version, that I know of, except those of the London Society, who were the principal framers of it.

As a specimen of Chinese duplicity, I will relate the following circumstance:—On Sabbath morning, the 16th, in the time of our prayer meeting in Chinese, the cripple of whom I have formerly written, came in, and after meeting attempted to introduce to me a matter of business. I told him, that it was not my practice to transact worldly business on the Sabbath, and turned the conversation upon the subject of religion. He, as usual, made loud pretensions to discipleship. After a little, I asked him if he kept the Sabbath. "O yes," said he, "I never labor on that day." Ques.—Why, then did you come to transact business with me to-day? Ans.—I was not aware that to-day was the Sabbath. Q—If you do not know when the Sabbath occurs, how can you observe it? A—I used to know when it occurred, but when I went home last fall, into the country, I forgot it. But, said I God commands you to remember the Sabbath, and you ought not to have been so careless. You have not only forgotten the Sabbath, but have desecrated time which you are commanded to keep holy, and you have also told me a falsehood in trying to cover your sin. These things are all known to Him before whom you must soon stand in judgment; and unless you repent there is no hope for you. He promised that he would not be guilty of the like again, and that he would attend our meetings.

On the 18th he called again to inform me, as he said, that a Chinaman from the country was trying to sell his wife to a foreign merchant, and to know what could be done [illegible] it. After disposing of that matter, I catechised him awhile, and having reminded [illegible] of his promise, he left. The next Sabbath (23d) he came again, in company with three others; and, to assure me that he had kept the days of the week carefully, said, in a very exulting air, that it was sixth day. After setting him right, I commenced conversation on another subject, and after a little, asked if he had been at work that day. "O no," said he, "to-day is the Sabbath; I don't work on the Sabbath." I then reminded him of his calling it sixth day, and asked an explanation. But he immediately repeated the first and second commandments, and went on to explain them to his associates with a skill well becoming a seen-sang. I waited till he got through, and then repeated my question, which he answered by repeating the fifth commandment, accompanying it with an elaborate explanation; and was going on with the others in the same way, when I requested him to wait till we disposed of the first question. Finding that he could no longer evade me, he listened to what I had to say, but evinced no little disquietude of feeling, for I endeavored, in a mild way, to convince him that his lion-skin did not cover his ears.

Such is a specimen of Chinese character in the aggregate, though many are more shrewd in concealing their hypocrisy. Hence you see that no small degree of wisdom and prudence are necessary to labor successfully among them. We can but repeat our request, that fervent prayer be offered continually to the great Husbandman, that He will send the early and latter rains, and cause the seed that is now being sown to bring forth a bountiful harvest.

24th. Visited the burying ground connected with the Zong-zen-daung (hall of universal benevolence,) just opposite to us, where I counted 1120 fresh graves, which have been made, probably, within six or eight months; including only those who die friendless, and are buried at the expense of that corporation.

26th. Met at Mr. Milne's to elect delegates for translating the Old Testament.

Order of the Meeting.

First—Organized ourselves into a body styled "The Shanghai Station of Protestant Missionaries."

Second—Resolved that the committee about to be appointed shall transmit copies of each book to the several stations for examination, to be returned within six months with such suggestions as may be thought proper, which shall then be submitted to the general committee for final decision.

Third—Resolved, that three delegates be appointed at this station; who, after balloting, proved to be Dr. Medhurst, Dr. Boone, and Mr. Shuck.

Fourth—Resolved, that the translation be made in a plain, simple style, which can be read and understood by men of moderate capacity.

30th. Proclaimed the gospel to several who called during the day, and in the evening preached to a full house.

April 2d. Beggars amounting to several thousands, chiefly from abroad, were assembled in the common parade ground south of the city, where each grown person received 180 cash, and each child 90, from the authorities, and were required to return to their own homes. They had flocked in from all quarters, to such an extent as to be very troublesome to merchants and shop-keepers.

9th. Went with Mrs. W. and child on the city wall, where a congregation drawn by curiosity were soon assembled. To introduce conversation I pointed to a temple not far off, and asked to what deity it was devoted.

Ans.—To the god of the river.

Ques.—Are there any images in it?

A—Yes.

Q—Of what use are they?

A—To burn incense to, and worship.

Q—Have they power to preserve life, and to confer favors?

A—Yes.

Q—Do they possess souls?

A—Yes.

Q—What proof have you?

A—They bear the likeness of men.

Q—Has my cane any soul?

A—No! (with a laugh.)

Q—Suppose I take my knife, and carve out the likeness of a man on it, would it have a soul then?

(A laugh, with a shaking of the head.)

Q—If you think my cane with the likeness of a man on it has no soul, what evidence have you that those images have?

No reply.

The question was repeated.

A—You cannot understand my explanation, if I give it.

I told him, if he had any to give, I could understand it. While he was hesitating, another who stood by said, that if people believed those images had souls, they had souls.

Then, said I, suppose I believe that my cane has a soul, will it therefore have one? Has man the power to create souls?

He laughed, and made no reply.

But, continued I, where is your proof that those images have souls, any more than my cane? You never see them move, nor hear them speak, nor see them show any signs of consciousness. They have the organs of sight, hearing, speech and motion [represented upon them,] but they are nothing but wood or earth. Man possesses a soul, and it is by reason of this that he is endowed with those powers, as is evident from the fact that as soon as the body is left without a soul, it has no more power or consciousness. The God who created all things, whom alone men ought to worship, is very different from those idols. He sees, and knows all that we do, say, or think; and it was by Him that all things came into existence. The gods of the Chinese are many; the true God is but one, the Father of us all. As a child is bound to honor and obey his earthly father, so we are bound to honor and obey our heavenly Father. I then went on to show the many proofs of His greatness and mercy, and the means He has provided for man's salvation, and the condition upon which it is offered, &c. But some, seeming not to relish my remarks very well, attempted to turn the subject (an art in which they frequently show much skill) by pointing to some coffins near by, and asking how the outside people buried their dead. I answered the question, and then went on to explain the doctrine of the resurrection. It was a strange idea to them; some looked serious, and others laughed. When I had held them as long as I thought profitable, I distributed a few cash among some who looked needy, and left.

12th. Saw the body of a beggar lying in the street, which had been clothed in blue, and a pile of ghost money was burning at its feet preparatory to its burial. The next day, a China woman called, to whom I related the circumstance, and asked why they burnt the ghost money on such occasions. She said, that as men while living were obliged to use money to procure the necessaries of life, so it was with them after death. I asked her, if people while living secured food and clothes for the benefit of their souls, or their bodies. Ans.—For their bodies. Ques.—Then when these bodies die and decay, what farther use is there for such things? If the soul needs none of these things during life, how can it after death? She acknowledged that the practice was a foolish one, and I then endeavored to show her, that the soul needed a different kind of sustenance, which our heavenly Father has graciously provided; and that He has pointed out the way by which it can be obtained. Examples like the foregoing illustrate the real character and condition of the people of this nation.

18th. Learn that the new Emperor has forbidden the use of opium among his subjects; but it is very doubtful whether this law will be heeded.

OUR ROBIN.

BY REV. GEORGE DUFFIELD, JR.

Every morn upon our pear tree,
On the very topmost limb,
Comes, at early dawn, a red-breast—
Carols he a glorious hymn!

Far and wide around it soundeth
Till he thinks its echoes clear,
Not alone the distant village,
But the rising sun can hear!

Through the crevice of the casement
All his merry tricks I spy—
Ceremony like a curtain,
Drawn up to the very sky!

Silent through the day he goeth,
Filled with many a petty care;
On a tree, amid the clover,
He is almost everywhere.

Evening comes, and when the sunset
Lightens up the gorgeous West,
Joyous notes again he poureth,
Like a singer of the blest.

Not ashamed of such a teacher,
When I hear him, oft I say,
Lord, for such a heart to praise thee,
Every night and every day!

He that kills my merry robin,
(God forgivie him for his sin,)
Kills a member of my housihold,
And my door ne'er enters in.

THE SECRET OF HOWARD'S BENEVOLENCE.

Howard's reflections while on a trip to Italy for his health show the secret of his perseverance in the great mission to which he devoted his life:—

Turin, Nov. 30, 1769.—My return without seeing the southern part of Italy, was on much deliberation,—as I feared a misimprovement of a talent spent for mere curiosity, at the loss of many Sabbaths, and as many donations must be suspended for my pleasure—which would have been, as I hope, contrary to the general conduct of my life; and which, on a retrospective view on a death-bed, would cause pain, as unbecoming a disciple of Christ—whose mind should be formed in my soul. These thoughts, with distance from my dear boy, determines me to check my curiosity and be on the return. Oh! why should vanity and folly—pictures and baubles—or even the stupendous mountains, beautiful hills, or rich valleys, which ere long will be consumed, engross the thoughts of a candidate for an everlasting kingdom! * * Look forward, my soul! How low, how mean, how little is everything but what has a view to that glorious world of light, life, and love!

Hague, Sunday evening, Feb. 11, 1770—I would record the goodness of God to the unworthiest of his creatures. For some days past I have been in an habitual serious frame—relenting for my sin and folly—solemnly surrendering myself and babe to Him—and begging the conduct of his Holy Spirit. I hope for a more tender conscience, by greater fear of offending God—a temper more abstracted from this world—more resigned, to death or life—a thirsting for union and communion with God. O the wonders of redeeming love! Some faint hope have even I—through redeeming mercy—that the full atoning sacrifice shall ere long be made. O shout! my soul—grace, grace! free, sovereign, rich and unbounded grace. Not I, not I, an ill-deserving, hell-deserving creature—but where sin abounds I trust grace superabounds—even I have still some hope—what joy in that hope!—that nothing shall separate my soul from the love of God in Christ. My soul! as such a frame is thy delight, pray frequently and fervently to the Father of Spirits to bless his Word and thy retired moments to thy serious conduct in life. My soul! let not the interests of a moment engross thy thoughts, or be preferred to thine eternal interests. Look forward to that glory which will be revealed to those who are faithful unto death.

PREACHING POLITICS.

The following extract is from a sermon which was preached in the State of Maine, in reference to the Mexican War. The principles which are avowed and the spirit that is exhibited, are in evident accordance with the example of the apostles, when an attempt was made to awaken the cry of Political Preaching as an apology for the destruction of their liberty:—

"Some think," said the preacher, "that this matter of the war ought not to be touched in the pulpit. I do not agree with them. I think that the question of wars and fighting was a question of Christian morality some time previous to its becoming a question of American politics. My right to it is prior to that of the politician, and I shall not waive my right. Must the pulpit abandon one of its legitimate subjects, because you choose to carry it to the polls? Why, one of these days some Administration, by accident or design, for policy or by a blunder, may take ground that the Christian Religion ought to be suppressed.

"Instantly a great party—which ever party happens to be in power—will carry the question to the polls—so strong is the instinct of every party allegiance; and then, forsooth, the pulpit must be silent because it is a political question! My pulpit will not be silent on moral questions, then or now—as long as I have the faculty of moral discrimination. I speak against the war to-day because I set to myself the task of pleading the cause of the poor, who will have to bear the burden ultimately."

The Forsaken of God.—Men often mourn that they have been abandoned by the Holy Spirit. But their grief indicates that they have not been thus abandoned. Those who are really forsaken of Him, are usually indifferent to their loss. They are reckless and giddy, and know not until the flood comes. The unconcerned transgressor has reason to tremble, lest he be given up of God. The convicted, desponding, inquiring sinner has a sign in his very fears, that the Divine Spirit is still operating on his heart. Let this disconsolate transgressor relapse into security, and his reason for painful apprehension returns. It is a proverb, "they who weep over errors are not formed for crime." Therfore there is danger in proportion to the feeling of security. Where there is the most alarm, there is the least occasion for it. [Congregationalist.

SKETCH OF REV. WILLIAM JAY.

Few men stand more prominenently before the world than this distinguished preacher. Perhaps of no man have more sketches been presented, both in his own and other countries. Within a few months past, more than one able sketch was given to the readers of The Christian Times, while it bore the title of The Christian Alliance, from the pen of an English correspondent. Our present object is simply to give, as supplementaly to those papers, a few anecdotes of this excellent man, tending to the illustration of his character. It will be remembered that our friend is now about eighty, and that he has occupied the same pulpit not less than sixty years.

A few years since, Mr. Jay was invited to preach before the Baptist Missionary Society in London, with several of the founders of which he was well acquainted. The sermon was a fine illustration of piety and of fraternal love. He beautifully sketched the origin of the missionary spirit, and the difficulties it had to encounter. He stated that he himself, then a comparative youth, had some doubts as to whether the time was come for the evangelization of the earth, and at length he determined to call and converse on the subject with the venerable John Newton. The aged apostolic clergymen received his young brother with ardent affection. and requested him to detail the peculiar difficulties which oppressed his mind. Mr. Jay did this at considerable length, especially insisting on the manifold obstacles which idolatry and human depravity in all their various forms presented to the extension of the Gospel. When he had ceased, the venerable clergyman slowly laid down his pipe, and gathering up his form to an erect posture, and looking his junior brother full in the face, said in a most emphatic tone, "My brother, I have never doubted the power of God to convert the heathen world since he converted me!" "Never from that period," said the preacher, "have I had a doubt on the subject. Facts, too, have proved the fulfillment of Divine prophecies, and have gone so far to accomplish the Divine oath."

In a sermon at Surrey Chapel, London, a few years since, Mr. Jay illustrated his views of bigotry among the different branches of the household of faith, by the following fact: "Some time ago a countryman said to me, 'I was exceedingly terrified, sir, this morning; I was going down a lonely place, and I thought I saw at a distance a large monster; it seemed in motion, but I could not discern the form of it. I did not like to turn back, yet my heart beat; and the more I looked, the more I feared; but as we approached each other, I saw it was only a man; and who do you think, sir, it was?' 'I know not.' 'Oh! it was my brother John?' Ah, said I to myself, passing away from him, as he added that it was early in the morning and very foggy,—ah, how often in a lonely place, and in a foggy atmoshpere, has brother John been taken for a foe! Only approach nearer to each other and see clearer, and you will find in numberless instances, what you have dreaded as a monster was a brother—and your own brother."

Many of our readers have heard of the notorious William Huntington, a London minister of Antinomian views, whose hand, like that of Ishmael, was against every man and every man's hand against him. In one of his annual visits to London Mr. Jay fell into the company of one of Huntington's hearers, who was exceedingly anxious to obtain his opinion of his pastor. Mr. Jay evaded the question again and again, well knowing that whatever he said would be carried to Huntington, and furnish an opportunity for pulpit abuse. At length, being most uncomfortably pressed for an opinion, and finding it impossible to shake off the inquirer, he said, "Well sir, I remember some time since, reading in an old book, 'The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance;' now, sir, if Mr. Huntingdon has these fruits, he is a very good man."

Mr. Jay can be kindly severe in administering reproof. Some years ago, a minister of his own denomination, settled in a distant watering-place, had a burning desire to become a doctor of divinity. He at length succeeded in obtaining from a worthless Continental University the coveted honors for about £15, or little more than $70. His vanity led him forthwith to take a tour through the land to receive the congratulations of his friends; and coming to Bath he called on Jay. The servant, who answered his knock at the door, took his name to Mr. Jay in his study—"The Rev. Dr. C——." "Dr. C., Mary," placing his fingers in his hair, "I do not know any such man;—well, tell Doctor C. to come in." The new doctor was ushered into the study, Jay looking most earnestly at him as he entered, "Ah C., and Doctor C. too! Well, now, sit down, and tell me what this affair cost you." "Cost! Mr. Jay, cost." "Yes, to be sure, how could you get it without?" A part of the truth had now to be told, and Mr. Jay closed by saying, "Ah, C., why did you not tell me that you wanted a title? Why, now, there are two or three diplomas lying on the shelf there, and had I known you might had one of them freely, and your fifteen pounds would have added somewhat to the comforts of your family." Poor Dr. C. to the day of his death felt the severity of the reproof.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. Jay often manifests wit as well as wisdom, and, though, "aged," still enjoys a joke. A few years ago, when the Irving mania raged in England, Mr. Jay was one morning called out of his study to visit a stranger, who called himself an "angel of the church." The man wore a dismal countenance, rusty-black pantaloons, vest and coat, and a somewhat soiled white cravat. The divine received the "angel" with great courtesy, and inquired his business. "I am an Angel of the Church," said the man. "Of what Church?" inquired Mr. Jay. "Of the Irvingite church at Bristol," was the reply. "Indeed, sir, will you kindly take off your coat," said the venerable minister. This was immediately done, and Mr. Jay began very quietly and carefully to examine his shoulder-bones, and to feel around them. "What are you looking for?" inquired the angel. "I was looking for your wings," replied his friend. The poor man as soon as possible made his escape. A pleasant fact is told of Mr. Jay, in connection with the late celebrated Andrew Fuller. They were once riding together late on a summer's evening when their attention was arrested by the appearance and screeching of an owl. Fuller, who seldom indulged in pleasantry, for once was jocose, and asked, "What bird is that; is it a Jay?" "No," replied his friend, "it's Fuller in the head, Fuller in the body, and Fuller all over." Fuller smiled, but had nothing further to say.

We will here give another illustration of his wit which we heard from his own lips more than thirty years ago. He delivered in London a valuable missionary sermon on the value of life, which he was requested to print. The printer sent him the first proof for correction, which, of course, contained the text, in which a most singular mistake occurred. Said text was from the first chapter of Job: "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life." The printer's blunder consisted in substituting a w for the l in the last word, which of course presented a very different sense from the original text. "Was it not strange, sir," said he to us, that the man could have made such a mistake in so short a text? I wonder that I happened to read it." "Yes, sir, it was a curious blunder, but of course you corrected it?" "Oh, dear, no sir; I simply underscored the word "wife," and wrote in the margin, "N. B. This depends upon circumstances." B.

THE DROWNING CHILD.

A family, the father, mother, and three children, the youngest between two and three years old, had been making a visit, and were returning to the city of New York by one of the Williamsburg ferry boats, toward evening, on the fourth of July. They were evidently in humble life, and had a rare treat in the pleasure of a holiday, dressed in their best, and flushed with the enjoyment of health.

They were sitting in the stern of the boat, and near the railing; the younger children playing near the parents, frolicksome as kittens. It was a picture pleasing to look on, and it made one's heart glad and grateful to see a group so joyful in each other, and evidently as blest among themselves as if they had been born to wealth.

It was a very pleasant day, and a pleasant hour of the day. A few minutes more would bring them home, and the children, tired with the day's play, would be asleep. Suddenly the youngest, frolicking on the floor rolled under the railing, and in an instant was overboard. Many were looking on, but it was so sudden and unexpected, that no one could arrest it. A shout was raised for the boat to be stopped, but before that could be done the father leaped over into the deep, and struck out manfully in search of his drowning child. The mother had shrieked with agony as her child had gone, and now that her husband was also overboard, her anguish was terrible to behold. A lady strove to console her; gathered the other children about her, and bade her trust in God and hope for the best. The father proved to be a noble swimmer, but the water was so agitated by the motion of the boat that he could see nothing of his child, and for some minutes he beat about to no purpose. Small boats put out from the shore, and one of them picked him up when he was nearly exhausted, and he was brought to the steamer and lifted on board. Here was a fresh scene of distress, when the father and mother met again. He had returned from the watery grave himself; but their child, their pet lamb, was lost. As he was raised on deck, the mother cried, "The child, the child, where is it?" He looked at her, and with a thoughtfulness and beauty not to be expected in such a moment, answered gently, "Mary, God has it."

The boat still lingered, and the passengers were straining their eyes into the distance, hoping that one of the boats might yet rescue the child. It had now been half an hour in the water. Presently a shout went up, and the word was passed along that the child was found. It was picked up by one of the many in search, and a solitary oarsman rowed on with his precious charge. As he came alongside, the hardy old tar, with a tenderness of feeling that did him honor, covered the face of the child. He could not bear to shock the parents with the sudden sight of their dead child! Yes, it was dead. It was taken on board, and the gentle lady who had sought to comfort the mother in her anguish, took the little one and opened its dress and laid her hand on its heart, but it was still. All the means that could be applied were of no avail to restore the spirit that had fled.

What a change was here! The boat reached its wharf, and the family, a mourning, wretched family, went off with their dead child to their dreary home. The papers, the next morning, mentioned, under the head of accidents, that a child was drowned from one of the ferry boats yesterday; but how little of the sorrow of that disaster is told in such a line! How much sorrow there is in this world, that we know nothing of! [Presbyterian.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 19, 1850.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

We have just returned from our Anniversaries at Alfred. The occasion was most refreshing, and we think we are not mistaken in saying that the Lord was with us. No doubt it will long be remembered by the numerous friends who were in attendance from different parts of the denomination. Of one thing we must take notice, and that is, that from the very first the congregation was good. The people of the place, instead of leaving us almost alone till Sabbath-day, and in the mean time attending to their usual business, as has too often been the case at our Anniversaries, turned out and filled the house from the beginning. This was right. We thank them for it, and we are confident that, whatever inconvenience they subjected themselves to in order to accomplish it, they were more than recompensed by the pleasure which the meetings afforded them. We hope that, next year, the people of Brookfield will do as well. By the way, if there was always some extra effort made by the pastor of the church where the Anniversaries are held, to induce the people to turn out, by informing them, a while beforehand, of the nature and objects of the several meetings, and assuring them of the exceedingly interesting character of the Reports that were to be read, and the addresses to be made, we should not be left with such slim audiences as we have sometimes been. We can assure our people, that the Annual Report of the Missionary Board is usually more interesting than any sermon. So also of the Report of the Board of Directors of the Tract Society. The facts which these Reports embody are, many of them, of an interesting and soul-stirring character, and the reading of them brings tears from many eyes. We trust that our brethren and sisters will not, hereafter, be so slow to learn, that the proceedings of our Societies are something more than dry business transactions, in which none can feel any interest except those who manage them. But to the meetings.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society.

On Fifth-day, the 12th inst., the Missionary Society convened in the meeting-house of the 1st Church in Alfred. The attendance of delegates was unusually large. About forty went up by the Erie Railroad, besides those who were there from all other directions.

The opening discourse, by Bro. W. B. Maxson, from Matt. 6: 10, was excellent and well-timed. We took no notes, and our memory does not enable us to give anything like an abstract of it; but we think it must have left a salutary impression upon the hearers.

The Treasurer's Report, which was read soon after the opening of the meeting for business, shows that there was a balance in the Treasury, at the last Anniversary, of $455 18, which, with $1594 07 received since, makes $2049 25 placed at the disposal of the Board during the year for general missionary purposes. The expenses of the mission in China and in the western part of our own country have been $1355 46. There has been received on the subscriptions to build a Chapel in Shanghai $1530, of which $978 66 has been forwarded to our missionary brethren for the purpose of enabling them to purchase a suitable site. There is now a balance in the Treasury for general missionary purposes of $693 79; for the Chapel $551 34.

The Annual Report of the Executive Board was a document of greater length than any which has been presented on former occasions, and occupied more than an hour in reading. Of its merits as a composition it may not become us to speak particularly. It will be published soon, and every one will have the opportunity of perusing it. It embraced a notice of our missionary operations in the great West, and quite a full history of the doings of our missionaries in China during the past year, showing that God has smiled on our efforts, and that we have abundant encouragement to go forward.

On the motion to adopt and print the Report, spirited addresses were made by several of the brethren. Bro. Griswold, of Mystic, Conn., said that he had never, in the most vigorous exercise of his faith, expected to hear a report so full of encouragement as that which had been read; and he called attention to numerous facts connected with the mission, and alluded to in the report, to show what occasion there was for gratitude to God. Bro. A. B. Burdick wanted the report printed, that he might read it to the people of his charge, and that it might be perused by every member of the denomination; and he gave his reasons for believing, that it would have a most powerful effect in arousing the people to a sense of their duty, and encouraging them faithfully to discharge it. James R. Irish wished the congregation to understand, that in voting for the adoption of the report, they virtually pledged themselves to carry out the plans it proposed—to enlarge operations in China, where so many evidences of God's presence have been given—to meet the claims of the Western field, teeming with its vast and rapidly increasing population of those ignorant of the way of salvation through Jesus Christ—to go into the missionary field personally in case it shall appear that our services are needed, or to give to the work our sons and our daughters if their labors are needed. Eli S. Bailey alluded with much feeling to the fact that the lives of the missionaries and members of the Board had all been preserved, and he endeavored to impress the minds of those present with the idea that God had done this for his mercy and his truth's sake, rather than for any worth in us, and that the circumstance ought to make us grateful, humble, and ready to devote ourelves more earnestly to the good work.

Eld. Wm. M. Jones, from Hayti, remarked upon his own peculiar position, and the deep satisfaction it had given him to be present and listen to the reading of the report. For nearly five years he had been engaged in labors for the benefit of Hayti. About two years ago he established himself at Port-de-Paix, some sixty miles from any other missionary station; and six months ago he was looking forward to the present anniversary with hope that one of its results would be the early sailing of a missionary to be his coadjutor. But he had been recalled. In Hayti, ignorance and depravity of the worst kind, and even cannibalism, prevail; the people are therefore in perishing need of religious instruction and influence. But in that country, notwithstanding the liberality of its Constitution, the Government has of late taken ground hostile to Protestant missions. The notion seems to prevail, that all foreigners, and Protestant mission aries, are opposed to the Government; and already the missionaries have been instructed to confine their labors to the cities, and not go into the country. It is true that no missionaries have yet been driven from Hayti; but if things go on for a while to come as they have for some time past, that result is to be feared. He was unable to say what was the duty of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination respecting Hayti, but he could not recommend them to occupy that field at present. Mr. Jones then spoke of his pain at leaving Hayti, a place where he had suffered much, but where he had seen much to encourage him. It was evident from the manner in which he spoke, that Mr. Jones had lost none of his interest in the missionary work, although at present called away from it.

After prayer by Eld. A. A. F. Randolph, the report was adopted and ordered printed.

The following resolution was presented by Thomas B. Brown, and adopted, after remarks by the mover and by Eli S. Bailey:—

Resolved, That the churches of our denomination be requested to observe Frst-day, the 3d of November next, as a day of humiliation, fasting and prayer, that the blessing of God may attend our missionary operations.

The following resolutions were also adopted:—

Resolved, That it is desirable to have the Annual Report of the Executive Board read publicly to the different churches of the denomination as early as practicable.

Resolved, That in the death of Bro. Maxson Green, and his wife Sister Lydia Green, two of the life members of this Society, we feel that we have lost two valuable fellow-laborers in our enterprise, and that we are by this providence called to renewed prayer that their mantle may fall upon many that yet remain.

The delegates appointed at the last Anniversary of this Society to attend the annual meeting of the Baptist Free Mission Society, having reported that they did not attend, it was resolved that W. B. Maxson and J. R. Irish be our delegates to attend the next meeting of that Society, and also that any ministering brother who may attend be authorized to represent this Society.

After the election of officers, and the transaction of some other routine business, the Society adjourned, to meet again with the 1st Church in Brookfield on Fifth-day preceding the second Sabbath in Sept. 1851.

The American Sabbath Tract Society.

The Seventh Annual Meeting of the American Sabbath Tract Society was held at Alfred, on Sixth-day, Sept. 13.

After the usual religious exercises of prayer and singing, the Constitution was read, and Committees were appointed to nominate Officers and audit the Treasurer's Account.

The Report of the Treasurer was then presented and read. It shows an increase in the receipts of the Society, although they have not reached the sum proposed at the last Anniversary, There was in hand at that time $72 40; there has been received since $667 94; making the available funds of the Society during the year $740 33. The expenses have been $665 57, leaving a balance of $174 77 in the Treasury.

The Annual Report of the Executive Board was read by the Corresponding Secretary. It states that Eld. Eli S. Bailey has served the Society more than half the year as traveling agent and lecturer, during which time he has visited nearly all of our churches in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, preaching for them, explaining to them the plans of the Board, and receiving their contributions. A letter, stating the results of his agency, and the conclusions to which his observation has led him, is embodied in this report. Eld. Bailey has also aided in getting up, and has attended, two Sabbath Conventions—one at Peterboro and one at Berlin, N. Y.; the Resolutions and Address adopted at these Conventions, form a part of the report. Eld. J. W. Morton, late a missionary to Hayti from the Reformed Presbyterian Church of the United States, has also served the Society as a lecturer, and the report embraces extracts from his journal. The report concludes with a statement of what has been done in the way of distributing tracts gratuitously, publishing new tracts, &c.

Bro. ALFRED B. BURDICK, of R. I., moved the adoption of the Report, and said that he wished it adopted for several reasons. In the first place, there had been evinced by the denomination, during the past year, a very considerable increase of liberality towards the enterprise—an encouraging fact which ought to be spread before the people. In the second place, the Traveling Agent's letter, which was embodied in the Report, was a document every one ought to read. And in the third place, he wished every body to be put in possession of the resolutions adopted by the Sabbath Conventions at Peterboro and Berlin, which the Report had embodied in permanent form. Especially did he wish every body to read the Address of the Peterboro Convention to the Christian Public, which he regarded as one of the most modest and pungent appeals in behalf of the Bible Sabbath he had ever seen, ably refuting the stale arguments which are perpetually adduced for a human tradition. He considered, too, that the Report showed that there was ample opportunity for labor, and that tracts were eagerly called for, and extensively read. He related an interesting incident of his scattering a parcel of Sabbath tracts in the cars of the Camden and Amboy Railroad, as he was traveling from New York to Philadelphia last spring, showing the eagerness of people to obtain them, and the animated discussions to which they gave rise.

Bro. JAMES H. COCHRAN, of Berlin, N. Y., followed Bro. B. with some interesting remarks, of which our notes are too meagre to make any report.

Bro. ELI S. BAILEY did not rise to address the Society from any pride of opinion. All he wished was, that the truth might prevail. The Report embodied his letter as Traveling Agent, in which he had given his views as to the utility of auxiliary societies. He thought that he had possessed the means of knowing as much on this point as any other man. He did not approve of the formation of auxiliary societies. There had been quite a number formed, and most of them had gone down. An important object which he had aimed at was to impress upon the churches the importance of entering into such measures as would promote most effectually the interests of the cause. It was not merely to collect funds. He considered the business of soliciting funds, for the most part, a thankless business, though, for himself, he had generally been met with great kindness. Where he had not been favored with the opportunity of addressing the churches, he had labored with the pastors and principal or leading men, and generally with good success. He thought that where the churches had failed to do their duty, it would be found that the fault lay with the pastors or leading brethren, not with the people. As for agencies for the collection of funds, as a general thing, he was opposed to them. He could collect in his own church more than any agent.

Bro. WM. M. JONES addressed the Society. He felt that we were engaged in a solemn business. We were called to consider a subject that separates us from all the rest of the Christian world. Our peculiarity made us a spectacle to angels and men, and it was a solemn thought. Nevertheless, it was God's institution we were called to keep and defend. The Sabbath was God's own sanctified day. At the close of creation God rested on the seventh day, and put the seal of his own approbation upon it; so that notwithstanding men have sought out many inventions, they have not been able to efface this institution from the word of God, and from the consciences of men. Those of us who have been brought over from other denominations, feel that a great work has been done for us—that a mighty change has been wrought in us. We feel as if we had experienced a new conversion. It has brought us into closer fellowship with the God of truth, and we have more tender feelings than we had. We feel more tenderly towards our old brethren than formerly. We feel anxious for their illumination and conversion to this truth. And what means shall we employ for their conversion, if not the dissemination of tracts? We feel anxious for our Baptist brethren. In becoming Seventh-day Baptists, we have not abandoned the great Baptist principle, that the Bible alone is to be our guide in all matters of faith and practice. We have only reduced that rule more rigidly to practice. When in Hayti, he could feel the pulse of a part of the Baptist denomination, just how it beat. What course would be best to take with the great mass, he was not exactly prepared to say. He knew that some of them only wanted the truth to be brought to bear upon them a little more powerfully; they were already on the fence. Some of them made most encouraging admissions. Bro. J. then alluded to the case of Bro. J. W. Morton, and showed how much good tracts had done for him. Bro. M. had made a regular onset upon Bro. J. to win him back to the observance of the first day of the week, honestly supposing that he had been entangled in a very great error. The controversy was sharp and strong, and at the close of the interview, Bro. M. seemed more determined. Bro. J. said he left tracts with Bro. M., but went home with a heavy heart to pour out his soul before God. The next Sixth-day, Bro. M. came to him with different feelings, and wanted more tracts. He was furnished, and you all know the result. Had I been left to argue the point with him, single handed and alone, said Mr. Jones, I know not how it would have turned out. But I gave him tracts to peruse by himself; among them Bro. Davison's account of his own conversion; and we all know what a powerful charm experience is to break up the feelings of the heart. Bro. J. J. then briefly related his own experience, dating the commencement of it back some years ago, when he attended a missionary meeting in Philadelphia, in Sansom-St. Baptist Church. Some one (he knew not who) had taken the pains to scatter tracts in all the pews of the house. Among them was the Address to the Baptists by the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference. He read that Address, and it shook him tremendously. He went back to his field of labor in the interior of Pennsylvania; he studied and thought upon the subject; and though for a time his interest in the investigation suffered some abatement, the result was at length what you see. He exhorted the brethren to keep on hand constantly a good supply of tracts; to keep them in their houses, to carry them in their pockets, and to hand them out whenever occasion offered. We have now tracts, not only in the English, but in the German, French, and Chinese languages, thus bringing our sentiments within the reading of 500 millions of people. We ought to furnish our missionaries in China with abundant means for printing and circulating tracts. Think of the wretched, bungling work made there by other missionaries in their translations. Let us gird ourselves for more vigorous action. Nevertheless, he did not believe in going about this without prayer. We have to do with a God who lives; and He can make the influence of tracts be felt, long after the living teacher is laid in the dust. The time may come when we shall have Seventh-day Baptist Churches in the West Indies and in the East Indies. Bro. J. referred to the manner in which the attention of the Germans had been turned to the question of baptism. He hoped that there might be a beginning made by us among them, and in France. After many other pungent and stirring remarks, he closed by exhorting to faithfulness.

Bro. J. H. Cochran presented the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the success which has thus far attended the efforts of the American Sabbath Tract Society justifies and demands a larger expenditure of time and money in the way of Sabbath Lectureing and tract distributing.

Bro. C. said that he most heartily coincided with the sentiment of the resolution, for his own experience was a full confirmation of it. He remembered the time when his attention was first turned to the Sabbath question, and with what avidity he searched for information. The Sabbath Tract Society was not then in vigorous operation. When his mind had become excited, he went to New York in search of books bearing on the subject. He read everything he could get hold of, but found nothing to satisfy him. He found that with the advocates of Sunday it was the same old song, over and over. Acts 20: 7, 1 Cor. 16: 2, and Rev. 1: 10, were all the texts that they could bring—texts which contain not the remotest allusion to the Sabbath. At length he broke his mind to his pastor, who, instead of giving him any light, advised him to let the subject alone! Some years afterward, he called on that same pastor, and the conversation turned upon the Sabbath question. "Bro. Cochran," said he, "do you remember the advice I gave you when your mind was under exercise about that question? I told you to let it alone. I have tried that subject myself, and the only way for me to get along with it was to let it alone!" But these little tracts, said Bro. C., do not let the subject alone. They keep continually in the way, and whenever one sets his eyes upon one of them, he is obliged to think on the subject. It is impossible to station a preacher by every person who has convictions on the subject, but these little tracts will do the work. They present truth in a way that we cannot. We sometimes show too much warmth, and arouse prejudices that forestall investigation. Not so these tracts. They are silent, but powerful appeals. Ministers had often told him, that it made them feel indignant to see our publications scattered among their people.

Bro. J. R. IRISH, of DeRuyter, submitted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That this Society, encouraged by the result of an expression of their wants at their last session, now agree to raise $1000 the ensuing year, for the support of colporteurs and the distribution of tracts and other publications, and that we authorize the Board to make their arrangements on the faith of this promise.

He wished the resolution to pass, not that he would encourage the idea of going on regardless of an overruling Providence, but in reference to that Providence. If we cannot do all that we would, let us do what we can. Let us do as David did in reference to building the temple; let us at least lay by the stuff. Other remarks of an interesting character were made by Bro. I.

The following resolution was offered by Bro. E. S. BAILEY:—

Resolved, That while this Society asks of the friends of the Sabbath larger contributions in money to carry forward the tract enterprise, it also, and with even greater earnestness, asks their prayers that the blessings of God may attend the efforts of the Society.

He said that he most heartily responded to the sentiment of the resolution. There was a very prevalent sentiment in the community, that money was the principal thing—a sentiment which he could by no means endorse. Money was necessary, it was true, but without the blessing of God that money was good for nothing. Our blessed Saviour said, "Without me ye can do nothing." He would forever despair of success in any enterprise, unless fervent prayer should go up for the divine blessing. Still he had no fellowship for the man who would withhold the means, under pretense of relying on prayer. God has joined the two together, and let not man put them asunder. Where was the people, who relied upon God, and pressed their case urgently at the throne of grace, who failed to obtain a blessing?

Bro. W. B. MAXSON seconded the resolution. He regarded the community laboring under convictions upon this subject as somewhat like man when first formed. There was the body of a man, the form of a man, but he yet needed the breath of life. It was better to have a man without a spirit, than a perfect nonentity, provided we believe in a God who can breathe into him the spirit of life. We need nothing better than these tracts, and the Spirit of God to make them living souls. He feared that our 'fugitives' from the Sabbath never had the spirit of life breathed into them, otherwise they could no more leave the Sabbath than a wife could leave her husband. When he could come to the conclusion, that prayer had no influence in bringing down the blessing of God, he must be an infidel.

Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society.

The Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society held its First Anniversary at Alfred on First-day, Sept. 15th. The President, Lucius Crandall, being absent, the chair was taken by John A. Langworthy, one of the Vice Presidents.

After prayer by Bro. A. B. Burdick, and the appointment of a Committee to nominate officers, the Treasurer's Report was read; from which it appears, that the receipts of the Society, for memberships, the Sabbath Recorder, &c., during the year ending June 13, 1850, were $4112 63; the expenses for the same period were $4075 38; leaving a small balance in the Treasury.

The Annual Report of the Board of Managers was read by the Corresponding Secretary. The Report commences with a brief statement of the early efforts to promote the publication interests of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination,—a statement which is made for the double purpose of placing on record interesting historical matter, and showing the necessity of such an organization as the Publishing Society. It appears that in 1819 an effort was made to get up a publishing establishment by subscriptions of $25 each from able brethren in the different churches. This proving unsuccessful, the denominational Missionary Society, some two years afterward, commenced publishing the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Magazine, which was issued quarterly for four years and then discontinued for want of support. Five years later the Protestant Sentinel was started—it was published four years at Homer, two years at Schenectady, two years at De Ruyter, and then discontinued in consequence of inadequate support. The Seventh-day Baptist Register, the next paper in order, was started at De Ruyter in March, 1840, and continued four years. Then came the Sabbath Recorder, with the history of which our readers are all familiar. This statement is followed by a complete history of the origin and organization of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society, the transactions of the Board of Managers, the plan of future operations, &c. In addition to providing for the continuance and improvement of the Sabbath Recorder, the Board have made arrangements for the preparation and publication of a History of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination, and have also taken the incipient steps to secure a series of Sabbath School Books and a Sabbath School Paper. But we can not, in the brief space and time now at our command, attempt a full synopsis of the Report. It will soon be printed, when any who desire to examine it will have an opportunity.

The reading of the report was followed by interesting remarks upon a series of resolutions introduced for the consideration of the Society. We regret that our notes are not sufficiently full to enable us to report the remarks of the several speakers. Upon the resolution to adopt the Report, S. S. Griswold, Wm. B. Maxson, and Wm. M. Jones, spoke with a good deal of feeling, and in a manner deeply interesting to the audience. The resolution in relation to the Sabbath Recorder was spoken upon by Alfred B. Burdick, James H. Cochran, and Walter B. Gillett, who urged the claims of the paper, and set forth the advantages which would result to the denomination from placing it in every family. Wm. B. Maxson and W. B. Gillett, upon the resolution approving the plan of the Board to issue a history of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination, made some valuable and timely suggestions. The final resolution, relative to Sabbath Schools, furnished a text for a short but effective sermon, on the influence of early religious education, by Thomas E. Babcock. We give the resolutions:—

1st. Resolved, That the Annual Report be adopted, and printed under the direction of the Board.

2d. Resolved, That the Sabbath Recorder, as published under the direction of the Board of Managers of this Society, is well adapted to meet the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination, and that we recommend the Board to make an effort to place the paper in every family connected with the denomination

3d. Resolved, That the plan of the Board, as set forth in their Annual Report, to publish a complete history of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination, meets our hearty approval, and has our fervent prayers for its success.

4th. Resolved, That the growing interest among us in Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes, is a cheering sign of the times; and that we approve, and recommend to the favorable consideration of the brethren and churches, the proposition of the Board to publish a series of books and a periodical for the benefit of such schools and classes.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE—No. 13.

GLASGOW, August 30th, 18[illegible]

The Sunday postal delivery is to be immediately resumed. The Postmaster-General's order on the subject directs that the arrangements which were in force in the beginning of the year, shall again be operative until farther orders, but intimates that minor changes may be called for.

I have just observed, that "a motion made in the Legislative Council of Canada, on the 23d July, in favor of shutting the Post-office on Sunday, was rejected without a division."

At the meeting of the shareholders of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, held here this week, Sunday trains were again discussed. Mr. Cox, who moved for the resumption of these trains, intimated that those with whom he acted had failed in being prepared to issue proxies, and the motion was again negatived by a majority of 40 against 18. Two noticeable circumstances suggest themselves on this occasion: It was intimated that a Mr. Meadows has been received into the direction, who, at the meeting, avowed that he regarded Sunday trains as desirable. Mr. Blackburn, the Chairman, also, has abandoned all pretense to being guided by the Word of God, in using his influence for preventing these trains; and, when Mr. Cox intimated that he did not design renewing notice to his motion in the meantime, trusting that the Directors themselves would see it right to allow trains, Mr. Blackburn said this statement would be received with satisfaction; and that it might be believed the Directors "will drift with the taste of public opinion. If public opinion sets one way, we will not go the other." This is not merely the abandonment of high ground on the question, but it is the adoption of ground that is extremely low. It has no reference to the revealed will of God as a guide to men. Yet the perversion of revelation, on the other side, is most grievous. One of the Sunday advocates, Mr. Blackadder, said "it was on the fourth commandment, as contained in the Word of God, that he had always founded the advocacy of this cause;" and the Rev. Mr. Gibson, one of the Glasgow ministers, of the Free Church, said he would like if those in favor of Sunday trains "would let him know what was their opinion of the fourth commandment." It is really difficult, notwithstanding of the flourish, to believe that these men suppose that Sunday trains are prohibited by the fourth commandment. Whether done in ignorance or in despite, it is not only awful perversion, but much fitted to promote that infidelity the prevalence and increase of which are at other times deplored. A large excursion train ran on Sunday week from London to Salisbury and back, at very low fares. It is only by the increase of Sunday desecration, reducing it to the level of other of "the six working days," that Christians will be induced to consider and obey the will of the Lord in the matter.

Louis Phillippe, ex-king of the French, died this week, under the protection of the English Court. Although shorn of regal dignity, he has lived to the goodly age of 77 years. He has occupied much of the leisure of his exile in committing to writing the events of a chequered life; and when forewarned by medical advisers that death was approaching, he dictated to his wife the conclusion of the Memoir, which had been suspended from illness four months before. If published, some interest must attach to his life. Yet how rare, and how difficult to attain, is a true Memoir! How few will be found willing to give even what they know of the influencing motives of their actions—and without this we have not the real life of a man. But if those who best know—and even they often know but very imperfectly—the springs of action, are induced to withhold them, what will the most intimate acquaintance be able to do for supplying this? The events in the history of France, since they ceased to have a king, go far to convince us that it could be no easy task for a king to keep them in due order.

Her Majesty, the Queen of these realms, has again made her way to Scotland, and is this day in Holyrood, the ancient palace of Scottish Kings. She, however, designs no present stay in Edinburgh, being but on her way once more to her highland home in the north, the naked grandeur of which she seems to love. On her way from London, yesterday, however, she formally opened an immense railway viaduct at Berwick, over the Tweed, naming it "The Royal Border Bridge." Her husband, Prince Albert, is to lay the foundation stone of the National Gallery of Art in Edinburgh, intended to be an ornamental building, in a conspicuous part of that city—the mound that connects the new and old towns.

The Submarine Telegraph between France and Great Britain has this week been so far completed as to indicate success. The wire having been wound upon a wheel of large diameter, and suspended between the paddles of a steamer, the vessel started at a rate of between three and four miles an hour, the wire being carefully payed out as it progressed—weights being attached every quarter of a mile, to bear it down to the bottom. Starting from Dover, it is carried directly across to Cape Grinez, twelve miles south-west from Calais, these being the points of nearest approach. It was completed across in one day; and complimentary messages between the countries passed from land to land so soon as the steamer reached the French shore—as, indeed, messages were sent back to the starting point, during the whole course of the boat's progress. The telegraph used is stated to be that of House's invention, the same as in operation between New York and Philadelphia. May it not yet be that, instantaneously, while the impression is being brought off in New York, the Recorder shall "stop the press" to announce some God-glo[illegible]ing message concerning the sanctification o[illegible] Sabbath!

After a severe storm, which has shaken not a little of the ripe grain, the weather has again become favorable for harvest operations, which are being generally proceeded with throughout the country. Although there are complaints from various districts, there seems, on the whole, to be an average crop. The fears for the potato, however, extend, as case after case shows that tubers that appeared to be perfectly sound have in a day changed so as to be worth very little. The blight in this crop is, to a greater or less extent, over the whole kingdom. In Ireland, both on account of the extent planted, and the potato being so much the food of the poor there, the loss will be most severely felt. A paragraph has gone the rounds of the papers, though perhaps a fabrication, of a woman having been burnt in the field, in Galway, Ireland, while weeding potatoes, in a very unwonted way. Aged 33, and in perfect health, it is stated that, being at work, she felt a blast of burning air come over her, which threw her back. She felt as if snuff had entered her nostrils, and her hands and face were severely burned, as if they had been held over the flame of a strong fire. The stalks of the potatoes where she worked were burned to cinder, and the tubers made soft and black. Fears were said to be entertained that the parts of the woman's body which were affected by the blast will mortify. Rumors are often raised which have very little foundation; but, it is also true, that when common things fail to arrest men's attention, and when they refuse to see or to consider the more ordinary operations of Jehovah's hand, he has recourse to less common manifestations of his displeasure. In many forms we have, over the earth generally, intimations that the Lord is displeased. But instead of understanding his purpose, ingenuity is set to work to account for everything without reference to his will. But his hand must and shall be seen.

PROCEEDINGS IN CONGRESS LAST WEEK.

IN SENATE. SECOND-DAY, Sept. 9.

The Senate concurred in the Texas and New Mexico bill from the House, listened to a long speech from Mr. Houston about the personal difficulty between him and Mr. Wallace, and agreed to adjourn on the 30th inst. The President of the Senate signed the California and Utah bills, and the Texas and New Mexico bill, and they were sent to the President of the United States for his signature. A Message was received from the President of the United States to the Senate :—

"In compliance with the request of the Hon. Manual Alvarez, Acting-Governor, &c., I have the honor to transmit to the Senate herewith, a copy of the Constitution recently adopted by the inhabitants of New Mexico, together with a digest of the votes for or against it. Congress having just passed a a bill providing a Territorial Government for New Mexico, I do not deem it advisable to submit any recommendation on the subject of a State Government.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

Washington, Sept. 9, 1850.

The Message was laid upon the table, and the Senate, after Executive Session, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House agreed to adjourn on the 30th. A letter was read from Gen. James Wilson, of N. H., resigning his seat, as he is going to California. The bill supplying deficiencies in the pay and mileage of Members was amended so as to pay the Senators and Representatives from California, and appropriating $50,000 more to buy books with for new members.

IN SENATE. THIRD-DAY, Sept. 10.

The California Senators being admitted to their seats, drew lots to decide their respective terms of office ; Mr. Fremont drew the short term, expiring March 4, 1851, and Mr. Gwinn the long one, expiring March 4, 1856. Mr. Fremont gave notice of sundry bills relating to California ; and on his motion, the Post Office Committee were instructed to inquire as to the opening of various Post Offices and routes in the new State. The State Constitution of New Mexico was ordered to be printed. Mr. Chase gave notice of a bill applying the Wilmot Proviso to the territories. The Bounty Land Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Walker's amendment for the prevention of speculation was rejected by the Senate by a vote of 15 ayes and 31 nays. The bill to abolish the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia was taken up, and several amendments from Southern gentlemen rejected. Mr. Seward then moved to amend the bill by providing not for the abolition of the Slave Trade but of Slavery itself, and appropriating $200,000 to indemnify the owners, the bill to be approved by a majority of the inhabitants of the District at a special election to be held within six months of its passage or else to be void. This brought up the chivalry. Messrs. Mangum and Dawson saw in this reasonable and harmless proposition the destruction of the Union, and the awful and insatiable ambition of the Senator from New York. No decision was arrived at before the adjournment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

In the House the morning hour was spent upon the charges against Mr. Ewing for misconduct while Secretary of the Interior. The rest of the day was spent in debating the admission of the Representatives from California, without coming to a decision.

IN SENATE. FOURTH DAY, Sept. 11.

In the Senate, Mr. Fremont introduced a bill extending the laws and judiciary system of the United States over California, and appointing a Surveyor of Public lands to reside there, and keep the peace between the whites and the Indians. A bill was passed amending the act allowing a drawback on foreign goods taken to Chihuahua, Santa Fé, and the British provinces. A bill was also passed, appropriating money for the support of certain liberated slaves in Liberia. Mr. Seward withdrew his amendment to the bill abolishing the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and the original measure coming up, Mr. Clay made a speech in its favor. Mr. Seward then made a speech concerning his amendment to the bill. Messrs. Butler and Foote next spoke. Mr. Dickinson also made a speech. Mr. Winthrop replied [illegible] some strictures on his own course made [illegible] Mr. Seward, and said that though he [illegible] Winthrop) was not in favor of the Bill [illegible] stood, there was a chance of getting [illegible] the amendments already adopted, and [illegible]ing the original bill, and this possibil[illegible] amendment of Mr. Seward would de[illegible] The debate was continued by Messrs. Foote, Ewing, Hale and Winthrop. Mr. W. provoked a storm by bringing up the South Carolina law against colored seamen. Messrs. Butler and Downs replied to him, the latter with great violence, and at last an adjournment took place without any action having been taken.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

In the House the California Representatives were admitted and took their seats. The Pennsylvania contested election case was decided in favor of Robbins, the occupant of the seat. The case of Secretary Ewing was then discussed till the adjournment.

IN SENATE. FIFTH-DAY, Sept. 12.

In the Senate the memorial of the Legislature of New Mexico, asking admission into the Union as a State, was introduced ; a motion was made to refer it to the Territorial Committee, which was laid on the table by a vote of 27 to 15. The Slave Trade bill was then debated by Messrs. Clay, Soulé, Berrien, Winthrop and Douglas. The question was then taken on Mr. Seward's amendment, and it was lost by 5 to 45. Mr. Clay then made an appeal for the rejection of the amendments made in Committee, but before action was taken the bill was laid aside and the House bill supplying deficiencies in the pay and mileage of members was taken up. Mr. Benton moved to amend it by a provision requiring the mileage of the California and Oregon members to be reckoned by the shortest traveled route overland. Mr. Gwinn tried hard to get the whole distance by the Isthmus allowed as the route, but in vain ; the amendment was adopted and the bill was passed, after which the Senate went into Executive Session till the adjournment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House talked a little about the Ewing case, and then took up the Fugitive Slave bill and passed it, after a considerable struggle, by a vote of 109 to 75. The House soon after adjourned.

IN SENATE. SIXTH-DAY, Sept. 13.

Soon after the reading of the Journal, the action of the House of Representatives in relation to the death of Henry Nes was announced. Mr. Sturgeon submitted a few remarks upon the life and character of the deceased—when the usual resolutions of condolence were adopted, and the Senate adjourned at a quarter before 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Stevens, of Pa., announced the death of Dr. Nes, of that State, late member of the House, who expired at his residence, in York, Pa., on the 10th inst. He passed an eulogium on the deceased. He also submitted a resolution expressing the deep sensibility of the House on the announcement of the event. The members will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days, as a further mark of respect. The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE. SABBATH, Aug 10.

Mr. Bell reported a bill to preserve peace with the Indian tribes in California, which, after amendment so as to fix the annual salaries of three Indian Agents at $3,000, was passed. Mr. Davis, of Miss., from Military Committe, reported a bill to provide pensions for widows of deceased officers and soldiers not hitherto provided for. The President laid before the Senate Rev. Mr. Gurley's report on Liberia, communicated by the Secretary of State. Messrs. Gwinn and Fremont introduced a number of bills for the benefit of California, relating to the Public Land, the Gold Mines and Placers, Survey of Coast, a Light House system, Donation and Preëmption Rights, and Settlement of Land Claims. After the consideration of the morning business, the bill for the suppression of the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia was taken up, on motion of Mr. Clay. Various amendments were offered and rejected. After debating the bill for some time the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House resumed the consideration of the Report of the Richardson Committee, in regard to the affairs of the Department of the Interior. Mr. Richardson closed the debate in condemnation of Mr. Ewing's allowance of certain claims. Mr. Bayly from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the bill appropriating the support of the Post-Office Department. The Senate's amendments were concurred in. He also reported back the bills for the erection of custom-houses in Bangor, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. After discussing the tariff question, without coming to any decision, the House adjourned.

Later from Europe.

From the files brought by the Asia, we make the following extracts :—

Ex-King Louis Phillippe died on Monday morning, the 26th of August, at Claremont, in the 77th year of his age. The King had been made aware of his approaching dissolution early on the preceding day, in the presence of the Queen, and receiving with calmness the melancholy information thus first broken to him, prepared for the final arrangements which he wished to make.

Accounts from Toulon, of the 25th, state that some most reprehensible scenes have taken place in the Municipal Council of that town on the subject of the electoral lists.

The President, in his progress on his tour through France, seems to be received, at the various cities, with great coolness.

The Moniteur du Soir announces, in a correspondence from Strasbourg, dated the 20th, the detection of a plot against the President's life. The chief conspirators came from Nancy. One came from the far south. Several arrests have taken place in consequence. A Socialist had denounced the plot to the police.

Intelligence from Copenhagen confirms the belief that the Danes regard an attack upon Rendsburg as hopeless. They are making preparations for wintering in Schleswig.

The Peace Congress assembled and commenced business at Frankfort, on Thursday, Aug. 22, in the Paulskirche. The majority of the members were Englishmen and Americans. There were, however, many French and German representatives present. Dr. [illegible]up, of Darmstadt, was elected President. [illegible] chief speakers during the day were [illegible] J. Burnet of Camberwell, M. Emile Gi[illegible]in, M. Bonnet, (pastor of the French Protestant Church at Frankfort,) and Mr. Cobden, M. P. It is worthy of remark that General Haynau, who commanded the Austrian troops in the Hungarian war, and who has frequently been denounced by Mr. Cobden as "the butcher Haynau," was present during a part of the sitting. On Friday, the Congress was addressed by Mr. Hindley, M. P., M. Girardin, Dr. Ruller, an American, Mr. Geo. Dawson of Birmingham, and Mr. Cobden. The sittings were resumed on Saturday, and, in the evening of that day, the proceedings of the Congress finally closed. The meeting was addressed by an Ojibbeway Chief, by two Germans, Drs. Bodensee and Weill, Mr. Edward Miall of London, Elihu Burritt the learned blacksmith, and Mr. Chipple an American. Resolutions were agreed to condemnatory of the practice of war, in favor of deciding international disputes by arbitration, urging the necessity of national disarmament, disapproving of loans for defraying war expenses, declaring the principle of non-intervention and the sole right of every state to regulate its own affairs, and recommending the convocation of a Congress of representatives of various States, with a view to the formation of a code of international law.

When the resolutions on the list had been carried, a supplementary one against duelling was passed. This third annual session of the Congress was terminated by a vote of thanks to the municipal authorities of Frankfort for the kind reception they had given to the peace-makers. The meeting next year is to be held in London.

The Austrian Government has invited the Princes of Germany to instruct their Plenipotentiaries to meet at Frankfort on the 1st of September for the purpose of reconstituting the old Federal Diet.

Accounts from Rome represent its financial situation as deplorable; the Papal Government has neither money nor credit, and is on the verge of bankruptcy.

A fearful act of military violence has been perpetrated at Peath. On the 18th, which was the birthday of the Emperor, the Austrian national anthem was given by the orchestra of the city. Many civilians who were present expressed their disapprobation by hissing. Twenty-eight were seized and conveyed to the barracks of the gendarmeie, where seventeen of them, after a summary trial, were found guilty and sentenced to be beaten with sticks by the soldiery. A few, who were declared by the surgeons too weak to undergo this terrible punishment, were sentenced to be beaten with more slender rods.

We learn from Madrid that the Government had ordered the frigates Villa de Bilboa and Ferrolano and the brig Ligero, which were to form part of the Manilla squadron, to hold themselves in readiness to sail for the Havana, where they are to remain until further orders. Two vessels of the Mediterranean division, the corvette Nenus and the brig Scipio, are likewise to proceed to Cuba. The Comercio, of Cadiz, states that the Minister of Marine had purchased four steamers of five hundred horse power each for the purpose of establishing a regular communication between Spain and the West Indies. One of them is to be delivered in the course of next month, and the three others before the close of the year.

From Ireland, the news is gloomy in the extreme. The potatoes are being cut off by the old disease, and the wheat crop has been so much injured by a severe storm that it will not afford more than two-thirds yield. The various emigrant ports are crowded by the tenantry and farmers fleeing the country as if from a plague.

THE POTATO ROT AT THE EAST.—The Boston Journal is informed by a gentleman who has recently returned from a journey through several counties in New Hampshire, that the potato rot has made its appearance, and is committing serious ravages. In some situations the tubers are badly rotted, while in others no signs of the disease have as yet appeared. Much excitement and apprehension exist among the farmers in consequence of this calamity. We hear complaints of the rot from several towns in Massachusetts. The Old Colony Reporter says :—

"It is confined principally to one or two varieties, the Chenangoes, and the pink-eyes, or calicoes, are nearly all which have yet, to our knowledge, been affected. The former has, ever since the first appearance of the rot, some years since, been the most affected, and we should think it advisable to relinquish its culture, at least for the present."

The Newburyport Herald states that the rot in that vicinity appears to be far worse than in any previous year. A great portion of the crop is found to be rotten already in the hills, and if it is not soon arrested, the crop threatens to be entirely cut off. We learn that in Norfolk County the potatoes are generally diseased, and the crop will be much reduced.

The Providence Journal says: "We regret to learn that this disease has suddenly appeared in this quarter. A few days ago the potato looked finely. But now, we hear of their decay in all directions, and many fields which promised a large yield, will not be worth digging.

GEN. HINTON, THE MAIL ROBBER—HOW IT WAS DONE.—The Cleveland Herald says, that when Gen. Hinton bolted from his keepers, his first care was to make them safe by turning the key upon them. He then left the Weddell House without stopping to pay his bill, and took his course up Center-st. Having gained the grade of the Pittsburgh Railroad, he followed it a short distance, but soon concluded it safer to make a short detour therefrom. He regained it, however, near the city limits, and at day-break brought up in a thicket near Newburgh. Here he skulked among the bushes all day, and at night resumed his nocturnal ramble. For 48 hours he subsisted on green corn and a piece of salt fish that he stealthily obtained. Finally, fatigued and footsore, he approached the habitation of man, obtained breakfast, bought a horse, and boldly pursued his journey. At Wellsville he voluntarily surrendered to the tavern-keeper. He gives it as his opinion that he could have escaped across the river, and by taking to the mountainous regions of Virginia, and plying his trade of carpenter and joiner, have defied pursuit. He also says that it was at no time his intention to escape for a longer time than he could procure his witnesses and make ready to establish his innocence. This point is open for discussion.

COMMENCEMENT AT BOWDOIN COLLEGE.—The annual commencement of this institution took place on the 4th inst. The Oration before the Literary Societies was given on the 3d by Rev. M. V. Butler of Wells River, Vt., the Poem by Charles H. Upton of Washington City. The graduating class numbered thirty. The Honorary Degree of LL.D. was conferred by the Board of Trustees and Overseers upon John S. Tenney of Norridgewock; also the degree of D.D. upon Rev. Leonard Willington and Rev. Thomas M. Smith, and the Honorary Degree of M. D. upon John M. Berry, and Honorary Degree of A. M. upon Hon. Hugh J. Anderson, Wooster Parker and Noah Woods. The Phi Beta Kappa Oration was delivered on Thursday, the 5th, by Dr. Sprague of Albany, with a Poem by Edward P. Weston of Gorham. The subject of the Oration was Intellectual Influence.

DISASTERS ON LAKE MICHIGAN.—The Chicago Journal furnishes the following complete list of disasters to shipping on Lake Michigan during the late gale :—

Schrs. Kingman, ashore near Michigan City; Cleopatra, do do; J. McKay, do do; Warren, do do ; N. C. Walton, do Calumet; Thornton, do do ; Mint, do do; Calcutta, do head of the lake ; Watson, do Chicago ; Ann, do Kenosha ; J. F. Porter, do Racine ; C. Howard, sunk, do ; J. C. Spencer, ashore, East Shore ; brigs Flora, do Chicago ; Helfenstein, do head of the lake ; Mohegan, do near Racine ; bark Churubusco, ashore, Milwaukie ; schr. Wyoming damaged $700 ; brig Ellen Parker, do $1000 ; schrs. Palmetto, do $400 ; G. G. Drew, do $250 ; steamer Canada, do considerably.

AN EDITOR TURNED INVENTOR.—The N. Y. State Fair Hourly Bulletin says: S. H. Mix, Editor of the Schoharie Patriot, has a large Plank Road car upon the grounds, with an improvement on the ordinary wheel center, termed the "Oscillating Roller Axle." The improvement consists in the eye of the wheel being removed from the dead center and thrown out towards the rim or tire, increasing the power by doubling the lever. It is also an anti-friction combination, very ingeniously devised, and attracts great attention by its novelty and plausibility. The car is built for two horse draught, and is intended to maintain and carry an immense load.

CHINESE FUNERAL.—A San Francisco paper says :—A Chinese funeral took place yesterday. The Chinaman died at the Chinese Restaurant of Macoa & Woosung. The funeral was large, there being over one hundred and fifty Chinamen in the procession, each wearing a piece of white crape. A large number of persons visited the burying ground to witness the ceremonies, which were as follows : They lowered the coffin as we do; they then thew the white bandage worn on their arms, into the grave ; then matches and the wax candles, and a bottle of wine. Before covering the coffin, each person bowed his head to the earth and uttered some few words not by us understood. Then each threw a handful of dirt on the coffin, and passed round liquors, wine and segars, &c. of which they invited each American to partake, and the grave was then filled up.

A WORK OF THE LORD.—A correspondent of the Independent, writing from East Smithfield, Bradford Co., Pa., says :—

"God in his mercy appeared for this place the last winter. Meetings were held quite frequently for several weeks, and all denominations of Christians seemed to be refreshed. As a result, the Baptist church received between sixty and seventy members ; the Cambellite Baptist about twenty, and our little church had an addition of eighteen. It was solemn to see the old man, with thin, gray locks ; the middle-aged heads of families—fathers and mothers ; youths just beginning the active part of life ; and the child, hardly twelve years of age, standing together and taking the vows of God upon them, engaging to be children of the Lord, and walk together under the watch-care of the church. This could not have been the work of man —it was the Lord's doing, and may He have all the glory."

SUMMARY.

The schooner Canton, arrived at Gloucester, Mass., 13th inst., reports taking from a raft, on the 9th, 35 miles north-west of Cape Sable, four men, who report that they were a part of the crew of the bark Messenger, from St. John, N. B., for Liverpool, which vessel was capsized in a squall the previous day, and that ten of the crew, including officers, were drowned. One man was saved on two planks and a piece of board, and the other three on a raft made of nine pieces of plank. They remained clinging to their raft 21 hours before they were rescued.

A dispatch from Washington says :—"Information has been received here, from Charleston, S. C., stating that the people in that city are furious at the passage of the Territorial Bills. Upon receipt of the news, a public demonstration was got up, and the flag of the Union was trodden under foot. Meetings have been called in a number of districts of that State, to take action upon the present state of affairs."

A Mr. Young was killed on Wednesday night on the Troy and Whitehall Railroad, near Ballston ; he, with two others, was on a hand car, ahead of the locomotive, but being unable to keep away from it, his companions jumped and saved themselves, while he remained on, and was run over and shockingly mangled. He was in the employ of the road.

A Convention will be held at Worcester, Mass., on the 23d and 24th of October next, (agreeably to appointment of a preliminary meeting held at Boston, on the 30th of May last,) to consider the question of "Woman's Rights, Duties, and Relations."

The Montreal Courier says, We learn by a private letter from Exeter that the Bishop of that diocese is about to institute a prosecution against Mr. Gorham for heresy, and that if he fail in that he will resign his bishopric.

Robert Wickliff, Jr., late U. S. Chargé d'Affairs to Sardinia, died at his father's residence in Lexington, Ky., on Thursday evening, 20th ult., after an illness of several weeks, aged about 35 years.

Gen. John D. Whiteside, a distinguished citizen of the State of Illinois—having held the offices of Member of the Legislature, State Treasurer, Fund Commissioner, and member of the last Convention to revise the Constitution—died on the 3d inst., at his residence in Monroe County, Ill.

A fire broke out in the stables of the city Hotel at Tiffin, Ohio, on the 7th inst., which destroyed several buildings. Loss about $4,500. Sands' Circus Company lost eleven fine horses and thirty-five sets of harness, valued at $2,000.

Benjamin Balcom, William Calhoun, and Henry Monasseth, were sentenced, at Litchfield, Conn., on Thursday last, to be hanged on the second Friday in July next, for the murder of Barnice White, in Colebrook, Ct., in March last.
